NOTES OF THE WEEK.

To all friends heartiest New Year's greetings! It is our happiness once more to be able to offer to our readers an inspiring sermon of Mr. Stopford Brooke's and other helpful words for the New Year. But of these our store has outrun this week's available space, and some of the special New Year's articles have to wait for next week. These will include an article on "Temperance Reform" by the Rev. C. J. Street, and another on "Aspects of Women's Work in 1902" by Miss M. C. Gittins. This week it will be seen that we have an article by Mr. A. J. Mundella on "National Education in 1902," and the Rev. John Ellis reports the progress of the "Guild Movement."

WITH the New Year we need hardly remind our readers that subscriptions for THE INQUIRER become due, and in the interest of all concerned are payable in advance. A quick response in this matter is always a pleasant form of greeting at the beginning of the year, and friends afford more encouragement than perhaps they realise, not only by their own loyal adhesion, but by obtaining new subscribers.

ONE good service in connection with THE INQUIRER has been rendered by generous friends for some years past, in subscribing for copies to be sent to Free Libraries in different parts of the country. Last year about forty copies of THE INQUIRER were so sent, but the cost of not more than half of these was met by the subscriptions of friends. May we ask, in this New Year, for means to extend this useful distribution even further than in the past? It appears to us a sound method of quiet missionary work.

OUR hope of the Ministers' Superannuation Fund has not been disappointed. As will be seen from our back page and the letter from the officers of the Superannuation Committee in another column, more than the first capital sum of £20,000 was given before the end of the year, and the establishment of the Fund is now well assured. The officers in their letter thank the donors for their generous response to the appeal. Our whole community thanks the officers for that great labour of love, which has had such happy issue, and has secured so great a benefit for our churches and their ministers.

IN our Retrospect of 1901, last week, we referred to the personal gift to Dr. Brooke Herford, on his retirement from the ministry of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, as having been "over £2,000." We have since been favoured with a copy of the correspondence which passed last November between Dr. Herford and Sir John Brunner, Mr. Walter Baily and Mr. Macrae Moir, the chairman, treasurer, and secretary of the Committee, who organised the testimonial. This correspondence has been privately circulated among the donors to the fund, and it is very gratifying to learn from it that the actual gift amounted to over £3,200, including £322 from friends in America, which is in addition to another gift of about £400 sent to Dr. Herford a short time previously from America.

THE Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association has received the following letter from Mr. Benoyendra Nath Sen, who is Secretary of the Committee, on which all the sections of the Brahmo Somaj are represented; the letter is dated—41, Machuabazar-road, Calcutta, Dec. 12, 1901:—

"The news of the death of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams has come upon us as a most cruel shock. The loss is felt very deeply by all sections of our community, and many leading men outside the Brahmo Somaj, the more so, as it is felt that he made himself a sacrifice to the cause of religion and culture in India. It is proposed to have a public meeting in Calcutta to express sorrow at the loss, and do something, if possible, to keep a memorial. For myself, personally, the memory of his gentle affection will be a sacred possession of my life, but I must keep these feelings to myself.

"The Brahmo Somaj Committee, at a meeting held on 10th inst., passed the following resolution, which I have to request you to be kind enough to communicate to his bereaved family:—

The Brahmo Somaj Committee expresses its deepest sorrow at the intelligence of the death of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, and offers its heart-felt condolence to the members of his family."

THE annual meeting of the Indian National Congress was held at Calcutta in Christmas week under the presidency of Mr. D. E. Wacha, chairman of the Municipal Corporation of Bombay, and a member of the Bombay Millowners' Association. The Congress, which was attended by over 5,000 persons, dealt with a large number of questions affecting the progress and welfare of the country. The President concluded his address by acknowledging Lord Curzon's zeal for the advancement of the people, and his desire to hold the scales even, but the increasing poverty of the people was strongly urged, and the consequent frequency of acute famines. A thorough inquiry was needed into the condition and the burdens of the agricultural populations. Excessive military expenditure should be borne by the British Treasury. Material progress in India was, in the President's opinion, impossible while so much national wealth was abstracted from the country without any return. The permanence of British rule must depend on the contentment and prosperity of the masses. The next meeting of the Congress is to be at Bombay.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE'S second course of five lectures for the present session at University College, in connection with the "Stopford Brooke Lectureship Fund," is to begin on Thursday evening, Jan. 23, the subject of the lectures being "Poetry of the Nineteenth Century: Rossetti, William Morris, and Others." At least 250 free tickets will be issued for this course, to applicants in the order of application, on or after January 14. A limited number of unreserved tickets, at 7s. 6d. for the course, are also to be had, and should be applied for before Jan. 14. Applicants for tickets should address the Hon. Sec., Stopford Brooke Lectures, University College, W.C. The lectures are given at eight o'clock in the Botanical Theatre. The repetition of some of Mr. Brooke's lectures in another part of London is also under consideration.

WITH the New Year The Unitarian World appears upon the scene, a little monthly magazine with a big title, and in form like the Seedsower. The Unitarian World, which is published by Messrs. Elsom and Co., at Hull, with Mr. Philip Green as London agent, takes the place of the New Kingdom, which up to the end of last year was published in Manchester. Who the editors of The Unitarian World are we do not know, for they remain incognito; but we feel bound to say that some of the editorial notes do not seem to us likely to command much respect. Others, again, are admirable in tone. But "the sober-minded folk who, after all, form the bulk of our community," as one of the notes has it, must judge for themselves whether this is the kind of magazine they want. It must be distinctly understood that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association is in no way responsible for this new publication.

The Unitarian World is to be devoted to "the word and work of Unitarians." In a note, referring to the relations long maintained by the B. and F.U.A. with liberal religious thinkers and workers in other countries, the Editors say :—

Successive committees have made it abundantly clear in their intercourse with foreign nations that Unitarianism is large enough to embrace all seekers after truth, all doers of righteousness, all lovers of goodness, all sincere believers in God, all earnest disciples of Christ. No walls of separation, not already existing, have been erected by the Association; it has sought to place the emphasis on love to God and love to man. The meetings of the International Council, and the volume of addresses and papers, suggested the name of The Unitarian World. It will be our constant endeavour to sustain the broad spirit, the large outlook, the brotherly sympathy which characterised those notable gatherings.

We most heartily wish that the endeavour thus avowed may prevail, and that The Unitarian World will prove to be indeed what its sub-title promises, "a monthly magazine of Liberal Religious Thought and Work." Among other interesting matter in this first number is a sermon by Dr. Crothers, one of those separately published by his congregation, on "The Church of the Free Spirit." Its burden is the same as that of the speech which Dr. Crothers made at Westminster Town Hall, in Whit-week, a report of which will be found in the International Council volume.

Le Protestant, the Liberal Christian journal published in Paris, we heartily commend to those of our friends who read French. Like THE INQUIRER, it is a weekly paper, and is full of interesting matter. Formerly edited by the late Etienne Coquerel, it is now in charge of M. A. Reyss, and has recently been enlarged and improved in appearance. The annual subscription from foreign countries is 8fr., which should be sent to the publishers' office, 20, Rue de Vienne, Paris. In the number for Dec. 28 will be found a translation of the article by the Rev. J. Morley Mills, of Bootle, on "A Faith for the Children," which appeared in THE INQUIRER of Dec. 7.

THE National Unitarian Temperance Association are arranging for a large public meeting to be held at the Victoria Hall, Waterloo-road, S.W., on Friday evening, Jan. 17, when addresses are to be delivered by Mrs. Ormiston Chant and Mr. Fred Maddison. Some excellent soloists have also promised their services, and Mr. Duncan S. Miller, the well-known hand-bell entertainer, has promised an interesting item.

BIRMINGHAM RIOTS.

PREACHING last Sunday in the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, the Rev. L. P. Jacks made a vigorous protest against the recent riotous outbreak, when Mr. Lloyd George, M.P., was refused a hearing in the Town Hall. Addressing his hearers as the successors of Priestley's congregation, Mr. Jacks drew a parallel between the recent occurrence and the Priestley riots of 1791. The Unitarians of those days were earnest political reformers, and it was the cry of "treason" that was raised against them and infuriated the mob. The following passages we take from the Daily News report of the sermon :—

In the history of those riots they might discern the outline of a remarkable parallel to recent events, not so much in the actual occurrences as in the spirit that lay behind them, the objects aimed at, and the delusions at work in the minds of the actors. Then, as now, there was a minority of citizens whose political opinions were highly obnoxious to the majority, and who in the excited state of public feeling were pointed at as sympathising with the enemies of their country, and, therefore, disloyal to the State. Then, as now, the evidence of guilt was offered mainly in the form of abusive terms, by the employment of which, at a psychological moment, the populace was roused to that pitch of excitement when it fancied an excuse existed for acts of violence. The parallel might indeed be extended much further than that. As an instance, he might mention the statement in The Times of 1791, that the Birmingham mob was composed of respectable persons. Was it not strange that the most beautiful work of art in any public place of Birmingham to-day was the statue of Priestley, shouted down and driven out in 1791 as a speaker of treason? Was it not stranger still to see that statue, standing on the pedestal where the citizens had placed him, in the midst of the scene of last Wednesday week? Had he come to life what must have been his thoughts? As he saw the same passions breaking out against another man which had broken out against him, watched the same delusions at work, heard the same outcries making night hideous! How familiar to him the scene and the spirit of the scene!

As to the right of free speech, refused by the mob, Mr. Jacks said :—

It was only the menaced speaker who had any cause to claim the right. When, however, he wanted to say the thing the ruling majority did not like, then it availed him something to live in a country where fair play was honoured. One read with astonishment, not unmixed with alarm, the definitions of free speech which had appeared so plentifully of late. They were told that the citizen had his freedom only so long as he told no lies, uttered no treason, and behaved himself as he should. But who was to determine who was telling lies, uttering treason, and behaving himself as he should? If the judge of these things was to be the ruling majority, there was no more free speech here than there was in Russia or under the Sultan of Turkey. But free speech had an opposite meaning; it meant that the verdict of a mere majority, however confident it might be in its own judgment, should never be allowed to put a minority to silence.

Profoundly disagreeing as he did with those who opposed the Government in the prosecution of its terrible task, Mr. Jacks yet declared that he should as soon think of calling them cannibals as traitors; but even supposing there had been treason, the wisest course was to allow it a free platform and let it talk itself out. The attempt at violent suppression only gave an added impulse and a wider influence to the opinions they opposed.

When, in 1791, the mob burnt Priestley's chapel and shouted him down, they thought, no doubt, they had suppressed him. What they really did by those actions was to pave the way for the erection of his statue in front of the Council House. In conclusion, he asked them to bear with him while he read them one more quotation from Priestley. The following words were taken from the letter he addressed to the citizens of Birmingham after the riot :—"You are still more mistaken if you imagine that this conduct of yours has any tendency to serve your cause, or to prejudice ours. . . . Answer our arguments and your business is done; but your having recourse to violence is only a proof that you have nothing better to produce. Should you destroy myself as well as my house, library, and apparatus, ten more persons of equal or superior spirit and ability would instantly rise up. If those ten were destroyed, a hundred would appear; and, believe me, that the Church of England, which you now think you are supporting, has received a greater blow by this conduct of yours than I and all my friends have ever aimed at it.

CHRISTMAS AT PIACENZA.

SIR,—Your readers will, I trust, be interested in what follows :—On Christmas evening I had the privilege of addressing a few members of the Catholic Independent Church, acknowledging our friend Miraglia for their Bishop, now meeting in Via Prevostura, No. 48.

I tried to show them how we Unitarian Christians are at one with them in commemorating with thankful gladness and rejoicing the birth of our Redeemer and Saviour—Jesus of Nazareth.

Yesterday evening before a crowded congregation I spoke of Stephen, the Protomartyr, who declared that the God who made heaven and earth does not dwell exceptionally in houses raised by man's hands.

I spoke also of Saul, the persecutor of the followers of Jesus, converted into the most devoted and successful preacher of the Crucified.

I concluded by encouraging the followers of our friend Miraglia to stand manfully faithful to their elected and therefore persecuted Bishop, forgiving their bigoted persecutors.

My words evidently met with sympathy and approbation, and I was desired to speak in Via Prevostura also this evening, which, by God's help, I shall not fail doing.

A great work for the spiritual redemption of Italy is going on in Piacenza. May God strengthen me to forward it.

FERDINANDO BRACCIFORTI.

Piacenza, Dec. 27.

THE Rev. W. Stoddart, B.A., preached, in the Spain-lane Chapel, Boston, on Dec. 8, a vigorous sermon on the evils of Gambling, since reprinted from the Boston Guardian. The special occasion of the sermon was a memorial to the magistrates, presented by Mr. Stoddart and the Rev. D. Barnett, an Independent minister, and signed by all the Nonconformist ministers of the town and one clergyman of the Church of England, calling attention to the illegal gambling connected with certain "Archery Tournaments." At the conclusion of his sermon, Mr. Stoddart vindicates his right and duty as a minister of religion to interfere in such matters, and to speak out boldly in defence of the public good and the cause of truth and right.

THE COMING YEAR.

A SERMON
BY THE REV. STOPFORD A. BROOKE.

I.

SOME years ago, as I was walking home in one of the blackest fogs I can remember, when night had fallen on a Christmas Day, among that network of streets and squares which extends to the north of the British Museum, I came, in the midst of the evil darkness, to a deeper darkness than I had yet met. I stood still at the beginning of one of the great arteries of London, in which all the lights were quenched. I could not see the houses on either hand, but where they stood the blackness was more palpable; and between these invisible walls there appeared to be an infinite abyss of darkness which changed and moved within itself, from lesser to greater, and from greater to lesser gloom. Suddenly a man seemed to spring out of the blackness, so close he was before I saw him, and he cried out "Do not go down there, there is no light anywhere"; and the words had to my overwrought fancy more meaning than he thought.

I have often thought of this scene when I have heard the bells ring in the New Year through rain and mist, and just as often when the night of New Year's Eve has been clear and full of frosty stars. I think of it now as I write, and look down into the unknown year on which we are now entering. So far as knowledge of what will be in the days to come leads us, we are standing on an edge of light and looking into a gulf of shifting and changing mist, swart as the air which, in our Teutonic fathers' imagination, covered the abyss before the worlds were made. In it we think we distinguish this or that event to come in ghostly shape, but these images are the shadows only of our hopes and fears. Our soul is wandering in the mist before us, but what it is doing or seeing none can tell, and least of all, its possessor. What will be our fate is not only what we make it, but what others will also make it. We know nothing at all. When the New Year of 1903 dawns for us, what shall we have become, or, rather, what will have become to us? Everything around us may have changed. The pitiless storm that now beats on the head of some may have passed into summer weather. The soft sweet shining of love and happy days which others know may have changed to a barren, frozen life; wealth may be poverty, and poverty wealth; love be hatred, and hatred love; honour be left alone, and solitude be peopled; shame be forgotten in love, and love be lost in jealousy; death be enthroned where there was fulness of life, or life rise again from a hopeless grave.

Even more within than without, we cannot tell what the fluttering mist contains. There are whole spaces of our soul which lie undiscovered by us, unoccupied, unknown. One of these may be suddenly disclosed, and in it will be a thousand thousand new thoughts, new passions, new ranges for emotion, new scenery to wander over. We shall then be new men. Our outward life may be the same, but inwardly we shall be as much changed as we shall be by death and the powers of the world beyond.

Then there are whole spaces of the soul which we know well—every field of thought, every dwelling of imagination, every scene full of associations of the past; with all their feelings, all their events, all their loves. One of these may suddenly be closed for ever, swallowed up in an earthquake of the heart, or lost for ever in the blaze of a new light or love; and, after a time, that ancient world will be like a dream when one awaketh. Often the known disappears and is as dark as the unknown.

Whenever, then, we think of all the change a New Year may bring, we seem to stand, as I stood that night, alone in a dark mist, and looking into a cavern of darker mist; and, lo! our thought takes sudden form and cries to us, like a man, rushing out of the impenetrable gloom, "Go no further, there is no light any where."

This is the way in which we often think of the future, when we look into it; and it is natural enough. The uncertainty of life is our nearest experience. Well, then, accept it. What life inevitably brings it is the part of a fool to resent. That which, like the uncertainty of the future, is a universal experience, cannot be an evil any more than death. Our wisdom is to recognise it and find out its good, and by finding that to master it. Therefore there are three things to say of it.

(i.) First, do not think it over and over; do not brood over its possibilities of evil. We double its ill-effect on us when we consider it too much. Troubles and dangers are either increased by brooding on them, or our power of meeting them is lessened by brooding on them. Even the good things we hope for are often made so great by continually picturing them that when they come we are disappointed. They fall short of our expectations, and then we lose the actual use and joy of them. We make, by too much consideration of possible futures, misfortunes too bad and good-fortunes too good. And the full result of this foolish brooding over that which we cannot know is that we do not see the events of life as they really are. When we are at last in them we have so coloured them beforehand by our anxious fears and hopes, or rather we have so coloured our own mind, that we neither feel nor know the real truth of the thing; and when life is over look back and know this, and sighing, say: "There's nothing good or bad but thinking makes it so."

Then, again, when we think too much of the future, we lose the present; and that is a great pity. Here, fresh from God, here, when the morning comes, is a new day! Hour by hour, it brings its joys or sorrows, difficulties or reposes, sunshine or shadow; and each event has its message for us. Each, if we meet them awake, enables our character to grow, or to act nobly on others; and every one of them is full of interest. We ought to be on the spot; our eyes fixed on the actual thing to be done or conquered; our heart open to the flying beauty or the momentary emotion; our soul awake to God's messages or man's quick touches—and we are far away; wondering what will be, lost in predictions of trouble, engaged in anxieties, racked with imaginary pains, or dreaming of joys we shall never have. The greater part of the present is lost. Nor is the future gained, for when nothing in the present is realised we do not realise ourselves; and then we neither realise Man nor God. Life is, then, mere illusion, and though a part of our life is illusion, it is not all illusion. There are matters in it of the deepest reality; and these we miss if we gaze too much into the future instead of living for God and man in the present. Guard yourself, then, against over-consideration of the morrow. Let the morrow, as Jesus said, take thought for the things of itself. For God is not dead and when difficulties come, He will be beside you. And your intelligence, courage, and love are not dead and they are capable, when troubles arrive, of meeting them. And human help and sympathy are not dead, and they will stand by you in any battle that may be at hand. We have great allies—God and Man and the Powers of the Soul. Oh, how right was Christ when he said: "Sufficient to the day is the evil thereof"; "Do not take too much thought for the morrow."

(ii.) The second thing to say in this uncertainty is—Do not be afraid. There are some so constituted towards the future that they are always afraid of it—folk who have some courage to face the Known, but who have none for the Unknown. These, too, lose the use of the present and enfeeble their character. They torment also their own life and they worry the lives of others. They are all one Fear of the unknown, and fear is the most infectious of diseases. They spread fear far and wide, and the evil they thus do is greater than they know. Unless you get the better of this you will have a useless and injurious year—injurious to all your little world of friends and to your home. The mist into which we are walking is confusing enough without peopling it with the dark phantoms which Fear builds and unbuilds in its abject imagination.

Take courage, then, to your heart. There is nothing which may not be conquered if it be met with resolution. There will be no trial but that which is common to man—which one of ourselves has at some time or another trampled in the dust. Your fears are of ghosts. When you find their substances they will be shorn of their terrors. If you look forward, look forward to victory. Conquest of trouble and sin is the right, and the duty of man.

And if you say, "I cannot get courage," I answer—that Courage is a matter of habit, and that you can gain the habit by meeting the actual dangers and troubles of the present in an honest, human, and loving manner, with faith in God, and faith in yourself. The man who masters fear in present difficulties, soon learns to master the impalpable forms of fear which he imagines in the future. "Let come what will," he says, "I will meet it boldly in the fear of God and with the courage of God's child." But he must learn that courage by facing danger or trouble in the present. And he cannot do that if his thoughts are always away from the present in fears of the future. He is then always outside the place where alone the habit of courage can be gained.

Think, if you want encouragement, how Christ met the fears of the future. When half his ministry had passed by, his early hopes of the result of his work had not only been disappointed. They had gone; and he looked forward only to suffering and death. His New Year, when it came, seemed dark as starless night. But he put aside all dread, for the sake of doing with courage and steadfastness the work that each day laid before him. Often he failed to win what he desired, but he gained more and more courage, of faith in his Father, of faith in himself. And so it was, when the hour came that he had foreseen, and he met the whole wrath of the Jewish world, the courage of the future did not fail him. We are told that he steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem. Take his heart into yours. Say to yourself, when you look forward in fear, "Why are you fearful—O ye of little faith."

(iii.) The third thing to say about the uncertainty of the future is this: "There may be an advantage in it. I will find that and wring it out of the disadvantages." There is such an advantage. It is to the uncertainty of life that we owe our escape from monotony and dulness of feeling. If we knew what would happen, or even if we knew its main outlines of pleasures and pains, we should lose interest in being and becoming. And the loss of this interest would make us slothful, and out of sloth would grow the intolerable grief of apathy; not incapability of dull pleasure or dull pain, but powerlessness to double pleasure by imagination and to change pain into strength of character. The incessant goad which the uncertainty of life drives into us is one of the active causes of our progress; of the eagerness of our wandering; of the wakefulness of our imagination; of the continual movement of the soul in thought and feeling. We are not fit as yet to be left to certainty. That time is yet far away, even from the best of us. At this point, our humanity, after centuries of growth, is as uneducated as a little child.

Half the dramatic clash and movement of life is held in the ignorance of the future that besets us. Were not life a drama in which the first act does not know the second, and even the beginning of the fifth does not know the end, we should not live it with eagerness nor do our part with passion. And if we cannot live eagerly and have no passion, even no interest in what we think and speak, in what we do and love, we are not worthy of the high vocation to which we are called. We might as well be a piece of protoplasm unconsciously contracting and expanding with immoderate slowness at the bottom of an immeasurable ocean. It is the honourable right of a man, it is one of his bravest capacities, to take the ignorance of the future and its uncertainty, which at first sight seems his greatest disadvantage, and to say with cheerful audacity: "This is my chief advantage, and if it is not so, I will make it so."

This, in the three-fold form I have put it, is the temper in which we may, with truth and vigour, face the coming year.

II.

There is one thing then which, amid all this uncertainty, we can make certain. It is the temper of our own soul. We can assure ourselves within of fortitude and courage, of patience and love, of the true grounds of joy, of the grasp of right, just and beautiful things. We can make the condition of our soul certain. But then, are we sufficient for all we have to meet? There are sufferings so great, loneliness so overwhelming, temptations so strong, joys so ravishing, hours of fear and danger so dreadful, that the strongest, we know, have broken before them—the best have gone out like a candle in the wind Is the human soul self-sufficing? Can it conquer alone? Was it made to conquer wholly in its own strength?

Some have thought so; many think so now. And, indeed, much has been done by it and apparently by it alone, and men say, "No need of God or any spiritual help. I can overcome trouble and difficulty in my own strength." And when they have overcome they think they have done it all by themselves. I do not think that the soul is ever alone. The work it does, in the ways of which I have spoken, is done because it is united by a tie which never can be broken, with the moral Power of God; with the destiny it has eternally with God; with the incessant inspiration of God, driving us out of the material into the spiritual. It is not only Human Nature which is fighting its way; it is Human Nature, filled and driven by the Divine Nature, and moving by that force into its higher and stronger life which is to come. The man who does not know that, or believe it, is yet traversed by that power, and acts by it, as well as by his own. But he is weaker in life by his ignorance of the Divine in him, as he would be indefinitely stronger by his conscious knowledge of it. All, then, that I have urged upon you, from the merely human, even from the unreligious point of view, is tenfold more in your power when it is taken up and done with faith in God and with the powers which are derived from that faith. That temper of the soul which may be made certain, is certain to be made when the soul knows God and loves Him and lives among its fellows in and through that love. When the powers of God, which are the noble faiths and hopes which the soul possesses in possessing God, and the noble love within which the soul possesses through union with Eternal Love—when these are consciously possessed and used, rejoiced in and known to be eternal, fear of the future vanishes for ever! The consideration of the future brings with it no care, and the advantage of uncertainty is freed from its disadvantages. To the moral temper of the soul, add then, if you would live nobly in the year to come, the lofty certainty of victory over the temptations of the world, over the suffering of life, and over death, which is the sure result of the great faiths of Christ—those faiths which are the powers and joys of Time and Eternity. This is to add the Christian to the moral temper of the soul. Take with you, as you look forward into the unknown, faith in a Father who loves us, and who will never leave us or forsake us, till we are wholly at one with His righteousness and with His love. If that be our end, if that be the one unalterable certainty, if we know it to be true with every force of the soul, what can the future hold to make us fear or to cause us care? We may pass through deep waters, but we are sure to stand victorious on the other side of them. We may have desperate battles to fight, fierce pain to endure, but even while we strike like men in a forlorn hope, or lie wounded on the stricken field of life, we know that these things are needful for the final close of joy and peace, and that our strife and suffering either build our character into the divine powers of the eternal world, or are used to build others up into union with the Father. For, indeed, it is not only of our own perfection that we think, if we have faith in the Father. He is our Father, and not only my Father. We think not only of ourselves, but of all mankind in Him, and then we cry with joy, "Sacrifice me, my God, if my brothers need my pain."

This is the faith which conquers the future. Right through the deepest darkness it makes a shaft of light, and when we stand at last in death on the verge of a greater unknown than this year, into which in days gone by when we looked we saw nothing but a tumbled darkness, it is an ocean of ineffable light, and above it shines the Fatherhood of God, pouring forth the sunlight of righteousness, and sailing on its waters, which are the deep wisdom of God, millions of rejoicing spirits that, breathing the air of Eternal Love, are for ever at peace in the radiant activities of thought and love. This is the life we live in Christ, here and in the world to come. And it is a certainty, in which brooding care and degrading fear are utterly destroyed. When we have it, life here is not dwarfed, as some say, nor made inactive, but it is glorified. It is made a constituent part of an endless life. Its deepest realities, its real work, are exalted, purified, inflamed and empowered, but its petty cares and sorrows, its selfish thoughts and evil passions, its fears, temptations, and the transient and mean in it—these, indeed, are dwarfed; their power to spoil our life is taken away, their power to corrupt our soul is overthrown. The good in life is made greater, the evil in life is lessened, and finally is felt within, and attacks from without, no more.

Then take also with you, for your life through the year among women and men, the love of Jesus Christ; the love of him in your hearts because he loved so well; and the love which he bore to all, so rooted and grounded in your spirit that your life with your fellowmen will be at one with the love of Jesus to his people. Then, at least, all things will be right with you. If you love your fellows, as Jesus loved the world, you need have no anxiety about the result of your life upon mankind, or on the whole progress of the world. Love never fails to do its saving work. When you give and bless, your life is absolutely certain to be useful and good, comforting and exalting; and that is the great matter. That being assured, we can face life and death with peace. Love, then, the life and grace of Jesus. Live his love in and out among men, and the uncertainty of life is changed into certainty—but oh, take care that it is Love you live and not one of its false images, such as, in the name of Christ, will not eat with the sinner, or consort with the heretic. This, then, amid the uncertainty of life, can be made sure. We can be sure of blessing the world if we love it as Jesus loved it.

But then, lastly, and it is wise to say this, lest we should think that earthly success and absence from pain are also secured by faith, courage and loving, we must also share in the trouble and suffering of Jesus. We cannot live for love alone, without setting against us those powers in the world which are selfish and which despise and hate self-forgetfulness. We cannot live courageously for truth, justice and honesty, without attack from those who stand up for lies, injustice and dishonesty. We cannot oppose the spirit of the world without running the risk of being set upon as an enemy of society. So, make up your mind also for a certain amount of tribulation. That also is certain. But the tribulation will mean the love of God the Father, and it will earn for you the love of mankind. And in it you will be at one with Christ Jesus, and as his sorrow has saved men, so will yours. It may be hard for flesh and blood to bear, but the knowledge that you are with God and Christ and humanity, living for them and dying for them, will set you through all trouble and pain with the glow of an inward triumph. Below the tribulation there will be eternal peace and perfect joy. To live with Jesus is the conquest of life. Well did St. Paul know that. "Who shall separate us"—he cried, in his hour of uplifted aspiration, and with absolute certainty of conquest—"who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us."

It is well for you to take his cry with you throughout this year. Then you may look into the depth of darkness, and light will always go with you. And even though at death it may seem for a moment as if a dread figure surged on you out of the mist and cried "Go no further, there is no light anywhere," you will recover from the instant of doubt and say, with light in your eyes, "I go to the Father. I lose and find myself in eternal Light."

LITERATURE.

EVERY year thousands of people break a railway journey at York and spend half a day or a couple of hours in its Minster, on its walls and amongst its Abbey ruins and quaint old business streets. For most people who know York at all, the town consists of such objects of antiquarian interest and, perhaps—the cocoa works. And is there anyone to whom the memory of these things—even of the last named—does not bring a preponderance of pleasant thoughts? But York contains much else, of which only the most prying visitor or the resident gets any glimpse. York has its Whitechapel, a considerable street running through a neighbourhood where the poor are very poor and densely massed. No one can go the length of Walmgate without perceiving that this is the general condition of the surrounding population. And not only here, but also in other parts of the old city within the walls, one soon discovers sordid by-ways and narrow shut-in courts. Nowhere, I think, have I been so often reminded of the notorious Edinburgh "Closes."

But it is one thing to know in a general way that much poverty exists; it is quite another thing to be asked to behold a presentment of it which is exact, summary and vivid. How subtly do certain thoughts and sentiments soothe our consciences in this matter, disinclining us even to seek a knowledge of the whole reality. "What can one person do in so great a problem? Is he not practically helpless? And perhaps, after all, things are not so bad as they look. To be sure the case of A. B. is most sad and pitiable—and C. D. and E. F. and others—but it is to be hoped that such cases are quite exceptional. Any way, it's no use thinking too much upon the subject. One must, of course, give all the help one can as occasion arises; but for the rest it is surely our duty not to brood unduly over evils which are perhaps to a large extent inevitable."

This is the attitude into which even the most kindly-hearted people may easily be led. And it explains why so many are lavish of charity when their feelings are awakened by particular appeals, but suspect and dread and blindly resist every general movement among the poor themselves for bettering their condition. And such movements are themselves too often led by the half-blind—by men who know the extent of the suffering they desire to remove, but only partly understand its causes, and therefore bitterly and enviously imagine that all who oppose them have only one purpose—namely, to secure themselves in wealth and ease. The first and most essential condition of a broader view and a steadier courage on either hand is an ample knowledge of the facts. Impulsive charity and impulsive hate have long fed upon ignorance, while they have barely fed the hungry; and they will long continue to do so. But irresistibly the scientific spirit is asserting itself among people of all classes who are grappling with the problem of poverty. It is being increasingly realised that the social reformer must proceed upon the method of the physician. He must not imagine that he can cure a disease of the social body by a display of sentiment or passion. He must study its precise nature and the extent of its ravages. His remedial measures must be scrupulously directed by knowledge; they must be regarded as experimental where knowledge is imperfect; they must be constantly tested by observed results.

The most imposing example of the application of this method to poverty is the series of volumes on London, edited by Mr. Charles Booth. At the end of his first volume Mr. Booth wrote (p. 592, 3rd edition):—

> It will be observed that our attempt has in the main been confined to showing how things are. Little is said as to how they come to be as they are, or whither they are tending. The line of inquiry which we have neglected is perhaps more interesting than that which we have taken up, and is certainly more commonly adopted.

We now have a volume on York written in precisely the same spirit, and in order to commend Mr. Seebohm Rowntree's work it is almost sufficient to say that Mr. Booth has spoken of it as "your most valuable inquiry" (p. 300). For the general reader Mr. Rowntree's book has, by the nature of the case, an advantage over Mr. Booth's; and it is to be hoped that many will study it who have not ventured upon the larger undertaking. Dealing with a moderate-sized town, it is brief and compact (being less than one of Mr. Booth's volumes), and yet it illustrates the ordinary life of the working-classes in all its aspects. And to this must be added that, in order to present statistical facts in telling ways, lavish use has been made of graphic methods. In no point has expense been spared which could help to make an economic and social inquiry attractive.

It would be impossible in such a notice as this to describe or discuss the contents of the book in detail, and it must suffice to mention one or two features.

1. I have been much impressed by the comprehensiveness and minuteness of the inquiry. To take a few examples: "With a view to seeing how far the evil effects of overcrowding in the bedroom are in practice lessened by ample ventilation, an examination was made of 2,480 houses in working-class districts on the night of Wednesday, Sept. 12, 1900, between 11 P.M. and 2 A.M., and the number of those with window or windows open counted. The outside temperature was 50° Fahrenheit" (p. 175). The results are tabulated in three classes according to the style of house; the total number having windows open being 124. On pp. 313-326 there is an account of observations made of three public-houses with a view to ascertain how many persons entered daily and at each hour of the day, and the proportions of men and women and children, and other details. The patience and vigilance required in such work may be imagined. Sometimes one person dictated while the other recorded the observations in shorthand.

Again, 1,919 children in elementary schools were weighed and measured with a view to determine the effect of poverty on general physique. The children were divided into three classes, according to home circumstances, and such facts as the following appeared:—"The average height of the boys when they leave school at 13 is less by $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches in the poorest section than in section 3." "The weights of the boys in the poorest section are, throughout, considerably below those in section 3. By the time they reach 13 years of age, when they are leaving school to go to work, this difference in weight is no less than 11 pound" (pp. 211, 212). With reference to this matter it is impossible to praise too highly the careful inquiry, the results of which are summarised in a chapter on "Family Budgets."

Lastly Mr. Rowntree has made at least one important advance upon Mr. Booth's method. He has distinguished between "primary" and "secondary" poverty—"primary" being due solely to inadequacy of income for merely physical efficiency, "secondary" to wasteful expenditure of income otherwise adequate for that standard. The value of this distinction is obvious; but the labour required to carry it out can only be guessed.

2. As regards general results Mr. Rowntree has himself been surprised by the conclusions his inquiry has forced upon him, and his readers will share this feeling. The number of persons in York living in "primary" poverty is found to be 7,230, or 10 per cent. of the population, and the number in "secondary" poverty 13,072, or 17·93 per cent. of the population. The old North capital shows a total less than 3 per cent. below that of London itself. Mr. Charles Booth had "long thought that other cities, if similarly tested, would show a percentage of poverty not differing greatly from that existing in London." The fact that Mr. Rowntree's book confirms this fear makes it the more significant, for there seems no reason to regard York as an exceptional town. It may be that the number of old and insanitary houses is unusually great. The condition of many of them is certainly appalling, and York has slums as bad as the worst in London. But, on the other hand, the city has no trades classed as dangerous, and there is little smoke and plenty of fresh air. So that, on the whole, Mr. Rowntree's estimate of the amount of poverty must be allowed a wide application. For this reason, and because it is a model of thorough method in social investigation, the book has a national as well as local importance. Such a handbook of facts should be a first text-book of the social reformer. Moreover, no kind of book is so well calculated to spread the spirit of social reform without inflaming the passions and darkening counsel by words without knowledge.

OBITUARY.

MRS. FARQUHARSON, ABERDEEN.

JUST upon the dawn of Christmas, there passed away suddenly the last of the members of the Aberdeen congregation who was present at the opening of the church in 1840—Mrs. Farquharson, of West View, Spital (mother of the Rev. Alexander Farquharson). In the summer of this year she had a serious illness, but recovered, and seemed in fairly sound health. She was busy with household duties when the death summons came; but the swift stroke was final, and before the members of her family, who were in the house, could realise its fatalness, life was gone.

Referring to her death on Sunday last, the Rev. Alexander Webster said:—"In speaking of Mrs. Farquharson as dead, I have a very special sorrow. She seemed so much a part of this church that her decease is like the dissolution of a portion of its foundation. Her connection with the church dated from its erection. Indeed, her memory went beyond this building to the meeting place occupied by the congregation ere the church was raised. Her faithfulness to the church was thorough. She grew up in it and loved it fervently. Though weighted with family cares, she never failed, when well, to be in her place as a worshipper. The Sunday service was part of her life which she cherished and enjoyed. A rare exemplary woman she was in her steadfast, sympathetic attachment, having in her conscience the integrity which sustains a despised and suffering cause. I say only the simple truth when I call her an heroic woman, one of the most admirable type, courageous under trial, bold for her convictions, yet tender-hearted and self-denying. She earned her rest, and the call to it came with a swift and quiet mercy."

THE December number completes the fourth volume of Present Day Papers—which we trust our notes from time to time have shown is a most helpful publication—"A Monthly Review for the discussion of Modern Thought and its application to Christian faith and practice." The first number of the new volume is to be published on Jan. 15, and it is hoped that early numbers will contain papers by Dr. Rufus M. Jones, of Haverford, U.S.A., on the "Philosophy of Quakerism," and by E. Grubb, M.A., on the "Problem of Competition." It is proposed to replace the single monthly review by an article in each number on current books and work. Present Day Papers may be seen in the book-room at Essex Hall. They are published by Headley Bros. 6d. net, monthly.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From a sermon of John Hamilton Thom's, reprinted in "A Minister of God."

"He, being dead, yet speaketh."

No religious faith can mightily prosper until, by the power and loveliness of its natural fruits and the fuller lights and streams of perfection in which it reveals God, it awakens men to a completer sense than they possessed before of spiritual beauty and good. Have we not turned our very strength into weakness, and in our character of earnest and devout inquirers, strong in the faith that God and His truth were with us, too serenely awaited the result, forgetting that the only light which God makes victorious is the light that warms, the light of life and sacrifice? I blame not the holy men that have gone before us, our fathers in this faith—the lachets of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose. Like the Baptist, they did what was given them to do, and wisdom is justified of all her children. Nay, it is not for me to blame any one; it may be that we are what we are in unaffected honesty, and that God has not hitherto called us to higher work. But I should, indeed, despair if we did not look and pray for something better—if we did not live on the belief that God's mightiest agents are yet in reserve—not in the cogency of convincing arguments, but in the incalculable spiritual force which streams from the inspired lives of devoted men. When the fulness of time is come, He will send forth the spirits which the times require. When the word can be spoken with effect, the needed servants of the Most High will appear to speak it.

Even now one often thinks, such is the confusion of our religious things, so manifestly are our old systems showing their insufficiency, and the broad lights of Heaven streaming through the earthly chinks, that a word spoken with power ought to shake them down—that any clear utterance of spiritual truth forcible enough to make the nation hear it, would render impossible any longer continuance of all that unreal religion which has St. Paul's mark of carnality upon it—that it makes strifes and divisions.

But the time is not yet ripe, though ripening. We at least do not seem elected to that service. Perhaps our trial is—and it is a trial that might develop in us noble spiritual virtues—that, like the Prophetess of old, we are so placed that our message is not listened to; that it must be spoken by other lips than ours before the world will hear it. It may not be altogether our fault that our Truth has not burned with such conspicuous fire of life as to consume around it the wood and hay and stubble. I rather thank God that at least we have simulated nothing; that in circumstances of peculiar temptation to forsake our simplicity, to stretch forth our hand to something that was not yet ours, our outward expression has ever been rather under than above our actual temperature. We have borne patiently the reproach of coldness, rather than assume heat. In an age of religious excitement and exaggeration, in the midst of coarse vehemence, of sensuous appeals, of theatric eloquence, of exhibitory worship, we have refused to go beyond the words of truth and soberness that were natural to us. They may have been weak and poor: they were, at least, real. We have been called lifeless. I claim for us the distinction of being, at least, simple and sincere. Let us abide by that holy reality. Let us not use so much as a tone of the voice, in emphasis on a word, beyond the truth of feeling. These, perhaps, are the directions and preparations of heart that the Spirit will not disdain. But God forbid that we should be satisfied with what we are—that our words and deeds should seem to ourselves enough for the conversion of the world! God forbid that we should even be surprised at our want of success!

We cannot, indeed, make ourselves mighty servants and prophets of the Most High; we cannot snatch at, or work ourselves up to, that personal fervour which is given from above—but we can know our need and our place; we can pray for that which we have not; we can discern, if we are earnest and look upwards, the kind of men that must come to speak and to live; and we can prepare for the rising up, perhaps, from amongst us, in due time, of some nurtured in holy simplicity, upon whom the Spirit that bloweth where it listeth may list to breathe. Let us despise or discard nothing that we have hitherto valued—calmness, quietness, simplicity, learning, knowledge, exact thought, clear understandings and sound minds—but let us value them chiefly as preparations for the reception and transmission of God's Spirit, so that when it comes to us it may find in us nothing to corrupt, or impede, or turn aside the purity of its light; and let us not despair, nor be impatient of God's slowness. He is waiting for the time and seasons; and when Christianity is once again worthily represented in living men, there will be found multitudes and multitudes of souls, now perhaps out of all visible communion with the Churches, who will start at their word—multitudes on multitudes with whom all those powers and obstacles which we find so repressive—habitual fear and regard for the world's opinion, social temptations, early prejudice, fashion, orthodoxy, priesthoods—have not a breath of influence; who will render themselves up to any who will send life into their spiritual nature, who will fill them with serene sentiments to take away their weary degradation and ennoble their being,—to any who will show them their God.

Let us hold fast by the realities that are given to us—not eager for ourselves, nor troubled that a more conspicuous work is not given to us to do—that, after so many years of preparing the soil and sowing the seed, others seem to be coming in to reap our harvest. We deserve to lose it all, if we ever sought it for self-glory. And the hidden stones of the Temple, far away out of sight, are of those that could least be spared. In His own time God will send the agents that His Kingdom needs. It may not be ours to raise the Church of the Future—but nothing now can destroy the history of the Past; that to us for many a day, in loyalty to the spirit of Truth and the spirit of Liberty, God committed the holy privilege of preserving and honouring the seed of that Tree of Life beneath whose ever-spreading branches all people shall rest.

MINISTERS' SUPERANNUATION FUND.

THE Committee have great satisfaction in announcing that the contributions to the Capital Fund now exceed £20,500. They desire to offer to the donors, whose generosity has secured this important result, their warmest thanks for the promptitude and liberality of the response to their appeal. All parts of the United Kingdom have united, from Aberdeen to Exeter, from Dover to Cardiff and Belfast. Again and again have the givers accompanied their gifts with expressions of affectionate regard for the ministry, which convince the Committee that ministers never stood higher in the esteem and respect of the churches than they do to-day. Larger sums have been raised amongst us, but probably never before has the interest been so widespread, or the enterprise been supported by so great a number.

The Committee earnestly hope that the present effort will not cease. There are still many churches from which no contributions have yet been made, and it is very desirable that all should take some part, however modest, in this common effort. Every additional £100 increases the stability of the Fund for the future, and adds to its power to meet the growing demands that will by and by be made upon it from year to year. But, further, a margin of income will enable the Committee to offer to elder men a larger measure of help. Any new scheme must inevitably exclude some whose circumstances prevent them from taking advantage of it. In this case, the accident of age renders the premiums too high for men of forty-five or fifty, even with the full grant of £10. The Committee would greatly rejoice if the liberality of the churches should give them the means to extend this maximum to £15 in the case of men who have never had the opportunity of entering on the scheme at the lower rates.

Besides the capital now promised, the Committee further asked for subscriptions to the amount of £300 a year. This sum also is nearly achieved, as the annual subscriptions now reach £280. It will be noticed, however, that some of these contributions are of quite unusual magnitude, and the Committee hope that a larger element of security may be imparted to the list by an increase in the number of Congregational subscriptions. By this means a congregation may practically insure a minister, and thus extend the usefulness of the Fund.

A meeting of donors and subscribers will be summoned as soon as the money is collected, to appoint trustees to hold it, to elect managers, and adopt a definite constitution and rules for the administration of the Fund.

DR. WILLIAM SMYTH MEMORIAL FUND.—The Rev. C. J. Street further acknowledges with thanks the following donations:—Cairo-street Chapel, Warrington; per the Rev. E. W. Lummis, £5; A. P., 5s.; Mrs. R. C. Jones, £1 1s.; Mrs. Jevons, £1 1s.; total £93 16s. 6d. The fund has now exceeded £4,500.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Sowing and Reaping.

LONG, long ago, when prairies and forests spread westward over North America, and only a fringe of land, bordering the Atlantic ocean, was cultivated, in parts, by the settlers who had made their homes in that new world, a stranger youth came travelling to those scattered farmsteads, asking for the gift of fruit seeds, which he wanted to carry with him to sow in the desolate, waste lands. The settlers gave him the seeds he asked for, and, with good-natured raillery, called him "Johnny Appleseed." It is recorded that the solitary traveller, with his light burden of seeds, pursued his journey, sailing, for the most part, in a canoe down the broad rivers, and whenever he came to a sunny, open patch in the forests, he landed, planted his seeds, and protected the spot with a brush fence.

Many years afterwards, when pioneer settlers began to make their way westward, they found numbers of these inclosures of fruit laden trees by which they built their log huts, and we are told that whole States owe some of their wealth of orchards to that brave young seed-sower.

This is a fitting story for the New Year, when we are thinking of the days that lie unspent before us, and are making fresh resolutions. For we are all sowers; but the seeds we sow are the words and deeds which we scatter every day, often without thought; and yet a harvest will surely spring up from them. Do we not know what influence a kind word has, and how cross tempers and rough speeches seem to take the sunshine out of the brightest day? There is another thing we know, too: how fast a bad example will spread, and, on the contrary, how great a power even one voice is that says "no" to what is wrong, and even one will that keeps firm to the right.

Home and school are the plots where boys and girls sow their seed. They are sowing good seed when they speak the truth bravely, when they are tender and gentle to the little ones, when they learn hard lessons thoroughly, when they are ready to help other people, when they try to stop quarrels and make peace, when they are blessings to father and mother. And what about the bad seed we sow? Ah! we all know well when we sow that.

I have read how a boy, used to life in a town, went for a holiday into the country, and ran out among the hills, shouting in his joy. When the echo answered he was at first astonished, but soon became angry, and he heard his own passionate words repeated, as he supposed, by some rude person hidden from his sight. His wiser mother smiled when she heard his tale. "Go out and shout some kind greetings now," said she. Then all was right, for only kind words replied. And we may apply this story to the world of people we live in: kindness begets kindness. If we are courteous and gentle we meet with like treatment in return. Let us bear this in mind as we think of the seed we are going to sow. And it is true not only of boys and girls, but of men and women, and of the dealings of one nation with another, all the world over.

After the Crimean war had come to an end the peasants of Finland sat in their ruined homes, which the British gunboats had helped to destroy, threatened with famine and filled with bitter thoughts of the enemy who had wrought such havoc in their land. But this state of feeling was all changed in a few months. Winter came. When the first snow was falling on the bleak coasts of the Baltic sea, and those hard times for the Finns were growing harder, a vessel came sailing from England, in the track the battle-ships had followed, laden with stores of food, with new boats and nets for the fishermen, and wood and tools to roof the shattered cabins. Straightway, in return for these signs of goodwill came a hearty response from the poor grateful peasants. Kindness wakened an echo in their hearts. "To Finland's sorrow the sweet amend is made," the old enmity is forgotten, and the Finns looked upon the English as brothers.

Think in this year that lies before us what good seeds we may sow each day. Not only grown-up people, but boys and girls also, have so many chances to make the world a little brighter, and better, and happier, because of the good seeds they sow. God sends the kind thought into our hearts, the promptings to help other people, and we must listen to His whispers and obey them. Shall we not try to spread a peaceable spirit abroad among our companions, and to make sunshine wherever we go? See how a rough word calls forth a rude reply, and how a soft answer turns away wrath. We reap as we sow.

Eastern people are fond of parables, and a little story, with a wise meaning in it, comes to us from the East. A man gave a sack of corn to his friend, and, in course of time, asked him what he had done with the corn. "Come and see," was the answer. The two men went together till they came to a field, golden with waving wheat. There was the harvest of the grain the man had sown. And thus with the seed we sow. The words we say, the deeds we do, and the examples we set to those who are younger than ourselves, all go to make up the sort of lives we lead and the characters that are forming within us. These are the harvests we reap. A new year is opening before us. Every day we are sowing seeds of some kind. Shall they be good seeds, or bad? Will the harvests we reap be like precious golden wheat, or like harmful weeds and tares?

"Sow love, and taste its fruitage pure;
Sow peace, and reap its harvest bright;
Sow sunbeams on the rock and moor,
And find a harvest home of light."

FRANCES E. COOKE.

WE quoted last week a pleasant letter received by Mr. W. H. Shrubsole from the President of the Budapest Branch of the Carpathian Society, who is also Vice-President of the Hungarian House of Commons, and we have received from Mr. Shrubsole a further proof of the very cordial feelings which subsist between the people of Hungary and of this country. This is a cordial letter from Mr. Koloman de Szell, the Hungarian Prime Minister, in response to a message of goodwill to the Hungarian people recently sent from a large gathering of South Londoners at the Royal Victoria Hall.

IN HIS STRENGTH.

ANOTHER year of service, of fresh opportunities, of happy fellowship with those who will not be content with base things and low endeavours, but desire to consecrate their lives to the Highest! Happy the coming days may be, though veiled as yet from our sight, hiding from us what of good or ill they may have in store—happy already in the one sure conviction, that they may be lived bravely and faithfully in His strength.

Here, in the hidden union of the friends who read this paper, we are gathered on the threshold of the New Year, friends near and distant, many in the close fellowship of our churches, many also in other lands and in solitary places where of congenial religious companionship there is little or none, yet all together, a great company of friends, who eat of one bread, the daily bread which is from GOD, and know that even in the most solitary place they are not alone, because the FATHER also is there, and even in the loneliest outpost of duty each one still belongs to the great brotherhood.

One in the freedom of the Truth,
One in the joy of paths untrod,
One in the soul's perennial youth,
One in the larger thought of God—

The freer step, the fuller breath,
The wide horizon's grander view,
The sense of life that knows no death—
The Life that maketh all things new!

In His strength we will go forward, trusting always that He will give us daily bread—the bread of life, which is in His truth, of which the strength is in eternal righteousness, to which is added the abundance of His blessing, in all the glory and beauty of His works and the supreme gift of love.

What shall we make of this new year? What can THE INQUIRER do to help? It can be a true bond of union, of fellowship in the deep things of the spirit, a true organ of the religious life of our people. It can be a messenger of good tidings among the churches, and further afield, even to the most distant and solitary, telling of things hoped for, of good work undertaken and accomplished, offering an opportunity for the interchange of thought, the sharing of wise counsel, the kindling of fresh aspiration and unconquerable faith. It can keep in touch with good books, and help to make the world's supreme books more real in this living present, bringing fresh light for the interpretation of our Bible, and fresh insight to draw the lives of our greatest into closer communion with the hungering and aspiring life of to-day. It can help to bear the heavy burdens of our time, showing the evil things in their ugliness, and that which is good in its beauty and strength, clearing the way for effectual progress, to do away with wrongs and oppression, overcoming evil with good. It can prove itself always on the side of courage and determined self-sacrifice, and have a part in the great work for the Kingdom of GOD on earth.

Such a mission THE INQUIRER would gladly fulfil, but it is possible only through the loyal help of many friends. For sixty years it has patiently and steadfastly striven to uphold the torch of truth, to maintain the principle of spiritual freedom, to minister to the sustenance of healthy religious life; and now for this new year it appeals to the wide circle of its friends, to make the best of a great opportunity, not to allow its testimony to be enfeebled, but, having fitted it amply for such high service, to see to it that the way is opened for the rendering of that service in a wider field and in fuller measure than ever before.

A PSALM OF TRUST.

I LITTLE see, I little know,
Yet can I fear no ill:
He who hath guided me till now
Will be my leader still.

No burden yet was on me laid
Of trouble or of care,
But He my trembling step hath stayed,
And given me strength to bear.

I came not hither of my will
Or wisdom of mine own:
That higher Power upholds me still,
And still must bear me on.

I knew not of this wondrous earth,
Nor dreamed what blessings lay
Beyond the gates of human birth
To glad my future way.

And what beyond this life may be
As little I divine,—
What love may wait to welcome me,
What fellowships be mine.

I know not what beyond may lie,
But look, in humble faith,
Into a larger life to die,
And find new birth in death.

He will not leave my soul forlorn;
I still must find Him true,
Whose mercies have been new each morn
And every evening new.

Upon His providence I lean,
As lean in faith I must:
The lesson of my life hath been
A heart of grateful trust.

And so my onward way I fare
With happy heart and calm,
And mingle with my daily care
The music of my psalm.

FREDERICK L. HOSMER.

A NEW YEAR'S HOMILY.

WE have wished for each other, we have wished for our kindred and friends, brightness and welfare in the year that has just begun. With inextinguishable hope we lay aside the remembrance of past care or grief or shame, and turn our faces towards the unknown future. And yet there is an aspect of things which cannot be entirely shut out from our view. That counsel of an elder time, "Thou, therefore, endure hardness"—if we had written these words across our cards as they were borne from one home of comfort and ease to another, should we have felt that we had destroyed the significance of our greetings or impaired their sincerity? I do not think so. We might have struck a deeper note than common custom warrants; we might have awakened mirth in the thoughtless, or surprise among the tranquil and secure; but we should not have been false to the profounder truth of life.

If we repeat this summons to the young, for instance, does it loom vaguely before them like a dull shadow lowering over the prospect of beauty, love, and joy? Does it rob the sunshine of its glory, or the fireside circle of its peace, or take from the far-stretching prospect of the future its infinite suggestiveness of delight? Assuredly not. But it is a warning that all powers and opportunities come to us not by way of right but of trust; they are gifts of grace, not rewards of merit; and circumstance confers on us no title to complain if they are suddenly withdrawn from our grasp. Nor is that all; it has a further meaning. For the way of excellence can never be easy; we can never attain proficiency without effort, or skill without practice, or mastery in any sphere save by strenuous toil. Ask the successful student whence comes his grasp of knowledge, his insight into history, his power to deal with Nature; he will tell you that it is the result of years of unremitting work, in which each step must be established before the next advance. Ask the draughtsman for the secret of his ease of line, the painter for the mystery of his colouring, the musician for the charm of his touch; they will declare these are no heaven-conferred endowments, they have not descended out of the infinite upon folded hands, they have been won—in virtue, indeed, of the primal bounty of Nature—with ceaseless persistence and endeavours that never tired. These, too, have had their seasons of disappointment. For them sometimes expectation has been frustrated and achievement spoiled, just as it reached the top of its completeness, but the vision of truth or beauty has led them steadily on. As the world opened before them they have seen a richer loveliness in its myriad hues, and caught a deeper harmony beneath its dissonant cries. They have endured hardness, but their endurance has not been only the needful preliminary, the indispensable condition, it has been joy itself in the making—joy in the slow increase of power, joy in the exercise of energy, joy in the consciousness of progress, joy in the enlargement of hope, joy in advance towards attainment, so that even those who are bruised with defeat and chastened with failure may still say "Though we aimed high, and were not counted worthy of the highest, we have still the blessedness that we have seen and striven."

In our maturer experience, perhaps, we are more conscious of the difficulty, and less of the satisfaction in overcoming it. There are cares which beset us individually, in our own personal self-discipline; there are anxieties which arise in the larger life which we share with the community around us; and the summons to "endure hardness" does not so obviously justify itself, or fulfil so rapidly the promise it implicitly contains. We are sometimes discouraged at our slow progress in Christian grace. Our character seems to have become set, and our temper stiff. We have come to terms with some fault that we cannot master. We have grown accustomed to some restlessness that we cannot tame to peace. We have settled down under some grief which will never cease to numb our faculties and dull our hopes. We have fitted our back to some burden, and we do not purpose to try to fling it off; but we do not pretend that it is pleasant. We say to ourselves roughly that we will have no illusions in the matter; we will know the worst and face it; but we do not see that it can in any way minister to our strength; it is as much as can be expected of us if we accept the inevitable without complaint. In such a temper we look with impatience at the larger struggles in the world around us. We resent their difficulties. We shrink from the intellectual labour needful for clear and reasoned views; we are unwilling to face issues which require vigour of moral resolve. We play with ideas and suggest remedies, to which future generations may give effect, taking an immoral comfort from the thought that these changes will not arrive in our day; possession is for the present, sacrifice for the future; let those who come after us be prepared for the great surrender. Or, on a higher plane, we suffer ourselves to be disheartened because the forces of evil around us are mightier than we know how to overcome, and by our inaction we suffer the cause entrusted to us to sink into weakness and gloom.

If any of us have been conscious during the past year of this mood, or feel, as we look forward, that it lies even unacknowledged in the background of our hearts, let us say to ourselves, "Endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." There is the symbol of our warfare and our trust. It is a warfare in which we are no more alone, but realise that in all high service of man God himself condescends to give worth to our endeavours. For "in his will is our peace"; and for each one of us personally the will of God is to be found in the conditions of our own being; in the gifts and opportunities entrusted to us; in the restraints laid upon us as in the energies imparted to us; in the limitations of faculty and insight, as well as the affections that invite us, the ideals that claim us, the summons to duty and to love that sounds unchangeably within our souls. To learn to recognise this call at a moment's notice amid the multitudinous voices of the world, to obey it with alacrity and steadfastness, is the first demand of the Christian service. But no man triumphs or fails for himself alone. To right and left of us, in front and rear, are our comrades, the veteran of a hundred fights and the youth who sees the real warfare for the first time. The victory of the whole is committed to each; he bears in his own person a responsibility for all. Are you weary in your service? Bethink you of the faltering brother who leans upon your strength. Are you tempted to be discontented or mutinous? Know that the timid take courage because you are there. Do you seek an opportunity to drop out of the ranks? Forbear and hold your ground, for among the loiterers panic spreads with fatal speed. In the world we must have tribulation. But by faith we also live in that pure land where we hear Religion say, "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world."

"THE THINGS WHICH ARE REVEALED."

IT is well at the junctions of life's journey to distinguish how much of what lies ahead is hidden from us, and how much is open to our view. The coming time has its secrets. The forms in which Circumstance will approach, its specific alternations veil themselves, being among the secret things that belong unto the Lord our God. But the stage on which they are to appear, the light whence feature and character will be given them, wait for no disclosure. For these are our personal spirits, where consciousness of independence over against Circumstance lies in the possession of the things that are revealed. What the menacing hours may essay to make of us none knows, but what we are to wring from them, if we are to remain 'we,' is not concealed, but belongs unto us and to our children for ever.

It is scarcely true to speak of the future as though it were unbroken ground. We shall be travelling where others have travelled. The year which is opening is not so much virgin soil, we have not to make the road. The road is made, it is worn with the innumerable feet of wayfarers who have gone before. The common ills that flesh is heir to, the common happinesses incident to mortals, will come to us as to those who preceded us. No event which we may imagine as possible to visit us has not already happened to thousands of our fellow-men. It is not new country which we are about to open up and explore, previously untrodden by the feet of men. New to us individually it may be, but not new to Man. We have our maps of the country before we enter it, we have not to make them as we go along.

When we set out on our travels into some part of the world which is new to us, we cannot forecast our experiences. We do not know how conditions of weather may affect our plans, we do not know what we shall do on this day or on that day, so much is unknown to us when we start, and we cannot prophesy about it. But we know the general line of the country, though we have not seen it—the roads that must be travelled, the rivers that must be crossed, the hills that must be climbed; our maps and guide-books tell us of these things. We may speak much in the same way of the journey that lies before us in the coming time. It is new in the sense that we have not been there, but not new in the sense that we are without information of what will be found there. We can prophesy in a large measure concerning our personal spirits. We know what moral questions will vex us, the temptations that will gather, and all the cloudy battalions of the enemy. We shall find that the paths which lead to life and the paths which lead to death are plainly marked and we cannot miss them. The Divine Law is revealed to us and is not among the secret things.

But something much more is revealed. If this were all, we should be hapless wayfarers indeed. It is not enough to know that one road leads to life and the other to death. What if the will be set towards death and away from life? Knowledge of such issues is a poor defence against an evil will. Acquaintance with Divine Law is a crumbling breakwater when passion is in flood. Whoso will teach us what is right and what is wrong and is content with the distinction does us a service, but scarcely more than he who lays a fire and takes no steps to light it. Whereas he who gives us the power to will what is right, the power to love it and hate its contrary, kindles a fire and drives the blast that keeps it burning. The knowledge of good and evil remains fuel in the trench until the flame of Christian faith falls from heaven. For thence arrives power to constrain the will and fulfil the Law. And with this equipment we become creative, we fashion the days that are to be. All things are ours, both things present and things to come; for "we are Christ's; and Christ is God's." A. B.

THE GUILD MOVEMENT.

Readers of THE INQUIRER will be aware that as the outcome of my paper on the subject, "How best to Organise the Religious Life of our Young People," read at the Leicester Conference, 1900, a new society was inaugurated last May with the title, "The National Conference Guilds' Union."

The inaugural meeting was promoted by a sub-committee of the Conference. The draft constitution, submitted and adopted, was prepared by that committee. But to suppose, as some seem to do, that the scheme of Union was devised by an Ecclesiastical Body with the intention of imposing it on the churches of our Communion, is an utter misconception.

The meeting at Little Portland-street Chapel was representative of all the Guilds and Young People's Religious Societies known to exist in our churches, which cared to send delegates. Those present had the chance to modify the constitution according to their desires. The fact that it was approved, with only slight alterations, is evidence that it was generally satisfactory.

The objects of the Union are:—

1. To promote the formation of Guilds in connection with the Churches on the Roll of the National Conference, which shall aim at uniting the Young People, together with the various workers of our Congregations and Schools, into a League of Fellowship, to (a) Foster the Religious Life, and (b) Inspire Personal Service.

2. To promote the efficiency of Guilds as factors in religious work and worship by means of a common manual, literature, meetings, conferences, and any other methods which, from time to time, may be adopted.

To carry out these objects a strong Council was elected, consisting of ladies and gentlemen who have had wide experience of Guild work, and who are known to be deeply interested in the welfare of the young.

This Council lost no time in preparing a "Manual of Services and Prayers for Guild Meetings," which is being extensively used, and has already proved of great value in many places in aiding the devotions of Guild members.

Nor has the Council been slow in extending a knowledge of the Guild idea among our churches. With that purpose a circular was issued to ministers and superintendents of Sunday-schools last July, setting forth in lucid terms the aims and methods of the Guild movement, and the result has been an awakened interest in this branch of Church work, and the formation of Guilds in several places.

The Council has also announced its intention to publish within the next few days its first Year-Book. This will contain information concerning the Union and its officers; an account of the various Guilds, membership, methods, &c.; original articles on "How to form and carry on a Guild," and "Topics for Guild Meetings," and "Systematic Bible Study," and "Daily Devotional Readings" for each day of the month.

The returns to hand for the Year-Book are so far eminently satisfactory. Twenty three Guilds and Young People's Societies with a total membership of 1,297 have already joined the Union. In addition to these there are twelve other Guilds, with total membership of 516, the majority of which intend to affiliate at the earliest convenience. There are others known to exist which have not as yet sent in reports, and in several places the Guild Idea is slowly ripening.

With these facts in the foreground, the outlook for 1902 is decidedly hopeful. United effort on the part of those who earnestly care for the young, and who are prepared to make a little sacrifice to win them to decide, at the outset of their career, "for God and the good life," will, I am convinced, result in incalculable good to the future men and women, to our church life, and to the larger community. There is, I know, much prejudice yet to be overcome; there are theoretical objections to the Guild movement to be met; there is, worst of all, an amount of apathy to be removed. But prejudice, theory, apathy vanish, as if by magic, just as soon as one gets into sympathetic relationship with the best life, which often lies dormant, in our young friends. Objection and criticism usually come from those who are outside the movement. Those who know it best, who have realised that the Guild is in fact, as well as in theory, "an association for mutual help, mutual enjoyment, and mutual encouragement in good endeavour"; who have seen, through its agency, young lives stirred to enthusiasm for the Church, for religion, and in unselfish service; who have observed the uplifting influence of an advancing ideal; who have witnessed worldliness and mere pleasure-seeking giving place to spirituality, cannot but be eloquent in commendation of the Guild as an institution which should have aforemost place in the organisation of the Church. The Council of the Guilds' Union enters on the New Year encouraged by the results achieved, by the goodwill of the Central Associations and the Denominational Press, in the confident hope that by these efforts an increasing number of our young people will be strengthened in loyalty to the principles for which our churches stand, and inspired to accomplish generous deeds.

JOHN ELLIS.

NATIONAL EDUCATION IN 1902.

IN reviewing the prospects of National Education in 1902 we have to realise that the political issues overwhelm and include all other aspects of the question. Even the terms "Elementary," "Secondary," "Technical" have lost their ordinary meaning and become political catchwords fraught with sinister political meaning. The law says that County Councils may only give "Technical" Education, and that Technical Education includes any subject sanctioned by the Board of Education (South Kensington). The law says School Boards may only give "Elementary" Education, and that Elementary Education includes any subject sanctioned by the Board of Education (Whitehall). The law at the same time recognises a number of schools, mostly under clerical control, which claim to be giving Secondary Education. Thus to affix a label, however incongruous, is like waving a magic wand; the effect is marvellous and instantaneous. The Board of Education declares that teaching a servant girl of fifteen years of age to read and write is "Secondary" Education, and in a moment the School Boards may not do it. The Board of Education declares that the instruction given in some Secondary school is "Technical," and in a moment the County Councils may pour the rates into the coffers of a religious organisation or the pockets of the shareholders of a trading company paying good dividends. Old-fashioned people who thought they had a fairly good idea of what was meant by elementary and secondary and technical, and that a little vagueness about the border lines between them was inevitable and unimportant, may well be amazed at the hot disputes which have arisen about such a purely academic question. It is no longer academic, it is political. And to serve political purposes the academic landmarks are swept away and academic principles thrust aside. It is necessary to remember this when these matters are discussed.

There is another section of the Education Question in which the real issues at stake do not lie on the surface. This is whether School Boards or Town and County Councils make the best education authority. In the large boroughs both bodies are elected by the same ratepayers, they act in the same area, and draw on the same fund. It would not appear, therefore, that there can really be much reason for choosing either in preference to the other; and in 1870, when there was "a clean slate," opinion was fairly balanced between entrusting education to the Municipal Council, or to a Board specially elected for the purpose. Parliament then, under a Liberal Government, decided in favour of a separate body, but in 1876 and 1889 Parliament, under Conservative Governments, gave certain educational functions to the Municipal Councils. And in 1896 and later, the present Government has spared no effort to create a rivalry between them. But the interest of the public is not in the rivalries of individuals or public bodies. They are both servants of the public, and either might do the work of the public if endowed with the requisite powers. As at present constituted, the four chief differences are (1) That through the School Board the ratepayers may spend their own money on their own education to any amount they think necessary, whilst through the Councils the work is cut short by a statutory limit on the rate. (2) That through the Councils they may subsidise sectarian proselytising institutions, but through the School Boards they may only aid unsectarian schools under their own control. (3) That if a School Board neglects the work, which is not only a local but a national duty, it may be promptly abolished, and the work entrusted to paid commissioners, but that the Council is under no obligation to do anything, and frequently does very little. (4) That in electing a School Board the ratepayers have a free choice, whilst ladies, people who are not ratepayers and others are excluded from the Council. It is well not to be led away by superficial aspects of the question, but to remember these and other underlying principles. These are reactionary times, and powerful forces are at work undermining the principles which more progressive days have established.

It is well to remember that the one great, consistent, unceasing force in educational politics is the ecclesiastical claim to control all schools in the interest of a sectarian propaganda, and that clerical control, apart from other defects, leads to inefficiency and stagnation. A theological test for teachers, for managers and for scholars is the principle upon which the great majority of schools and colleges are founded. The law has restrained the proselytising spirit, but it is always active and gaining new ground. The County Councils have had power for ten years to provide unsectarian training colleges, but their hands have been paralysed. The School Boards have been able to provide thousands of unsectarian schools, but it is only because they are protected by strict legal enactments. The law of 1876 made the municipal councils the mere slaves of clerical organisations in places where School Boards do not exist, their sole function being to compel the attendance of children at sectarian schools—they having no power to provide schools under public control. Since 1870 practically the whole cost of maintaining the clerical elementary schools has been transferred to the public purse without any change in their constitution. The secondary schools are gradually following the same happy destiny, and last year all sectarian evening schools were set free from the Conscience Clause and other restrictions imposed in 1870. There are hopes that the coming session may see this policy completed. The policy of last year's Bill was to abolish the existing powers of Town and County Councils and to set up a new authority in which the representation of the public would have a small share—as small as possible. Under the Bill of 1897 the country has already been divided into ecclesiastical areas, each governed by a Diocesan Association which distributes public money. The struggle which is going on is, in fact, how nearly can the new authority for all grades of education be assimilated to these bodies. The plausible argument against small areas which make so many people ready to subject the boroughs to the county is now used against the county in favour of a "province or union of counties," which in plain English means "diocese." The Government Bill of last year reduced the popular representation to a majority of one. Even that bare majority may not be in the next Bill; but it is not of much importance, for if the clerical influences outside and inside exert themselves they could obtain overwhelming control. In last year's Bill the new authority nominally had power to provide schools of its own; this is objected to in clerical circles, but it does not matter if the funds available are so restricted by statute that there will not be money enough to build schools, but only enough to subsidise those in existence.

Few people realise that the numerous demands presented to Lord Salisbury by the Archbishops in 1895, and which then created such a storm of popular indignation, have been quietly obtained with one exception. They were demands not in the interest of national education, but to strengthen and extend the clerical control over the education of the people. The field of education covered by the School Boards has been clipped and cut, many of their grants withdrawn and their prestige half destroyed; the University Colleges under popular control have been snubbed and refused any additional aid. The Town and County Councils have seen Bills introduced to deprive them of their powers and make them mere purse-bearers to hybrid authorities over whom they would have no real control. The power of the purse is almost nothing in such a connection, if the Councils desire to promote the education of the nation; for they would be but once more in the position occupied by the Imperial Parliament for so many years and by so many individuals to-day, of having no option between doing nothing for education or doing it through clerical channels.

The education question seems to be a terribly complicated matter, and there are many people interested in confusing the public mind, but one simple principle will guide us through the maze. However many new forms the problem takes, it is always the old contest between clerical control and popular control: between those who would spread education freely amongst all classes and those who would reserve it as a luxury for the rich; between those who think a liberal instruction of the industrial classes is a national benefit, and those who think that even a knowledge of reading and writing makes servants less serviceable. And the friends of progress can cling firmly to the principle of popular control. A democratic local self-government, with control over its own funds, master of its own destiny, may blunder at times, but will make progress, and irresistibly defeat the forces which have for centuries crippled the intellectual development of the nation. A true and simple test for all schemes and plans is, "Which plan will most effectively establish a genuine popular control?"

RECONCILIATION.

SIR,—While all liberal religious thinkers must esteem the motive underlying Mr. Gannett's plea as instanced by the quotations you make from his sermon in your leader of Dec. 7, will you permit me to point out what I feel to be a confusion of thought and consequent source of danger in the hopes Mr. Gannett so charitably raises?

He seems to confuse reconciliation with concession, charity with identity of opinion, a temper of the soul with a faculty of the mind. I would point out that the two belong to entirely different categories, and have distinct functions which it were well to bear in mind. For surely it is the clearness with which convictions are defined and the tenacity with which they are held that advances us in the realm of conscience and knowledge, while it is the function of charity to render possible without unchristian friction that intercourse between these convictions which is essential to the selective process. I cannot help thinking that Mr. Gannett's object were better served by accentuating the distinctions that render charity so necessary than by falling on a vague comprehensiveness that robs charity of its raison d'être.

Reduced to a process, Mr. Gannett's purpose is to increase the connotation of orthodoxy by diminishing the denotation of distinctive heresies. Whether this is more than a mere verbal exercise depends, not on the spirit of charity—which has nothing to do with it—but on the degree of reality which the heresies have for those who hold them. You quote Dr. Gladden as resembling Mr. Gannett's appeal to the Germans playing the Marseillaise while the French cheer them. Such an exchange of courtesies would not make the one less German or the other less French. Nationality is not abolished with a lute, nor even by the fact that all nations are comprehended under the general termMan. By all means let us pipe each other's national airs in pursuance of peace; let the fact of Brotherhood give us pause on the eve of strife, and the "Four Great Liberal Principles" promote what harmony they can. But it is more than harmony, more than peace, that Mr. Gannett and Dr. Gladden desire; it is homogeneity, while the course of progress appears to be in the opposite direction.

To disregard this tendency is perilous. Nothing is more devitalising than a limp comprehensiveness. Especially is this so in England, where, side by side with "the beautiful expansion of the old dogmas," there is an official recognition of those dogmas which stamps expansion, within the pale of that recognition, with insincerity. Most of the positions which Mr. Gannett takes in the passages you quote on p. 777 of your penultimate are typical of positions taken by hundreds of ministers in that Babel of conflicting convictions, the Established Church, and are as fatal to moral clearness as any other form of slovenliness. To take but one example—at random—"There are Trinities, if one value such a computation and term, which all of us can believe in, and all of us do." From the context, this appears to be put forward as a basis of reconciliation with Trinitarians. What "trinities" has Mr. Gannett in mind? the mere tendency of some things to group themselves in threes? This is childish, and, so far as reconciliation is concerned, the "New" as well as the "Old Orthodox" in this country would very soon explain that it is not "the trinities" they are concerned about, but The Trinity, and surely no liberal religious thinker can patiently contemplate reconciliation with the Fiction of Nicea?

Quâ charity distinctions are, no doubt, accidents, but quâ distinctions they are vital. We can love our neighbour without speaking his language, and it certainly will not promote a universal language to speak our own tongue badly. To reduce all languages to a few primitive roots may seem a gain to the schoolboy, but is not calculated to circulate ideas. In the region of convictions a comprehensiveness that proceeds by narrowing the denotation is a danger as well as a weakness. Reduced to the general principle of worship the Christian conscience would have undergone no outrage in sacrificing to Diana; while the altar "to the unknown God"—a fair example of Mr. Gannett's connotative method where it approaches "the new Agnosticism"—was the mark of a decadent nation, not of the New Force.

A great deal of false sentiment in this regard is current to-day—as false as that of the bishop who pleaded eloquently for a "sinking of differences" until someone suggested a sinking of funds. By all means let charity save us from fanaticism. Let us have as much as we can of that temper of fairness to positions other than our own which the spirit of Jesus engenders and the cause of progress makes imperative. But in the sphere of the convictions on which we act we want neither "mistiness of thought" nor "blurring of phrases," but clear realisation, definite statement, tenacious grip, and resolute action. It is well, indeed, to "move in charity"; let us not forget to "turn upon the poles of truth."

Dec. 14. THOMAS J. HARDY.

[It is perhaps our fault, because we did not present Mr. Gannett's argument with sufficient clearness; but our correspondent does not appear to us to do justice to the striking sermon, from which we quoted. It is no "limp comprehensiveness" for which Mr. Gannett pleads, but the recognition of definite changes of doctrinal conviction, which from different sides are making for a true unity of thought. Neither does he applaud the "mistiness of thought" and "blurring of phrases" which have marked the earlier steps of the "New Orthodox" teaching. He says in so many words that while Orthodoxy is bound to grow more and more liberal, "it will become, as it much needs to become, more honest, more bravely outspoken, less afraid to identify its cause with the cause of its heretic." With the questions raised by the inclusion of varieties of teaching within the Creed-bound Church of England Mr. Gannett does not deal. The Atlantic unfortunately divides our preacher of "Reconciliation" from his critic, but if in the course of time he should be inclined to make some response, we need hardly say that we shall be delighted to receive a letter from Mr. Gannett.—Ed. INQ.]

UNITARIAN STUDENTS AT CARMARTHEN COLLEGE.

SIR,—In a little book on the above subject, just issued by the Rev. R. J. Jones, of Aberdare, the author refers to the Oriel of Dr. Pan Jones, of Mostyn, as his most valuable help. Will you allow me to explain that Oriel Caerfyrddin is the title of a work relating to the history of the Presbyterian College during the last hundred years—a work that has not yet been published; and that what Mr. Jones is really indebted to is a list of nineteenth-century students which I supplied to Dr. Pan about eighteen months ago for the purposes of his work, and which Mr. Jones—having procured a copy—has now utilised for publication without the permission of either Dr. Pan or myself.

If Mr. Jones had delayed publication for a few months—until the Oriel had appeared—his little book, which is sufficiently interesting, would have received nothing but welcome from me. As it is, I feel it to be a plain duty to protest against the use he has made of what is as yet private material; and, inasmuch as I may myself publish hereafter a work covering the field with which Mr. Jones has dealt, I think I am entitled to protect myself from future imputations of plagiarism by stating that, with few exceptions, all the leading facts which Mr. Jones has registered have long been in my possession, as may be partly inferred from the prefaces to some of the authorities in his list.

I will say no more, except that Mr. Jones in his biographical notice of myself has mis-stated some of the facts, having not communicated with me in regard to the work he had in hand.

WALTER J. EVANS,
Principal of the Presbyterian
Dec. 21. College.

MR. JONES'S REPLY.

Through the kindness of the Editor I have been allowed the privilege of reading the foregoing letter before it is published, and I have done so with some surprise. To say the least of it, the letter is pungent enough, and would imply that I have been guilty of a sin of enormous magnitude. If I have transgressed, I have done so quite unwittingly.

Let the reader judge. I am frequently appealed to for information about Unitarianism in Wales. Some twelve months ago Dr. Pan Jones called upon me soliciting help for his work, referred to in Principal Evans's letter; shortly after, Mr. Tobit Evans wrote asking for similar help, and these have not been the only ones, even of late; so it occurred to me, as Mr. Tobit Evans was then Editor of the Carmarthen Journal, that I could help all and relieve myself of much further trouble by having my notes published in the Journal. This was done, and these notes, corrected and amplified, make up the little book which has given such offence.

Anyone reading Principal Evans's letter might infer that I had appropriated the bulk of Dr. Pan's work, as well as the "leading facts" of the Principal's projected work, whereas I have never seen a single line of the one or the other—neither being yet published. The amount of my indebtedness—let the reader note this carefully—is limited to the bare list of printed names of students, with the dates of their admission to college. This so-called "private material," which the Principal says he supplied to Dr. Pan, I could have got myself for the asking. He is temporary custodian of the College Records, and he would not, I feel sure, refuse to favour me any more than he did Dr. Pan. Out of this "bare list" I picked out the Unitarian names—a mere fraction of the whole—with the idea chiefly of helping others, and never dreaming I was trespassing on anybody's preserves. Whatever "leading facts" Mr. E. may have in common with me have probably been common property long ago, and he can easily forestall any "imputation of plagiarism" by giving his authorities. This I have tried to do.

R. JENKIN JONES.

THE TARGUMS.

SIR,—In his letter in your last issue Mr. Weatherall repeats, in more prolix form, what he had already said in his first notice of my address. In reply I might be content simply to refer him to my last letter, and to ask your readers to refer to my address and compare his criticism with the address itself. I venture to say they would agree with me that his review is, in no sense, a true estimate of it. I will now only further say: (i.) It is a pity Mr. W. did not read my paper more carefully before attempting to criticise it. I pointed out last time one instance in which his carelessness had misled him. He now tells me, with that fondness for gratuitous information of which he is so lavish, that the Aramaic of the Bible is not Babylonian, but was acquired in Palestine. If he had taken the trouble to read my address he would have seen on p. 6 that I refer to the prevalence of Aramaic in Palestine. It is difficult to understand what Mr. W. really does mean; but I imagine he stands alone if he supposes that the Jews returned from Babylon to learn Aramaic for the first time in Palestine. I have stated in my address what I believe to be the facts concerning the transition from Hebrew to Aramaic, and I think most of my readers will admit that I have given a reasonable explanation of a remarkable change which undoubtedly took place. I will not discuss the matter further with Mr. W.

(ii.) Again, he says that I give the Targums an antiquity greater than they are entitled to. I state on p. 8 that the period during which the Targums now extant arose extends from the second to the twelfth century A.D.; and I say on p. 5 that we can say with certainty that they represent interpretations of the Old Testament text handed down from soon after the Captivity. This is quite in accordance with the opinions of modern scholars. Buhl, for example, says it is difficult to fix their dates, but they partly represent matter of a much earlier period than the actually writing, "especially the Targums on the Law and the Prophets, whose oldest layers may have originated in the very earliest synagogical readings." (Canon and Text, Eng. trans. p. 170. Italics mine.) This is also Deutsch's opinion. Indeed, it is the opinion of all who have studied the question. De Wette, no very conservative critic, protested in his day against the prevailing theories of their extreme modernity. (De Wette-Schrader, Einl. p. 124.) Mr. W., while finding fault with me, puts himself in a corner safe from attack, for he does not venture to mention any dates whatever, but deals in generalities which may mean anything—or nothing. I decline to discuss the matter with him further.

(iii.) Mr. W. believes that not only the Targums, but other versions also are "collusive witnesses." Whatever he may mean by that, one thing is clear, that the versions form a steady safeguard against the destructive attacks of modern subjective criticism on the Massoretic text; and the man who disregards their warning is certain to go wrong. If Mr. W. chooses that fatuous method, it is but in harmony with the perversity of his persistent misrepresentations of my address. But we may hope that when the present fever that afflicts our critics is over, the sober survivors will find that even the Targums are valuable as subordinate witnesses to the validity of the Massoretic text.

This is the last notice I shall take of Mr. W.'s communication to you. From the examples I have given, it will be seen what fitness he has to deal with the subject. My address is printed, and your readers can judge for themselves between me and my carping critic. J. E. MANNING.

Sheffield, Dec. 30.

THE WOMEN'S MEMORIAL TO QUEEN VICTORIA.

SIR,—We venture to ask you to kindly accord a space for an appeal which we are making to the clergy of all denominations. Sunday, Jan. 26, will be a day on which the thoughts of all our fellow-countrymen will turn with love and gratitude to the memory of Queen Victoria. We are, therefore, asking that on this Sunday collections should be made in every church in aid of the "Jubilee Institute for Nurses," which the late Queen founded, and towards which she made the magnificent donation of £70,000. A Committee representative of all creeds and classes in the community has been formed to promote a great national subscription that shall complete the noble work which Queen Victoria inaugurated. It would be impossible to exaggerate the service which the Queen's nurses are rendering to the sick poor, and we think it would be hard to find a more appropriate object for the support of all her people than the one for which we plead. We should be very glad to give the fullest particulars to any clergyman who may be kind enough to comply with our request, and to supply leaflets for distribution explaining the work of the Queen's nurses.

ERNEST FLOWER, }
HAROLD BOULTON, } Hon. Secs.
120, Victoria-street, S.W., Dec. 16.

Queen Victoria gave the £70,000, which was the Women's Jubilee Offering to her in 1887, to establish the "Queen Victoria's Jubilee Institute for Nurses," the object of which is to train nurses to attend the sick poor in their own homes. There are now nearly 900 Queen's nurses engaged in this work. The Queen's gift produces an income of £2,100 a year, and this is increased by annual subscriptions to £6,000; but the expenditure is now over £8,000, and there is abundant scope for extending the work, if an adequate income could be secured. Hence this appeal for the Endowment Fund.

Queen Alexandra is now Patron of the Institute. The President of the Council is the Master of St. Katherine's. The Vice-President is Mr. William Rathbone. The appeal for the Endowment Fund is supported by Miss Florence Nightingale. The Hon. Sydney Holland and Mr. Howard Morley are the hon. treasurers, who will be glad to receive donations at the office of the Fund, 64, Cannon-street, E.C. Cheques and postal orders should be crossed "Glyn Mills, Currie and Co., account The Queen's Nurses Endowment Fund."

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

SIR,—It may interest your London readers to know that on closing my accounts for the year 1901, I find that out of all the Unitarians in London and district less than 200 subscribe to this Society, now established over half-a-century, and that I have received collections during the past year from only seven churches.

In the early part of the year a considerable sum was raised to pay off the debt due to the late Treasurer, but unless other members of our churches show, in a substantial manner, a much greater interest in the Society's work, it will not be long before another appeal will have to be made.

At the autumn meeting much advice was tendered to the Society as to the course to be pursued in the future, which advice the Executive Committee are now busy considering, but I did not receive any offers of pecuniary assistance to enable that advice to be adopted.

An annual subscription of 5s. constitutes membership of the Society, all of whose officers are entirely honorary, so that the expenses are practically nominal. May I suggest that those who do not already subscribe should do so? Small as well as large amounts are needed.

THOMAS H. TERRY, Hon. Treasurer.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdeen.—On Dec. 28 the annual Sunday-school soirée was held. The number present (over 200) was larger than on any former occasion. After tea, a mixed programme of recitations, vocal and instrumental music, furnished by scholars, was gone through. A drama, entitled The Lordly, Lofty, Lovable Boy, written by the Rev. Alexander Webster, was performed, and proved very entertaining. There were several part songs and choruses in the drama, and these were well rendered by a juvenile choir, trained by Mr. R. Davidson, organist. As usual, there was a distribution of prize books (115 in all), eleven being for perfect attendance during the year.

Astley.—The annual tea-party and entertainment was held on Christmas Day. Prizes were presented to the scholars by the superintendent, Mr. M. Stringfellow. Glees and songs were rendered by the choir, carols and readings by the scholars. The meeting was addressed by the Rev. Peter Holt, chairman. A tablet to the memory of the late Superintendent, Mr. James Grundy, who had held office forty years, has been erected in the chapel by the congregation.

Blackpool: South Shore.—The Christmas tea-party was held on Boxing Day, and the attendance was so good that a supplemental tea had to be arranged. After tea Mr. William Bland occupied the chair, and a varied entertainment was given by a number of friends, and much enjoyed by the audience.

Capelybryn.—Christmas was solemnised by the usual annual meeting of the Sunday-schools of Capelybryn and Sychbant. Owing partly to the severity of the weather, there was not a very large attendance. The minister, the Rev. J. Davies, catechised each school in turn on a chapter of Scripture, and expressed himself satisfied both with the recital and the answers received. Afterwards the certificates gained last spring for proficiency in religious knowledge, under the South Wales Unitarian Association, were distributed to the successful candidates.

Chorley.—On Sunday evening last the Rev. A. Doel completed his course of open lectures for the people. In these lectures Mr. Doel dealt with the necessity for more careful physical, mental, and moral education. Last Sunday the subject was "Fore and Aft." The great material, social, moral, and religious forces which have created the civilisation of the past, and which may greatly enlarge the civilisation of the future, were dealt with. These lectures have been well attended and greatly appreciated. The Christmas tea and entertainment was very successful. Mr. W. H. Sutcliffe presided, and Mr. W. M. Gillibrand distributed purses for regular attendance at Sunday-school. The Rev. A. Doel gave an encouraging address, and a spirit of hope for the future characterised the meeting.

Cirencester.—On New Year's Eve the school children and their friends had a happy party with a Christmas tree, followed by the distribution of prizes and presents.

Colne (Resignation).—The Rev. T. Leyland has resigned, on account of ill-health, the pulpit of the Stanley-street Church.

Horwich.—The annual Christmas party and entertainment took place on Saturday, Dec. 28, the chief item in the entertainment being the play Robin Hood, by the Rev. H. W. Hawkes. At the conclusion of the programme Father Christmas appeared to unveil a "Christmas tree," sent by a good friend of the school.

Ipswich.—During the month of December the Rev. Lucking Tavener has delivered a special series of sermons upon subjects suggested by his visit to Rome in 1900. The lessons to be learnt from a study of the early days of Christianity in Rome were earnestly and ably enforced in the sermons on the Ancient Roman Forum, the Colosseum and the Catacombs. Then followed sermons upon St. Peter's and Giordano Bruno the Martyr, the latter being of special interest to Unitarians as the story of one of the first leaders of the movement for perfect liberty of thought in religious matters. The services have been attended by large congregations, and the impression made by the sermons has been deepened by Mr. Tavener's photographs and sketches which have been displayed in the schoolroom after some of the services. The series of sketches in the Catacombs evoked considerable interest. Mr. Tavener's visit to Italy has already provided material for several lantern lectures, and another on Rome is to be delivered shortly.

Leeds: Hunslet.—On Dec. 30 Miss Thornton gave a high-class concert in the schoolroom on behalf of the church funds. There was a good audience, which for two and a-half hours enjoyed a fine musical treat.

Liverpool: Ancient Chapel of Toxteth.—On New Year's Eve a service was held at eight o'clock in the meeting-room, and was largely attended. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong conducted the first part of the service, and as part of one of the lessons read Tennyson's "Ring out, wild bells." The Rev. W. J. Jupp, in the course of a most helpful address, read Christina Rossetti's "Up-hill" and Lowell's "Longing." It was a beautiful and impressive service.

London: Bermondsey.—The Christmas tea and anniversary meeting of the Band of Hope was held on Monday last. After various games had been enjoyed, the Superintendent, Mr. A. W. Harris, presented a brief report of the year, and interesting addresses were given by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, and Messrs. J. Bredall and H. Titford. At the close 23 medals and 27 prizes were distributed by Mr. Edwards. Thanks are due to the visitors, and to the friends who kindly sent contributions to the cost of the entertainment and prizes.

London: Little Portland-street Chapel.—The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A., preached at this chapel on Christmas Day. Christmas hymns were chosen, and before the sermon three carols were very well rendered by the choir, especially the last, to the tune of the beautiful old German air, "Heilige Nacht." Taking for his text "Glory to God in the highest. Peace on earth and good will to men" (the words which had been selected to decorate the chapel), Mr. Brooke said that Christmas observances still maintained included some of the best elements in the worship of our heathen forefathers, which gave a sense of continuity in the sentiments of our nation. It would, he said, be well for us if we had not lost some of the savage virtues of our heathen ancestors. Our civilisation was corrupted by greed and by over-competition, the sense of honour was all but dead amongst us, the reverence of women was loosened, the duties of home were neglected. He then urged the observance of Christmas as a time of pleasure and happiness. It was the time when rich and poor came closer together, and he had no more sympathy with those who said it was a remnant of Popery than with those who objected that music and dancing did not come into the Puritan view of life. This view was pitiable in its selfishness. All affections should be deepened and strengthened by love, specially shown at Christmastide, and those who were lonely and sorrowful would find themselves less solitary and more comforted the more they tried to live for and love others at this time of year. For joy was at the heart of the religion of Christ—joy in saving and blessing the world—though it was at the cost of his own sorrow and death. In spite of the bad weather there was a very fair congregation, about 300 being present, although the notice had been rather short. A collection was made for the Honor Club, in which Mr. Brooke is so much interested.

London: Plumstead.—The first half of the winter programme of work has closed with a very satisfactory record. The special course of sermons by the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones brought increased congregations, and the week-evening lantern lectures have been well attended and very helpful and encouraging "socials" have been held. On Dec. 19 the choir gave a charming rendering (in character) of the cantata "Merlin, or the Charmed Oak," to a crowded audience. On Dec. 23, at the Children's Christmas party, some of the little ones acted Cinderella with great éclat. On Boxing Day Mr. and Mrs. H. Burrows entertained the congregation when a large party assembled, and on New Year's Eve, on the invitation of the choir, a goodly number gathered to welcome the New Year.

Moretonhampstead.—The annual school tea-party and Christmas treat took place in the Smethurst schoolroom on Dec. 27. A Christmas tree, provided by the generosity of Mr. T. B. Bowring, Mrs. Smethurst, and Mrs. Toms, was followed by a distribution of prizes, an address being given by the Rev. A. Lancaster.

Newchurch.—On Friday, Dec. 27, Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, gave his recital of "The Christmas Carol." Although only a few weeks had elapsed since his previous visit to Newchurch, Mr. Harwood attracted a large and enthusiastic audience. At various parts of the recital many of those present signified, in no half-hearted way, their appreciation of the manner in which incidents, both amusing and pathetic, were rendered. The financial results were highly satisfactory, and the profits will be devoted to providing a treat for the poor children of the neighbourhood.

BE honest with yourself whatever the temptation. Say nothing to others that you do not think, and play no tricks with your own mind. Of all the evil spirits abroad at this hour in the world, insincerity is the most dangerous.—J. A. Froude.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE "Essex Hall Year Book for 1902" is now issued, and is as full as ever of concise and accurate information concerning our Churches, Associations, Colleges, and other Societies and Institutions. It is pleasant to find a new feature in the two pages devoted to the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers. The list of congregations contains 362 places of worship, including mission rooms and hired halls: 283 in England, 39 in Ireland, 8 in Scotland, and 32 in Wales. The list of ministers contains 366 names, including a few laymen. Of these 292 are in charge of congregations, 14 have other professional employment, and 44 have retired owing to infirmity or other reasons. Twelve new names appear in the list for the first time this year, including one former Congregational and one Methodist minister, and one Church of England clergyman. The "Year Book" is published, for 1s. net., at Essex Hall, Essex street, Strand, W.C.

WE would again call attention to the public meeting to be held next Friday evening, in the Royal Victoria Hall, Waterloo-road, which is on the tram line, not far from Waterloo Station. The meeting is organised by the National Unitarian Temperance Association, and is to be addressed by Mrs. Ormiston Chant and Mr. Fred. Maddison. Additional attractions are promised by soloists, and Mr. D. S. Miller, who is to give a special performance on his set of Ninety Canadian Sleigh Bells. The Rev. Frederic Allen will preside. Admission is free up to 8.30 when the meeting begins, after which charges ranging from 1s. to 1d. will be made, according to the seats desired.

THE first of the new series of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's "Sermons for the Day," issued this month (Liverpool Booksellers' Company, 70, Lord-street, Liverpool, 1d. monthly), is an earnest plea "For Good Will and Peace." Preaching in Hope-street Church on "Peace Sunday," Mr. Armstrong took the familiar Christmas text, and then—quoting Lord Rosebery's recent words, "You must remember one great fact, that war is a horrible thing, however you look at it, in every detail of it. It is a horrible, unspeakable outrage on humanity"—pressed home the implication of these words, and proceeded to plead with great force that all men should strive after "good will," out of which alone peace could grow.

The duty of duties now resting, I will not say on every English politician, but on every English patriot and Christian, is to pray and strive for the spirit of good will. There has been generated in these last sad years much passion, much irritation in the breasts of many, passion against those who have had the temerity to resist the might of England in the field, irritation against neighbours at home who have taken a different view of duty and justice from our own. Now these emotions must be mastered and got under first of all, if we are to have an atmosphere of good will, and out of an atmosphere of good will to generate a just and lasting peace. It is not a question whether there has or has not been ground for passion or irritation. The point is to recognise that out of passion and irritation wisdom and justice cannot be born. They blind the mind and obscure the judgment. And so each one of us, first of all in his own heart, has to strive to root out these unwholesome growths. And the more individual hearts are cleared of them, the more nearly will the great national heart come to be a sanctuary of good will and a spring of justice and compassion.

In a prefatory note to the sermon, Mr. Armstrong says:—"The difficulty in the advancement of unpopular views is that the hearer or reader so often jumps to the conclusion that something is meant other than what is said, or even honestly supposes that something has been said which has neither been said nor even remotely implied. Thus some hearers of the present sermon have, I understand, complained of it that it casts blame on our soldiers in South Africa. Yet there is not a single phrase in it which will bear such a construction, nor were any such criticisms in my thoughts. On the contrary, I am full of sympathy and sorrow for the sufferings of our own folk. May I ask the reader then always to judge me by what I really say, and not by what it is thought likely I may have said?" There is much more in the sermon which we should have been glad to quote, as to the right temper in which to judge of our enemies, but we must be content to urge men of "good will" to procure the sermon and quietly read it for themselves.

THE Rev. Charles Hargrove's New Year's sermon, in this month's Mill Hill Pulpil, is on "Self-Culture, the Business of our Lives," and taking for text, Ephes. iv. 13, "Till we all attain unto the perfect man," quotes on the title-page the following sentences from Channing's "Self-Culture":—"Let us resolve deliberately and solemnly that we will make the most and the best of the powers which God has given us. This is our solemn duty, this should be our great end." This January sermon is No. 4 of the tenth volume of the Mill Hill Pulpit. Annual subscriptions (1s. 6d. post free) should be sent to Mr. C. Stainer, 82, Ravenswood-terrace, Hyde Park, Leeds.

PROFESSOR E. MONTET, of Geneva, who was one of our welcome guests at the International Council meetings in Whitweek last year, contributed to the October number of the Asiatic Quarterly Review a most interesting article on "A Special Mission to Morocco." Ten years ago, at the International Congress of Orientals in London, Dr. Montet first planned a visit to a Musulman country in order to gain first hand knowledge of the present religious condition of Islam; and in October, 1900, accompanied by a friend and former pupil, Mr. E. Soudan, a Swiss artillery officer, Dr. Montet was able to start on his journey to Morocco, the most conservative as well as the most backward country of Islam. The travellers and their caravan penetrated far into that little-visited country, having some strange experiences and facing not a few risks in a wild and miserably misgoverned country. The lieutenant made a number of valuable topographical observations, and came to the conclusion that the maps of the country are very faulty. "The southern range of the great Atlas," Dr. Montet says, "should be placed from twenty to thirty miles more to the north."

STARTING from Tangier on Nov. 15, 1900, Dr. Montet and his party first travelled along the coast southward, as far as Mazagan, which was reached on Dec. 9. Thence they struck inland for Marakesh (Morocco), and reached the southern capital on Dec. 14. On the way, after leaving Mazagan, they had crossed the desert plateau of Gentour: "The great Atlas range appeared before us in all its splendour, and is more imposing than the Alps; it is at this time of the year entirely covered with snow." At Marakesh Dr. Montet secured much valuable material for the work he is preparing on Islam and its religious propaganda. The return journey to the coast was made to Mogador, by an unaccustomed route, along the base of the lesser chain of the Atlas mountains. At Tiggi, which the party left on Dec. 28, the Kaid's slaves questioned their men, asking why they, being Musulmans, served Christians, and received the reply: "We serve them because they are just, fulfil what they promise, and pay what they owe." Reaching Mogador on Dec. 30, they rested there for a couple of days to see the new year in, and welcome the new century, and then proceeded north again along the coast. Dr. Montet had intended to visit Fez, but was prevented by the rains of January and February, and on March 8 he quitted Morocco and devoted the rest of the month to the chief religious centres of Algeria and Tunis, reaching home at the beginning of April.

DR. MONTET'S October article is descriptive of the journey, and of the country, of which the administration is said to be worse even than that of the Turks. The results of the journey, from the point of view of religion, Dr. Montet reserves for a special and exhaustive report, to which we shall look forward with great interest; and already in the January number of the Asiatic Quarterly, in an article on "The Religious Orders of Morocco," we have a summary of the Memoir hereafter to be published. This article contains notes on a number of Orders, of various age, some quite recent, others dating back many centuries. They have now no political power in the country, but great religious influence, especially directed towards the worship of saints, which holds a large place in Moroccan religion. There is, Dr. Montet says, a strong instinct for association among the people, and he looks to the development of this "democratic principle of association and co-operation" as the one hope for the rescue of the country from its present state of semi-barbarism. Dr. Montet has for some years been contributing to the Asiatic Quarterly a regular "Report on Semitic Studies," and he refers to his quarterly Report of October, 1898, for a comparison between the Mussulman and Catholic Religious Orders.

WHEN we published our notes last week on the new Unitarian World, we had not yet been informed that the New Kingdom with which, it is stated in the first number, a friendly amalgamation has been effected, was still to preserve, in part at least, its separate individuality. Thus we have not only the Unitarian World pure and simple, but also The New Kingdom, The Northern Edition of the "Unitarian World," published by W. Hough and Sons, 2, Swan-court, 69, Market-street, Manchester, with a separate cover and advertisements, and a four-page supplement of news and notes, "In the Field," inserted. The January number also has a special four-page illustrated supplement on the "Old Warrington Academy," by the Rev. W. Blazeby. Another issue of the Unitarian World comes to us from Wales, issued by the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, Unitarian Church, Swansea, with the cover devoted to local advertisements, and four extra pages inserted for congregational announcements and notes.

IN the Royal Academy Autumn Exhibition of Old Masters which opend at Burlington House on Monday, there is a great variety of interest, including two rooms devoted to Claude, and ranging from the "Four Peasants" of Velazques (169) to "The Trinity" of Botticelli (152), in which amid the strange ecclesiastical conventions human nature also comes out in the circle of jolly little cherub faces. There are some very fine portraits, including "Dr. Thomas Linacre," from All Souls' College, Oxford (165), a Holbein from Worcester College (168), and a Sir Antonio More (219). Some of the landscapes are very quaint. One of the most striking of the pictures is "The Misers" (24), by Quentin Matsys.

MR. ONSLOW FORD, R.A., who died on Dec. 23, not fifty years of age, was a Londoner by birth. Early in his career as an artist he abandoned painting for sculpture, and quickly made a reputation for great skill in portraiture as well as for exquisite workmanship and poetic imagination. His famous "Shelley Memorial," now in University College, Oxford, was exhibited in the Academy of 1892. "Peace," "Folly," "Echo," "Applause," "Gladness," "Music" were among his imaginative works. His statue of Sir Rowland Hill, executed before he was thirty, is in the Royal Exchange; his "Sir Henry Irving, as Hamlet," in the Guildhall. Of Gladstone, Gordon, Jowett, Dale, Huxley, and many others he has left striking memorials in statue or bust. His "Memorial to Queen Victoria," exhibited in last year's Academy, is now at Manchester. It was in preparation for this that he executed his most successful bust of the Queen. Three days after Ford, the venerable Sir J. Noel Paton, the King's Limner for Scotland, passed away at Edinburgh, a popular painter of sacred and romantic subjects, followed two days later by David Law, also a Scotchman, and well known as a water-colour painter and etcher.

WE quoted last week a resolution of the Brahmo Somaj Committee in Calcutta, on the death of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, and in the last Indian papers which have reached us we find further evidence of how deeply our brethren there feel with us the common loss we have sustained. Thus in the Indian Messenger of Dec. 15 we read:—

The early death of Mr. Williams, who during his stay here had made himself thoroughly acquainted with the religious situation of the country, as is so conspicuously manifested in his masterly report to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, on his "Experience and Work in India," and who had won the esteem, admiration and love of many, not only in the Brahmo Samaj, but outside its pale, is an irreparable loss to our cause. We had been looking forward for him, and he himself was looking forward, to many years of usefulness and unabated activity which would have been exerted at least as much on behalf of the Brahmo Samaj as for the community to which he belonged. The cause of the Brahmo Samaj was looked upon by him as his own cause. We looked upon him as one of our men. Indeed, the thought that he killed himself in his unresting exertions on behalf of the Brahmo Samaj, makes the pain all the more poignant to us. We were hoping that he would be a living link of connection between the theists of Great Britain and India. Mr. Williams intended to go round in a lecturing tour throughout England in order to awaken greater interest among the Unitarians in the work of the Brahmo Samaj. But Providence willed it otherwise. . . . May his soul rest in peace and may we continue to cherish worthily the memory of him who came and loved, and laboured for us so unselfishly, and has left behind him an image of a life of faith, hope, charity and humility.

Other papers contain similar expressions of grateful appreciation and sorrow.

THAT some progress has been made in the matter of the adequate support of ministers may be seen from the following item of "Liverpool News One Hundred Years Ago," reprinted in the Liverpool Daily Post from a local paper of Jan 7, 1802:—

Mr. Stock's donation of £10 each to ten curates of the Church of England, with large families, whose respective incomes do not exceed £40 per annum, was adjudged to be given to the following persons:—Cornelius Copner, Hargave Chapel, Cheshire, aged forty-one, ten children, income £25 per annum; John Hughes, Denbighshire, aged forty-two, seven children, income £30; John Jones, Glamorganshire, aged seventy-one, eleven children, income £40, blind; Joseph Rooke, Barmby, Yorkshire, aged thirty-four, three children, income £20.

AMONG the January magazines we note that the Sunday Strand opens with an article by Mr. Alfred T. Story on "Some Great Modern Pictures in the Walker Art Gallery, Liverpool," which includes illustrations of Holman Hunt's "Triumph of the Innocents," Faed's "In the Time of War" and "When the Children are asleep," Calderon's "Ruth and Naomi," Leighton's "Elijah in the Wilderness," Henry Holiday's "Dante and Beatrice." and Rossetti's "Dante's Dream." Scribner's contains a first paper on "The American 'Commercial Invasion' of Europe," by Mr. Frank A. Vanderlip, formerly Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. In the English Illustrated, Mr. I. Zangwill writes on "The Commercial Future of Palestine," and Mr. Lewis Melville on "Thackeray's London." In Cornhill there is the second paper on "Thackeray in the United States," with some more of his most amusing sketches.

GIFTED as we are with the perilous privilege of free-will, so that while birds are by instinct impelled to do what they know not, we know the law and often transgress it, still are we, too, even our passions and our follies, somehow included in God's Order; and though we made for ourselves trouble, and go about to fashion our own miseries, yet we do not escape the Order, which includes all, and is beneficent because it is divine—for all things are the outcome of its own self, and so the good of all is identical with God's own good, which is and must be for ever. —Charles Hargrove.

LITERATURE.

A MINISTER OF GOD.*

MR. DAVIS has earned the thanks of all who cherish the memory and the teaching of Mr. Thom by another piece of loving service excellently performed. Six years ago he gave us, in the volume entitled "A Spiritual Faith" (now out of print), a last instalment of the discourses preached by Mr. Thom in the discharge of his regular ministry, then first printed from his manuscripts. The volume before us contains a series of brief selections from sermons preached on special occasions, and separately printed during the author's lifetime, many of which are now very scarce and difficult to find. These sermons deal predominantly with the idea and work of the Church and its ministry, and the relation of both to public needs and efforts. And it is this persistent characteristic which makes the book (as the editor says) one very specially for ministers, though not for them only. But, largely owing to the occasional nature of these utterances, there is in them a force and a fire, a throb of vibrating personality, compared with which the analytical power and the spiritual elevation of the "Laws of Life" seem to produce somewhat of a lumen siccum. For that, I think, is their effect: the light is searching and isolating. A friend once described the effect of the study of Spinoza upon the student, as making him feel as if he lived in a glass house; and the reader of Mr. Thom's sermons sometimes feels like a naked soul in a rare atmosphere.

But the air into which this book introduces us, though keen and bracing, is intensely charged with human interests. Everything Mr. Thom says here about our Church-life, and its strength and its weakness, is as true as ever it was. The break in his ministry, 1854 to 1857, caused him to consider with fresh and anxious assiduity, the conditions of a Free Church and its work, of a Liberal preacher and his task; and the words in which he states the case in the "Preacher and the Church" are still the truest that I know. And all that one may read here of the Church in relation to material wealth and spiritual poverty, fulness of bread and leanness of soul—to the unchurched and the "submerged"—especially in the sermon on "Religion, the Church, and the People" here reprinted, we are glad to see, in its entirety, is of the highest and best sort, for minister and layman alike. This sermon is a vivid summary of the views and contentions most characteristic of the preacher, and the passages in which social questions are discussed are models of strenuous expression and penetrating wisdom.

From the order and grouping of the selections before us, it is not difficult to indicate the range of Mr. Thom's thought on the aims of the Church and the scope of the ministry. Let me briefly endeavour to do this, with liberty to dwell here and there upon a striking passage.

From the initial consideration of religion as "man's opening his spirit to the Divine Spirit," and the consequent "right relation of man to God"—evidenced by Jesus Christ who "taught a religion by being a religion" and is thus the living way to the Father—we pass to the spiritual unity which should be recognised by every Church that does not put an assent to doctrine or opinion in the place of the witness of the Spirit.

It is true that other Churches not only conceive that their very essence is bound up with a fixity of opinion which we regard as non-essential, but excommunicate us for the very reason that on our principles we can apply no such criterion to them. "No difference in doctrine requires us to regard any as fallen away from Christ." We will break no fellowship, deny no possible union with those by whom God is loved as the Father of our spirits. Why then have we a Church at all? "Because no other Church will permit us to be free; because no other Church will permit us to be true to our own light and to respect theirs." Intellectual liberty must be accompanied not only by freedom of spiritual sympathy, but with the power and wealth of a common love which will make of every newly found affinity of faith and life a ground of spiritual union and a bond of peace. Without such sympathy, liberty means disunion; with it, it means confidence to seek and ability to find perpetually revelations of God in the world of nature and of man.

> Our foundation is true and right even though much, or all, of what we have raised upon it should have to be superseded by better things—and in accepting these better things we shall shift no ground and lose no aspect of our life; we shall only be settled more worthily on our avowed foundation, nearer to the Spirit on whom alone we wait for our eternal growth. Nothing can disturb us here. Nothing in the boundless sphere of Theology coming suddenly to the light can shake any interest of ours. It can bless us; it cannot hurt us, it cannot trouble us. We have placed ourselves in voluntary subjection to no human error or imperfection. We have in the divine warfare of Truth given no hostages to fortune. To whomsoever God gives a victory, on which side soever His Truth may show itself, no pledge dear to us is in any danger. There are no obligations, no bonds, no vows, no prescriptions, no signatures under our hands, no implied engagements—no, not a vested interest to the value of as much as one hair of our heads to hold us back from going forth at once to welcome any new light with which God shall bless His Church. And this is not because we are loose—not because we are settled on no foundation—not because we have anchorage nowhere and are swept by every wind of doctrine—but because our foundation is the spiritual rock on which Christ built His Church, that rock where alone in the spiritual world we touch real ground, the Communion of God with Man. On that Rock we are open to every breathing of the Spirit: on that rock we are unshaken by the variable winds of human doctrine.—(Pp. 54, 55.)

When we turn to the selections that deal with the life and functions of the particular church, I am struck by the note of reiterated warning against vain and excessive expectations. What one may legitimately hope to get, from public worship, from church fellowship, from the words of the preacher, seems to be stated in the very lowest terms. Countless attendants at Renshaw-street Chapel did get more, I doubt not, than is here allotted to them: "God gave the increase," in ways which the preacher could not mark. But he is concerned that none shall think that he can get strength or sympathy, while he gives none; that he is praying, while he only assents to public prayer; or that to be pleased with a sermon is an equivalent for a spiritual frame of mind. And when he speaks of the preacher and his callings, he prompts the ejaculation, "Who is sufficient for these things?"

> When I speak of power in the pulpit, what kind of power is in my thought? The power of unaffected simplicity, the power of freshness, of earnest feeling coming visibly out of a living spring; the power of deep, searching, loving words, clear as the utterances of a child, but inexhaustible as the heart of Christ; the power of a large spiritual experience, to which the things of the soul are as palpable as the things of sense—in a word, the touch of nature, the unmistakable power of reality, dealing calmly with what it knows. This demonstration of the spirit and of power is the rarest of the gifts of God—the power of speaking lucidly and simply of those relations and aspects of our nature which connect us with the Infinite—with the infinite of Goodness, the infinite of Wisdom, the infinite of Holiness, the infinite of Blessedness, the infinite of Time and of Being.—(p. 79.)

The reader is thus prepared to find that Mr. Thom concentrates upon the pulpit all the distinctive function of the minister. To the due discharge of his prophetic mission everything must give way. The man "to whom the things of God come from face-to-face transmission of spirit and contemplation of Christ" must not be entangled with administrative details. The church's institutions and charities must not rest upon him. While every assumption of the official cleric melts away into the duties of Christian helpfulness that are common to all, the preaching of the Word is the minister's contribution to the spiritual growth of the world. He "is free for nothing else whatever that might deny success in this . . . For the professional minister of religion no place is reserved but the pulpit. To be powerless there, is to fail in the only matter that is exclusively in his hands." (p. 87.) And it is not inconsistent with this view that Mr. Thom should declare the demand made upon the minister for expression, to be excessive and disproportionate, tending to impoverish his life by enforced isolation, and withdraw him from sources of strength which might be found in communion of interest and work with others.

While protesting no less warmly than Mr. Thom would do against a prevalent modern conception which makes the minister a person whose duty it is to "be on hand" for any or every purpose, who will organise with equal facility a dramatic entertainment or a political demonstration, I, nevertheless, consider that his views are open to certain practical modifications. There is a whole sphere of work which is open to the minister as a minister, if he has an eye for opportunity, lying apart from that which he has in common with the public-spirited layman, and equally apart from the offices of private friendship. He will find things that he must do, because the Lord wants a man to do them. Through no seeking of his own, but merely from a knowledge that he is there for the sake of others, he will find ways of usefulness that are in themselves a justification of his ministry. He need not grieve that he cannot dwell continuously upon the mountain-top of immediate vision; a humbler speech than that of the prophet may convey a word of God. Indeed, much is to be said for that kind of preaching which does, in some measure, what is done by the religious conversation of friends; which carries on, into matters of life and experience, the aspiration and the sympathy which common prayer has awakened and sustained, and represents religion as a common joy, not as a private difficulty. I speak as one who was, in early life, intensely—as I now think, too exclusively—impressed by that view of the solemnity of the prophetic function of the ministry which I find here stated in the following words:—

Those who cannot speak except out of a living impulse, and who will not speak beyond the reality of present feeling, to whom yet God has not given the vision and the faculty that are ever ready, with whom their deepest feelings collect but slowly in their hearts, and have to be mused over long before the fire breaks forth—whose tears lie not too near their eyes, nor their words too near their lips,—are compelled often to be silent altogether, or else with shame, and mistrust, and a sense of failure, itself enfeebling and humiliating, to have recourse to something that did once come from a living spring.—(P. 96.)

I resolved, indeed, that I would not attempt to preach without the feeling that I had a word of first-hand conviction to speak. If I had it not, I would tell my congregation—I would offer them a lecture on some subject in which I had interest or information, but I would not write a sermon for the sake of having a sermon, when it was not "given me what I should speak."

In my unhappiness, I laid my case before Dr. Martineau. His advice was in this wise:—"As a matter of simple duty, as a matter of safeguarding your own honour, you must write that sermon, week after week. You must be clear with yourself that there is no shirking—no sheltering of negligence or indolence behind fine pretexts. Hour after hour, day after day if need be, you must sit down before your subject and your blank paper, determined to concentrate your thoughts, and exclude all distractions, and banish all excuses. The sermon must come: it may be a very bad one; you may not be able to preach it—but you must save your own soul. Yet more likely—though the first few pages may be very "sticky," some living water will, drop by drop, begin to flow—some course will open before your loyal persistence—and a word not yours may reach some other soul." And this is bracing and healthy advice, surely; and some comfort to those who have, with much travail of soul, to "beat their music out."

Mr. Thom's lofty view of the calling of the true preacher was accompanied by an intense belief in the efficacy of true preaching. He pictures a great future for free prophetic utterance, from the lips of a minister independent of congregational conditions. The selections in which we have the embodiment of this idea are particularly interesting just now, when the suggestions of a similar sort in Mr. Jacks's Manchester College Address are fresh in our minds. During his sojourn abroad Mr. Thom paid particular attention to the methods and conditions of preaching prevalent in continental churches. Here is a striking picture:—

I have seen in Rome a Monk of the preaching Order, emerge into the sunlight from one of the numerous churches in the neighbourhood of the Capitol, into whose open doors as you look from the outer brilliance the depth of the shadow seems dark as night, and with a few attendants bearing an elevated cross pass through the dense populations of the narrow streets that surround the Forum. First one, and then another follow him, until by the time he has reached the Coliseum a vast crowd is in his train. There, in the centre of the mighty amphitheatre, with thousands upon thousands grouped around him, he drops the priest and the theologian, and speaks with that direct earnestness of spiritual things which never reaches its height except when the speaker is in the presence of the naked majesty of men, and is looking into faces on which are depicted only the stern and solemn realities of life and nature—and when the throngs break up they carry away a spiritual impression, a new sentiment of God and of existence, which they never would have received but for the living invitation that called them there. Some substitute for this agency we must find in this country, for the great class that have now no living relations with religion: it is plain that we cannot begin with church-membership.—(Pp. 123, 124.)

It was this feeling of the need of some living word that should win the unchurched and God-forgetting to the sanctions and realities of religion, and set up a personal relation unrestrained by any formalities of organisation, unhampered by any proprietorship in a minister or a church, that led Mr. Thom to warmly espouse the project of a missionary branch of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, in which his friend, Mr. Henry A. Bright, was particularly interested. Its object was—if I rightly remember his words—"to colonise a portion of God's free earth in the interest of a gospel open to all"—and it was to the working men of the manufacturing districts that its efforts were especially directed.

Of the Liverpool Domestic Mission, which had its beginning in a sermon preached by Mr. Thom on Christmas Day, 1835, he was the life-long supporter. His last speech in public was delivered, I believe, on the occasion of the opening of its new buildings in Mill-street. But throughout the intervening years, he was never without the fear that the mission was annihilating the missionary. He had planted the first minister to the Poor, John Johns, to do his best, with a great heart and a great task, but without a meeting-room or a fixed religious service. The man and his word were to do their work, wholly apart from any congregational conditions or limitations. And all who were associated with him in the direction of Domestic Missions will remember how persistently he pleaded that the minister must be kept free from all the service of institutions and fixed engagements, and all the slavery of time-tables by which people endeavour to convince themselves that they have no time for anything. To him, the Domestic Missionary was the man who had the chance of the ideal ministry; and to him the possibility of realising it must be carefully reserved.

The words and the memory of a beloved teacher and friend, brought vividly before my mind by Mr. Davis's book, have led me too far into reminiscence and quotation. But I know I shall be forgiven by all those who are moved to buy the book and to quietly acquaint themselves with its contents.

J. E. ODGERS.

ONE of the notable books of the year just ended was the "Letters of John Richard Green," author of the famous "Short History of England," edited by Leslie Stephen. He was a man full of charm, humour, sympathy and learning. "You're a jolly, vivid man," Tennyson is reported to have said to Green, "and I'm glad to have known you; you're as vivid as lightning."

Green was born at Oxford in 1837, his father being described as "registrar and maker of silk gowns for fellows." He went to Magdalen School, where he was shy and studious, as many boys have been who make their mark in later days. At eighteen he won a scholarship at Jesus College, and spent four years in the University without distinction. He did not get on well with the men of his college, and he does not seem to have looked back on his University life with much pleasure. He found one real friend, Boyd Dawkins, now a famous geologist, and to him most of the early letters were written. After Oxford he took orders and accepted a curacy in the East-end of London, under the Rev. Henry Ward, father of Mr. Humphry Ward, who is well known to all of us both through his own and through his wife's writings. With Green's settlement as curate in the East-end begins the real interest of his life. That interest lies in the many-sided intensity of the man. He could spend half the day district visiting, serving on committees, attending tea meetings and school treats, and yet give himself unreservedly to the study of Anglo-Saxon history for three or four hours in the British Museum. Between whiles he would have tea at his rector's and romp with the children, and, after everything was over for the day, he would go home to his lodgings and write brilliant articles for the Saturday Review until the small hours of the morning. The following is Green's own account of one of his days:—

Breakfasting at 8, and snatching half-an-hour of Stanley's book over my bread and butter; then hurrying from morning prayer at St. Matthew's to open the school and confer with my vicar; letter and lecture-writing, visiting and the etceteras of the day till 12; then, after luncheon, a walk to the British Museum and grind there till 4.30; dinner and a trot home; tea at the parsonage; a chat with Mrs. Ward; a romp with the children till the parish again claims me from 7 to 9 for lectures, Bible classes, music do., confirmation do., committee meetings and the like. A good two hours' reading or sermon-writing sends me to bed at 12. But, you idle bucolic, what are you doing? Frittering yourself away, I fear, in little things, little social successes, little parsonic victories, little industries, little idlenesses. This is worse than our waste of those precious years at Oxford. Brace yourself, my dear M. to better things, worthier things than these.

There is a tendency amongst ministers to excuse mental incapacity and ignorance of books by mothers' meetings, committees and district visiting. "Life is so full of a number of things" we say with Stevenson, but instead of going on with him to think ourselves "as happy as kings," we think ourselves slaves and imagine we have no time for anything. It is quite possible, of course, as Green suggests, to lose ourselves in parish work, and to think only "of little social successes, little parsonic victories," but that is not the legitimate result of parish work. Gibbon learnt something which helped him in describing the military achievements of Imperial Rome from his experience as a captain of militia. Green learnt much which helped him in his social history of England from his experience of the characters and temptations of poor people in the East-end of London. There can be no question that there is a vast amount of human nature even in tea-meetings, and that to manage a cricket or dramatic club committee successfully may call forth a tactful diplomacy which will give us a real insight into the methods by which some bygone statesman managed men.

We ministers may learn from Green that it is possible to become scholars although immersed in the multifarious activities of the modern ministry, and even that the two very different forms of work may help each other. Green "lived with ancient monks as well as with modern district visitors," says Mr. Stephen, and they helped to explain one another. His "Short History," when it appeared, was a new thing; it was not a "drum and trumpet history." It was "nothing less," says Mr. Stephen, "than the first history of England which would enable his countrymen to gain a vivid and continuous perception of the great processes by which the nation had been built up." Men felt that this historian respected the people, and that he took note as no historian had done before of "the short and simple annals of the poor."

Green's first appearance as a historian was at a meeting of the Somerset Archæological Society at Wellington in 1862, when he read a paper upon "Dunstan." Freeman was present and recognised at once the striking knowledge and ability in this paper by a curate twenty-five years old. "You not only read your books well," he said, "but you know how to use them." From that time began a life-long friendship between them. At first the advantage was enormously on the side of Green, giving him confidence in himself and determination to go on. It was a great thing to have won, as it were at a blow, the generous appreciation and sympathy of such a man as Freeman. But Freeman has acknowledged in various places the obligations which he owed to Green. Especially striking was Green's power of understanding the life-history of towns. "It was," says Freeman, describing an Italian tour, "delightful to be with him; it was delightful to listen and learn from him. Here was municipality on its grandest scale. Never was he so thoroughly at home as in the stately town-house of an Italian city. One of the great days of one's life was the day when I first went to Ravenna with such a companion." "And now, O Johnny," he says in a letter ten years later, "as I have been rambling over endless cities, telling the towers thereof, let me once more thank you for having first taught me to do a town as something having a being of itself, apart from the churches, castles, &c., within it." The latter part of the "Life" is chiefly occupied with letters to Freeman, which show the delightful intimacy between the two.

Green's theological position is of great interest. He was a Broad Churchman at a time when there really seemed a chance that Broad Churchmen might become a power, and be able to break down the outworn doctrinal limitations of the English Church. As a curate of twenty-four he writes:—

> Where am I drifting to? To work fearlessly, to follow earnestly after truth, to rest with a childlike confidence in God's guidance, to leave one's lot willingly and heartily to Him—this is my sermon to myself. While we remain mere ministers of the Church of England we must be afraid of our neighbours' ill-will, of accusations of atheism, of "ignorant bishops"; but once become a minister of the Church Eternal and the cry of controversy falls unheeded on the ears. Of course, this is what people are ready to sneer at as mysticism. But in the union of mysticism with freedom of thought and inquiry will, I am persuaded, be found the faith of the future.

Ten years later, when he had tested Church creeds and doctrines by the histoical method which he had used in writing his "History of England," he writes:—

> One may ground one's religion on faith or fact—on the outer teaching of Church, or Bible, or sect, or on the inner teaching of experiment and knowledge. But it is impossible to combine the two. Sacrifice, justification, inspiration—all these things will seem to our children as absurd as Gnosticism or Transubstantiation seem to us. I don't say that a rational religion is impossible; on the contrary, it seems to me possible now as it never has been, but we can only reach it by flinging to the owls and bats these old and effete "theologies" of the world's childhood.

The world of theological thought has not moved on so fast as Green imagined. The power of the priest and of so-called evangelical Christianity seems greater now than then. The Broad Church spirit of such men as Stanley, Jowett, and Green is wanting; men who longed and hoped to bring the formularies of the Church into harmony with science and spiritual experience; men who believed that the time was ripe for "a rational religion," and that the Church of England would have the wisdom and strength to break its shackles and enter into its inheritance. There are multitudes to-day in the Church of England who are Unitarians, and yet greater multitudes, we fear, who are Agnostics, but none of them seem to care much to alter the formularies. They are content to listen to creeds, they do not believe, and prayers which very imperfectly correspond with their convictions and their real needs, for the sake of associations, music, a vague sense of unity with millions, and sometimes for the sake of the sermon. It is a strange and somewhat depressing phenomenon, but in spite of it we must still cherish Green's belief in the possibility of a rational religion, and from our obscure corners, and in our own poor way, urge that religion must be based on spiritual experience and knowledge, and that it must be in harmony with the teachings of science and history.

Speaking elsewhere of the question of remaining in the Church, he says:—

> There are clearly two errors to be avoided: (1) Remaining in a ministry without holding the prescribed doctrines of that ministry; (2) The opposite one of exaggerating one's own variance of opinion from the prescribed formularies. And there are two great principles to be kept in mind: (1) To remain in the ministry of the Church so long as by doing so one is helping to broaden its sphere of thought; (2) To quit it the moment continuance within it tends to narrow one's own.

Ill-health brought about by overwork saved Green from the necessity of breaking openly with the Church, though he did not conceal the fact that his opinions made it impossible for him to continue in his clerical profession. At the end of 1869 he had to consult Sir Andrew Clark, who told him that the state of his lungs was so serious that he must give up all parish work and go abroad. For a time it seemed as if the progress of the disease could not be stayed. Henceforward Green had to winter in the South of Europe, and by so doing prolonged his life for fourteen years, during which time all his histories were published. During this whole period he lived the precarious, troubled life of the consumptive. Nevertheless, his energy and determination grew ever keener; he worked as though under the shadow of death. He would "tear the heart out of a book" in a few hours, and wherever he might be he wrote, if his health made it in any way possible, with a continually increasing brilliancy and power. His courage and cheerfulness reminded us of that other famous consumptive, R. L. Stevenson. Both men fought on and did their work to the last; both men kept their joy in life and their sympathy with others throughout the long-protracted wearying sickness; both men gained in charm, in loveableness and in spiritual strength through the struggle that they made. "He was invariably patient and gentle, and never cooled in his political and historical enthusiasm," says Mr. Stephen. "When he felt a tendency to depression, he would ask for a stiff book: he wanted 'something to set his teeth into.'" In his last years Mr. Stopford Brooke and his family were amongst his best and kindest friends. "He never forgot that there were two friends, Mr. Stopford Brooke and his publisher (Macmillan) who were unvarying in their belief in his work and hopefulness of the result." In 1877 he married Miss Alice Stopford, a relation of Mr. Brooke's, and henceforward he was tended and helped to the limit of human power. Mrs. Humphry Ward describes the afternoons in those latest days:—

> When the pretty house in Kensington-square was the centre of a small society such as England produces much more rarely than France. Mr. Lecky came, Sir Henry Maine, Mr. Freeman, Bishop Stubbs, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Brooke, and many others. There in the corner of the sofa sat the thin, wasted form, life flashing from the eyes, breathing from the merry, eloquent lips, beneath the very shadow and seal of death — the eternal protesting life of the intelligence. His talk gave perpetually. Mr. Green's was talk of the best kind, abundant, witty, disinterested; and his poetical instinct for the lives and thoughts of others, his quick imagination, his humane and human curiosity about all sorts and sides of things made pose and pedantry impossible to him.

In March, 1883, the end came at Mentone. He had been dying for some months, but the "Conquest of England" still went on. "One morning in January, he had a momentary access of strength," and by Mrs. Green's hand "he wrote several sheets of the first chapter. That was his last piece of work. 'Now I am weary,' he said, 'and can work no more.'" Enough of the book had been written to enable Mrs. Green to put together the fragments and bring it out in a few months." "On March 3 he took leave of his friends, and afterwards saw no one but his wife. He died on March 7. Sir Lauder Brunton said that his force of will and enthusiasm for his work had kept him alive for two years longer than any doctor would have thought possible. He told his wife that what had kept him alive was his dread of separation from her."

We all owe Mr. Green a deep debt of gratitude for his books on English History, but as we read his life we feel that the debt is greater than we knew. Inspiring as are his books, his life is more inspiring still. HENRY GOW.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

IN the Contemporary for this month will be found some very interesting comments on Canon Henson's plea in the December number for "The Recognition of Non-Episcopal Churches." The Bishop and Dean of Durham, the Deans of Ripon and Ely, and the Rev. H. Rashdall all agree that the crucial doctrine of "apostolical succession" which makes the clergy of the Episcopal Church the only valid dispensers of the Word and the Sacraments, is without historical foundation, and must not be allowed to stand in the way of the frankest recognition of the non-Episcopal Churches and their ministers. Only Dean Stephens of Winchester represents the High Church view and rigidly maintains the Episcopal Order as of exclusive and Divine appointment. The other five Churchmen differ only as to what it is wise to aim at in the immediate future, whether some alteration of the present Church Order (which might shut out the High Churchmen and not draw in others), or simply a more genuine unity of spirit and hearty co-operation in religious work. To the same number Mr. J. A. Hobson contributes a thoughtful paper on "Ruskin and Democracy"; Mr. C. F. G. Masterman vividly pictures the "Social Abyss" which exists in this enlightened Christian country, his text being Mr. B. S. Rowntree's "Poverty: a Study of Town Life," reviewed in last week's INQUIRER; Mr. C. W. Sorensen pleads forcibly in "Back to the Land" for extended and improved agriculture, which, however, must first be rendered practicable by a reformed land-tenure. The rector of Johannesburg, with a rather lofty contempt of those who dare to judge of South African affairs without having lived in the country, furnishes some useful food for thought on "The Native Problem in South Africa." He is particularly severe on the humanitarian dread of "forced labour," and points out that as the natives are no longer allowed to fight as of old they must learn to work. Whether it will be best for them to be drafted into the mines or to engage in agriculture, the rector does not explicitly say.

In the Nineteenth Century and After Sir Joshua Fitch writes on the "Education Problem," showing how essential it is that there should be one authority in each district for Elementary, Secondary and Technical education, and giving the weight of his vote for the School Board as, on the whole, the best authority. He strongly advocates the maintenance of the present compromise in the matter of religious teaching, as better suited to the temper of this country than the alternative "secular" system of America, or the confusion and mischief that would follow an attempt to introduce religious teachers of various denominations into all schools. The Hon. Rollo Russell's article on "The Reduction of Town Fogs" is based on long and careful observation, and contains suggestions for the amelioration of present evils, which should bear good fruit. Canon Cheyne contributes a fearless article on "A Turning Point in Old Testament Study," calling special attention to Hugo Winckler's Geschichte Israels, which finds in a celestial mythology the basis of the old patriarchal histories, even David and Jonathan being mixed up with the heavens. A moderate conservatism, Canon Cheyne thinks, can no longer avail, if any progress is to be made in the true interpretation of the Old Testament. The old methods of criticism have practically done their work; the hope of the future, both for scholarship and religion, lies in the frank recognition of the Old Testament as part of a larger Semitic antiquity. Lady Hely-Hutchinson's article on "Female Emigration to South Africa" should be noted by all who are interested in the great servant question, and particularly by those who have any practical connection with the country in question.

The Monthly Review has one article to which we desire especially to call the attention of our readers, "Religio Pueri," by the Rev. J. H. F. Peile, dealing in a clear and very wholesome manner with the religious training of boys in our public schools. Mr. Peile insists at the outset that nothing can take the place of the parents' home teaching and influence, both before the time comes for the boy to be sent to school, and afterwards when he is home for holidays.

A boy home for the holidays is a privileged being, subject to nothing like the discipline of the child who lives at home. He is generally much with his elders, and it is the fashion nowadays to talk very freely before children; and if he sees that they are selfish and ill-tempered and mean, that they are careless of their religious duties (by which I mean far more than regular church-going) and of their duties to their dependents, that they consider being well-off and having a good time as the really important thing, if he is encouraged to be pert and self-willed, it is not likely that any teaching he may get at school will convince him of the beauty of self-sacrifice and obedience. It may fairly be objected that it would be worse still for a boy to live all the year in a careless home; but my point is that parents, by handing over their children at an early age to professional teachers and guardians, lose all sense of responsibility, and treat them in the holidays with an indulgence and what is really an indifference, which quickly undermine the character that school-training is intended to give; whereas, if the father and mother felt that their son was really in their charge, they would discipline themselves not to offend his innocence, or risk his loving reverence, and both sides would have, at least, a chance of gaining that mutual knowledge which is the power to help, instead of the superficial intercourse which often leaves those who are nearest in blood strangers all their lives.

The article then describes the head-master's ideal of religious teaching in the school, and has some wise words of warning against "revivalist methods" with boys, and on the head-master's great opportunity in the pulpit. Mr. Peile writes as a Churchman, but one who regards Christianity, not as a system of ritual, a moral code or theological formula, "but a habit of mind, founded on a right conception of God, and determining the whole outlook on life and the world."

To the Fortnightly Mr. James Bryce contributes a most interesting article on "Some Traits of Mr. Gladstone's Character," and Mr. Arthur Symons a study of Wordsworth, in which he does not spare the great poet's weaknesses; but the most valuable article in this Review is Mr. G. J. Holyoake's on "Higher Co-operation: Its Inner History," which, from the writer's intimate knowledge, traces the growth of that remarkable movement and foreshadows its yet greater capacity for good in the future. "The two divisions of co-operation," Mr. Holyoake says, "are distributive and productive. Distribution moves on a lower level than production. Participation in the profit of a store enables the worker's income to go further, but participation in the workshop increases his income. Higher co-operation applies the principle to life as well as to commerce—to character as well as to industry." And in a later passage, objecting to Carlyle's unqualified dictum as to the "perennial nobleness and even sacredness in work," since forced labour, where there is no just payment cannot be so described, Mr. Holyoake urges that "profit is robbery which is not fairly shared among those who mainly create it," and that labour, as the workman's capital, should be respected like the rich man's capital.

Let those who control fortunes give heed to the great words of Dante: "Look how thou walkest. Take good heed thy feet do not tread on the heels of thy poor brethren." This is Higher Co-operation.

THE LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY'S APPEAL.

SIR,—A few weeks ago the Committee of the London Domestic Mission Society felt it their duty to issue an urgent appeal for new subscriptions. Will you allow me, on behalf of the Committee, to say a few words with reference to the matter?

Largely through the death of many old and liberal supporters, the income of the Society has suffered considerably during the last few years, whilst, meanwhile, its work has been largely extended, and the expense of carrying it on has consequently increased. As stated in the circular, it has only been possible to keep the existing missions on foot, through using as income many legacies, which, from time to time, have been received, and which ought to have been invested as capital. It need not be said that the falling in of legacies cannot be relied upon, and in 1901, when none were forthcoming, the Society had to face the serious prospect of an adverse balance of over £500 on the year's accounts. First of all, the Committee laid the facts of the case before their present subscribers, with the most encouraging result, for 78 of those subscribers have promised to increase their subscriptions, and an additional income of £130 a year has thus been secured. The Committee desire to acknowledge in the warmest way their gratitude to these old friends, many of whom were previously contributing most generously to the Society's funds. It was no easy thing to ask them to do more, and only the pressing need induced the Committee to do so. On the other hand, the appeal for new subscribers has hitherto met with but small and disappointing response. At the moment of writing, only twenty promises have been received, amounting in all to some £30 a year.

The Committee are aware that other calls have recently been made upon your readers, but they cannot think that the members of our churches will allow a good and flourishing work, which has been persistently pursued for sixty-five years, and which was never more successful than at the present time, to be curtailed or discontinued for want of the small annual sum that is now required. Could it only be realised how disheartening it is for those responsible for the work of the Missions to be perpetually in anxiety as to how they are to make ends meet, there would surely be sufficient interest aroused to change the present state of things. It is impossible to be for ever issuing appeals for help, and the Committee have now done their utmost to make the facts known, and they leave it with the members of our churches to decide whether the Missions are to be maintained or not. An additional £300 a year would enable the work to be efficiently done, and it is earnestly hoped that this sum will now be raised. Many kind friends have sent donations towards the present deficit, and these, of course, are welcome, but the need can only be met by the regular assured income, which annual subscriptions supply. Next week a list of the promises received will appear in your advertising columns; meanwhile, the treasurer (Philip Roscoe, Esq., 28, Denning-road, Hampstead, N.W.) hopes to obtain a large number of new names.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Small Things of the World.

I.

HAVE you ever watched the ants building their ant-hills in the woods? They seem to be only running to and fro and carrying tiny sticks, which, however, are great things to them; but their big ant-hills grow, till we wonder that such tiny creatures can make such great heaps.

If you climbed to the top of St. Paul's, and looked round on all London stretched below, you would see the people in the streets looking no bigger than ants. And yet the whole of London has been built by little people like those!

In the country, or the parks and gardens, you have seen little heaps of earth thrown up by the worms. As people or animals walk over them, or the rain washes them down, the soil gets scattered again, and spread over the ground; and this is always going on—the soil that was below becomes the surface, so that the surface is always changing; and so busily do the worms work that in time they change even the shapes of the hills!

A man who is a builder does not do all the work himself, he employs a number of labourers, and each does a share; and in the same way God does not do all the work Himself, but sets others to do it; He gives the ants, the worms, the bird and beasts, the sea, the clouds and wind all their own share of work to do, and nothing is too great or too small to have its own share. They are His messengers, to do His bidding, and He is the Master that portions out the work that is fit for each. And some of the work He gives to men; and to make their work easier and quicker God has put it into the minds of some men to invent machines; and other men who are less clever are quite clever enough to learn to use and manage them. The steam which comes from boiling water has been made use of to drive our trains and steamboats. The electricity which makes the flashes of lightning men have caught and learnt to use for the telegraphs to carry our messages over the world. In all these things it is seemingly a little thing that does the work. The engine-driver has to keep water in his boiler, and keep a good fire, and keep his engine well oiled, and then if he only turns a handle or a wheel, the whole great train comes to a stop, or goes faster as he wishes.

In a ship the steersman turns a wheel, and that moves the rudder, and then see how the great ship turns round obediently. The writer of the Epistle of James says, "Behold the ships, which though they be so great, and are driven of fierce winds, yet are they turned about with a very small helm"; and, "Behold we put bits in the horses' mouths, that they may obey us; and we turn about their whole body." The horse's bit is a very little thing, but the good horse obeys every movement of the bit, and does what his master wishes.

But in all these things there is a something behind the small thing that does the work. There is an engine-driver behind that handle to move it. There is a steersman at the helm of the ship to direct it. There is a rider on that horse to hold the bridle, which pulls the bit. And behind the little ants and worms—why, there is God, who puts the instincts into them and teaches them what to do; and God is behind the engine-driver, the steersman, and the rider too, and gives them their power and knowledge. There is a living Will which guides and directs everything, and makes his children and servants wise and obedient.

Every little thing, however small, is of some use; and every little person, however small, has his work in the world.

Words are very little things, but one little word may have a wonderful influence. A word may give pain, or a word may give joy. A word may keep back a man from sin, or encourage him to it; a word may guide into the right or the wrong way. The same epistle says, "The tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things."

Here is a story of what one little word did; for children can sometimes be like the little bit, which guides the strong horse, or the rudder that turns the noble ship.

A poor labourer had a little sick girl whom he loved more than anything in the world. He had no work to do, for he lost his last place because he got drunk. They were almost starving, and he was quite desperate as to how to get food for his child. He met two bad looking men as he was idling about, and they offered him a job; so he agreed at once, though he suspected that it would be no honest job. He was to meet them at night, and to be very quiet; and he suspected that they were thieves, but he asked no questions. As night came near he began to wish he had not said "yes." His little girl was ill and restless, and he did not like to think what he might be going to do. A kind neighbour had given them a little food, and Maggie was sleeping now and then, when midnight came and he was to go. He quietly took his hat and opened the room door and was just going, when Maggie raised her head, and said "Father."

Only one little word; but he shut the door again, and came to her bedside. He could not go, for Maggie wanted him. "Where are you going, Father?" said she. "Nowhere, darling," he said, and put away his hat. And the two men waited for him in vain. Next morning he went out to look for work, and he got a job, in carrying a heavy bag for a gentleman from the station—for which he got sixpence; and with delight he took home some bread and some milk and made a nice breakfast of hot bread and milk for Maggie and himself. How they enjoyed it! And he loved Maggie better than ever, because she had unconsciously kept him back from doing wrong.

It was only that little word which she had spoken, but there was a power behind the little word. It was the love in their two hearts which drew the father and his little girl together; and that love was given them by God. See how in all things God gives out His work to be done by His children, as a wise master-builder gives to each labourer his share; and how each of us is bringing our little stick or crumb of soil to build up the world in which we live!

I have another story to tell you, and more to say; and Mr. Editor kindly allows me to finish next week; so remember this "column," and look out for the rest in the next INQUIRER.

LONDON, JANUARY 11, 1902.

AN URGENT APPEAL.

WE have to ask the serious attention of our readers, and especially of those in and about London, to the letter of the Rev. G. DAWES HICKS, secretary of the London Domestic Mission Society, which appears in another column. The work of that Society is in danger of suffering from a heavy deficit, which, if not adequately met, must mean a crippling of beneficent activities in the three Mission stations now maintained, or the abandonment of one of those posts of duty, which, as it is, are all too few and too imperfectly occupied amid the crying needs of the desolate poverty of this vast city. That such a disaster will be allowed to happen, we do not for a moment believe ; but amid the multiplicity of interests and claims in our crowded life it is not easy to concentrate attention even upon a matter so vital as this, and we fear that a circular appeal will not suffice. In every one of our churches this matter might well be brought directly home to the heart and conscience of those who feel that their religion calls them to the service of their brethren, and most urgently to the service of those whose need is greatest.

In March it will be just seventy years since the first Domestic Mission station was established in London. The example of Dr. JOSEPH TUCKERMAN'S work in Boston, Mass., had roused our churches in this country to a new sense of their duty to the neglected poor in great cities, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, at the instance chiefly of the Rev. W. J. Fox, took up the work. At a great meeting of Unitarians held at Manchester in 1830 the subject was brought forward, and as a result, in March, 1832, a weaver's shed in Spitalfields was converted into a humble chapel and the ministry to the poor of that district was entrusted to the Rev. J. K. PHILP. Thus was established the old Spicer-street Domestic Mission, with which the late C. L. CORKRAN was for so many years identified. In 1835 it was judged better that this work among the poor should be directed by a separate society, and the London Domestic Mission Society was founded, for which the appeal now is made, that its activities may not be allowed to suffer for the want of a sufficient yearly income.

From the humble beginning of seventy years ago the work has been extended and has stimulated other independent efforts. The Society now maintains the three Mission stations in George's-row, St. Luke's, Rhyl-street, Kentish Town, and Bell-street, Marylebone, while kindred Missions in Mansford-street, Bethnal Green (representing the original Spicer-street Mission), and Stamford-street, Blackfriars, are maintained by separate societies. These five Missions are a charge upon the faithfulness of our London churches, and we ought, perhaps, now to add a sixth in Bermondsey. They represent in the most direct and effective manner the effort of our faith in human brotherhood, and the power of Christian love and helpfulness, to penetrate into the most neglected quarters, to befriend the lonely and the bearers of the heaviest burdens, and to be true to the Master's calling, that the poor shall indeed have the Gospel preached to them.

The cost of this work, on the financial side, judging from the last published reports, is something over £2,250 a year, of which more than £1,300 is required for the maintenance of the three stations of the London Domestic Mission Society. But the Committee's appeal, enforced by Dr. HICKS's letter, shows how seriously the finances of that Society have suffered of recent years through the death of old and liberal supporters, so that a crisis in the work has now to be met. It is gratifying to learn that as many as seventy-eight of the old supporters of the Society have promised increased subscriptions, amounting to an additional income of £130 ; but, on the other hand, only twenty promises of new subscriptions have been forthcoming, amounting to some £30. Thus it becomes a serious question how best the appeal can be brought home to the members of our London churches, that they may realise the need and the significance of this common work of Christian faithfulness.

At the last autumn meeting of the London District Unitarian Society, the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, speaking from a wide practical knowledge of the needs of London, and from a deep sense of the overwhelming claims of the poor of this vast and wealthy city upon the devoted service of those who have gifts of the higher life to impart, urged that each of our richer established congregations ought to undertake as its special charge the maintenance of at least one Domestic Mission, making itself responsible both for the necessary income and for the personal service which is even more essential to the complete equipment of such a ministry. And there can be no question, to our mind, that it is an immeasurable gain to a congregation when the members in the union of their common religious life undertake such a trust, and feel it to be a vital part of their own congregational activity that they should thus give of their means, their strength, and their self-forgetting brotherly love, for the sake of ministering in some desolate quarter to those whose need is so much greater than their own. At the same time we should strongly deprecate any re-adjustment of activities that would tend to weaken the sense of direct responsibility in our community as a whole for this common work. It may be wise to concentrate the services of one church on one special field of Mission work, so that a definite and concrete appeal may be made to individual members to take their part in the great endeavour ; but surely the whole work will be strengthened, and the ideal of devoted service will appeal with greater force, when it is clear that as a united people we have accepted a great trust and are engaged in one common work. As it is, it would be well if, in addition to the annual meetings of the three societies, we could have one great Mission meeting in which, apart from the business details of the work, we could every year be united in an act of renewed consecration, and realise afresh the claims of this ministry and the inspiration which may be ours in the self-forgetfulness and self-sacrifice which it demands.

Meanwhile, we beg of those who have hitherto been neglectful of this work to look into it, to read the reports of the missionaries, to ask of those who are engaged in many forms of helpful service at the various centres, what they find in it, what is really accomplished, and then to see whether they are not obliged at least to give that help which an adequate income demands.

ON Tuesday evening, in the series of lectures arranged by the Humanitarian League on "Pioneers of Humanitarianism," the Rev. W. J. Jupp, of Liverpool, is to lecture at Essex Hall on "Ruskin." The lecture is at eight o'clock, and the chair is to be taken by Mr. J. A. Hobson.

DR. WILLIAM SMYTH MEMORIAL FUND. —The Rev. C. J. Street acknowledges with thanks receipt of £10 10s. from Mr H. Woolcott Thompson. The total sum which he has received amounts to £95 18s. 6d.; and the Fund itself has nearly reached £5,000.

DR. JOHNSON'S NEW YEAR PRAYER.

THERE was sold at Sotheby's the other afternoon an autograph prayer of the great Dr. Johnson. It was dated Jan. 1, 1784, and it contained this devout plea for divine favour:—"I am now beginning another year. Grant that the time which Thou shalt yet allow me may be spent in Thy fear and to Thy glory; give me such ease of body as may enable me to be useful; and remove from me all such scruples and perplexities as encumber and obstruct my mind." Too devout and solemn, we may exclaim, to be put up and knocked down amid the bidding of a public auction room! It was sold for £13: our interest in it is otherwise.

We are beginning another year. What is our prayer—unspoken, unwritten, yet still our prayer. If it be at all like this, it will not be amiss. It is urged that we unduly exalt the importance of these time divisions, this transition of dates, to the depreciation of the ordinary days. Well, let that pass, for, as Lamb truly says, "No one ever regarded the 1st of January with indifference." Of the two birthdays which belong to us, the birth of our life and the birth of the year, the one is ours alone, but the other is that from which all men date their time. It is no mere habit, but a true life-instinct which invests the new days with vital significance.

"Grant that the time which Thou shalt yet allow me may be spent in Thy fear, and to Thy glory." The time still allowed to Dr. Johnson was not to be long, for he did not live to see another New Year's Day; it may be even so—it will be so—with many who are reading THE INQUIRER to-day. But all the same, be our time remaining short or long, shall it not be "in Thy fear, and to Thy glory"? This is more than the phraseology of a conventional piety. How we lack its strong solidity. The fear of God, once too terribly conceived, seems no longer to curb the world; the dread of His righteous retribution holds in no national sin; the reverence for His Almighty justice finds no Cromwell in these later days. When Mr. Gladstone was asked to name the greatest change that had taken place in his lifetime, he answered: "The weakened sense of sin." Yet the sense of sin is the source of salvation; the greatest sin is to be conscious of none; the saint is the one in whom this sense is most keen. Will the New Year "abash our guilty negligence," and shame us into moral enterprise again?

And if the fear of the Lord be a less worthy motive than the thought of Him whom we serve and love, let us rise to the height of that nobler incentive—"to the glory of God!" How one ought to respond to that cry with glad and ready alacrity. To spend and be spent for the glory of God is to reck not the praise or blame of the world, to scorn self-seeking and self-calculation, to resign our self-importance, and realise that we are about God's business. One of our ministers always announces his hymns—"Let us sing to the praise and glory of God," and so sets the whole tone of the service. There is much good work amongst us, but too little praise; much consideration of our difficulties, but too little thanksgiving for our extraordinary mercies and peculiar privileges; much dissection of doctrine, but too little of the Shepherds' Christmas song. And yet that is the right New Year note.

And hence the petition which most penetrates into details and seems to search out our gravest defects is that wherein Dr. Johnson prays "remove from me all such scruples and perplexities as encumber and obstruct my mind." Here, indeed, is a New Year word for ourselves, our churches, and our cause. Perplexities must meet those who depart from the beaten track, but remove all encumbrance and obstruction which are of our own making, our rank individualism, our rationalistic satisfaction, our lack of spiritual enterprise, our weak faith in the Church, our unwillingness to acknowledge mistakes and to remodel our methods to wider needs. We need more venturesomeness in our personal efforts, as in our constitutional organisations. We have personal workers who will only run along the old lines and within the old limits; we have provincial assemblies which are afraid to trust themselves to their own resources; we have a National Conference which is simply full of precious powers and opportunities, but towards which it is deemed treason to pay loyal allegiance or put its powers to use. Our people have been defined as "those who always see nine reasons against any venture for one in its favour." We are too afraid of failure, too cautious to launch forth on great issues, too cold to throw ourselves and our message on the world. It is only brave hearts that can practise that religious recklessness, that Christian carelessness which at all hazards seeks first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness and leaves the other and minor things to be added, perchance, in their time and place. If we have our virtues, we have also their defects. Let us say that we are conscientious, tenacious of our past, scrupulous in our veraciousness, critical, rational, independent in our judgment—yes, and all these qualities need no defence. But there is an over-conscientiousness about small details which takes the spring out of great principles, a scrupulosity about the letter which chills the spirit, a rationalistic logic which at once puts to flight the mystery, the poetry, the spirituality of life. These are encumbrances which obstruct our path, cold draughts which reduce our temperature, ordinary ideas which kill the high spirit of adventure. It is not temerity but timidity from which we suffer. He will do us most service whose New Year advice is "Thank God and take courage. The old world is young again, is new with opportunity for children of the day. It is full of strange and wondrous things: be adventurous and go in search." The souls of large adventure in all the churches compass us about and call to us to abandon our plausibilities and our content. Let us have courage enough to embark on new ventures of faith, and "whether on the 1st of January or the 31st of December," to quote Stevenson, "faith is a good word to end on."

Good day, new world! Like him of Genoa
We, glad adventurers, kneel and kiss the strand
Of our surprise—this new discovered land
Of time—and cry Good day, new world! Good day!
Onward, brave hearts, 'gainst odds who'd say us nay.
Make them allies to lead us into the proud
Possession of ourselves and of the way,
O year! New year! World yet untried and strange!
For him who thus adventures, all good things
You hold in store; for he it is who brings
Hope to the front, and courage; him no change
Shall harm or weaken, nor shall any chance
Rob him of his divine inheritance.

TEMPERANCE REFORM.

THE drink bill for the United Kingdom reached an appalling figure last year, amounting to no less than £160,809,718; whereas the whole revenue of the Christian Churches for religious purposes is estimated at £25,000,000, of which the Church of England accounts for a little more than half. £306 per minute is spent in intoxicants in this country, and the average consumption for the year is £3 18s. 8d. per head. As some millions of the population consume no alcohol at all, it is evident that the drink bill of many people must be unconscionably heavy.

As regards temperance legislation, the year brought only one step in advance, but even for that we may be thankful under present circumstances. Bills to deal with habitual drunkards and the licensing sessions, though the Government took them over from private hands, were included in the the annual "Massacre of the Innocents." The Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Bill shared a better fate. So much pressure in its favour was brought to bear upon the Government from all parties in the House and in the country that they found themselves compelled to support it, and allow it to become law; but they insisted upon "amendments" aimed at the very principle of the measure. Instead of making it a penal offence to supply any child under sixteen years of age with intoxicating liquor, they have reduced the age to fourteen, thrown the onus of proving age from the publican on to the prosecution, and allowed young children to be served with "such intoxicating liquors as are sold or delivered in corked and sealed vessels in quantities not less than one reputed pint." However, even with these wretched limitations it is an Act of Parliament which will save us from many evils from which we have hitherto suffered. "An ill-favoured thing, but mine own," as Touchstone said of poor Audrey! Mr. Caine well described the situation by saying that we had asked for twenty shillings in the pound, and got threepence. But every temperance reformer, who is a wise man, will take what he can get in the way of concession, and, like Oliver Twist, ask for more.

The year has been remarkable for the great outburst of public opinion in favour of legislation on the lines of Lord Peel's Report. That statesman himself has thrown his heart into the work of advancing the cause of temperance in this way. Great and representative conferences have been held in various parts of the kingdom. The Church of England Temperance Society has heartily supported the movement—the best thing this organisation has ever done yet, in my opinion. Party lines have been obliterated in cordial association for a common cause. Extreme temperance reformers have found themselves side by side with party politicians, who never had a good word to say for them, and with prominent citizens who had never been on a temperance platform before and cared nothing for politics. No movement in recent times has shown so much prospect of success. If it goes on gathering impetus at the same rate, it will be irresistible.

The Birmingham Borough Bench, under the leadership of Mr. Arthur Chamberlain—and, it would seem, under the inspiration, or, at least, with the avowed approval of his brother, the Colonial Secretary—have taken decided action towards bringing about a change in the Law in three directions suggested by the Royal Commission. They ask (1), that the ante-1869 beerhouses should be placed under the full discretion of the licensing justices, as the victuallers' licences are; (2), that the off-licences for the sale of wine and spirits should be under their discretion like the beer off-licences; and (3), that clubs should require a justice's licence if intoxicants are sold there. They have invited the co-operation of all the borough benches in the country in bringing pressure to bear upon the Home Secretary to introduce legislation to this effect, and most are responding favourably. It would be a great step towards a better state of things if this movement should succeed.

The "Free Churches," from which the Unitarians have not been excluded on this occasion, have joined in a great effort during the past year to secure a million new pledges to mark the opening of the Twentieth Century. This has meant the expenditure of much money and still more loving labour; and, so great has been the response, that it would seem more than probable that the goal will be reached. It was within sight when the last statistics came to hand.

A most encouraging feature of the past year has been the development of the doctors in the direction of temperance. Their leading exponents are now preaching the doctrines about alcohol which Dr. Benjamin Richardson advocated a quarter of a century ago, when he seemed to be a voice crying in the wilderness. Among medical experts of to-day the prescription of alcohol is now the exception, and no longer the rule. Professor Victor Horsley, who is recognised by the profession as a competent authority, created much stir by his lectures on "The Influence of Alcohol on the Nervous System." In these he showed that it is scientifically true that wine is a mocker. Alcohol, even in small quantities, had a detrimental effect on the brain, both as regards ideation and volition. He wholly excluded alcohol as a diet. From the scientific standpoint the contention that even small doses of alcohol, such as people took with meals, had no deleterious effect could not be maintained, so that total abstinence must be the course of those who desired to follow the plain teaching of truth and common sense.

In view of such an authority—and Mr. Horsley by no means stands alone in the new presentation of this question—we should be well advised to change our family physician if he still insists that alcohol is a food or even a necessary medicine. A little firmness of this kind would soon bring the doctors up to date; and even if they came over as unwilling converts, a short experience of the new régime would give them the faith they lack. I suggest this as a first practical step towards temperance reform for the new year.

The operation of the Children's Act should be carefully watched. All kinds of difficulties will present themselves, and in many quarters attempts will be made to defeat the intention of the Act. Some of the brewers in London, Liverpool, and elsewhere, foresee the difficulties and dangers so clearly that they have resolved to supply no intoxicants of any kind to children under fourteen. They are much to be congratulated on this decision, and many children will thus be saved from contamination. But gummed paper will be used in some places as a "seal," and other tricks and evasions will be resorted to. All friends of the children should become members of an informal Vigilance Committee to report flagrant breaches of the law and even doubtful cases to the local Temperance Society, so that the various issues may be brought to a test.

No effort should be spared to back up the proposals of the Birmingham Justices. Pressure should be brought upon members of every borough bench to support them. Here is a piece of practicable legislation which we may well look to this Government to give us; for is not Mr. Chamberlain its strongest member, and has he not given it his imprimatur? The Habitual Drunkards Bill also, and the other little measure which the Government sacrificed last year, should be brought out of their retreats and passed into law. This will only be done if sufficient stress of public opinion is brought to bear, and that to some extent depends upon us.

What more can we do for the good cause during the coming year? Continue the agitation for legislation on the lines of Lord Peel's Report; watch the Brewster and Transfer Sessions, so as to prevent the introduction of new licences and secure the destruction of old ones whose conditions have been abused; keep the local authorities up to the mark—if you can: it is not easy—in enforcing the licensing laws as they already exist; and, above all, lose no heart and abandon no effort on behalf of moral 'suasion. Personal influence is the strongest force for temperance after all; and without it, legislation will fail. Abstain from intoxicants yourself, for your own sake, and still more for the sake of the brethren; and then, individually or in association or in both, bring your forces to bear against those of self-indulgence and sensuality, so as to help on the coming of the better time when our country shall be the land of the sober as well as of the free.

C. J. STREET.

THE man who has obeyed his heavenly vision, who has been crowding his old self out by the spiritual method of forming a new life within—who at length has taken a degree in the divine school—sees truth because now he has an organ to see it with. He is not less of a man, but rather more of one. God does not use him as a telephone to talk through, or as a caligraph to write through, or as a passive window to send light through, or as a stringed instrument to send music through. He uses him because he is a holy man who can grasp spiritual truth, and put it into holy terms.—Prof. Rufus Jones.

ASPECTS OF WOMEN'S WORK IN 1902.

Now that the large majority of societies and agencies for work amongst women and children are represented in the National Union of Women Workers, it is possible to gain a fairly wide outlook from its standpoint of the scope of philanthropic work undertaken by women in England. Its bulk and variety forms a strange contrast to what one gleans of the extent of such work a century ago. It was in 1810 that Sarah Martin began her labours of love in the Norwich Workhouse, and in 1813 that Elizabeth Fry paid her first visit to Newgate; but we hear of no organisations for inquiring into the needs, and helping to relieve the distresses, of the sufferers from want and crime, whose name must have been legion in those dark days of war and famine. But there was a wonderful awakening of philanthropy during the century, and in this women took their full share. Gradually the truth dawned on them that their duties to mankind were not limited to the four walls of their own homes, but that women as well as men had a work to do in the great world outside, and a call from God Himself to help forward the coming of His kingdom upon earth. The belief in this truth may be taken as the pith and kernel of what is called the "Woman's Movement" in the last half-century, and helps to explain the interest taken by women, not only in philanthropy, but politics, which, after all, is but the other side of the same shield. At the present time, indeed, it is the political side which engrosses many minds, and no aspect of women's work would be complete which did not take account of their desire and effort to gain sufficient power in the body politic to enable them to grapple at first hand with the pressing social problems of our day. Those who have worked longest and most successfully in the philanthropic field, and have then been chosen by their fellow-citizens to fill some public post, bear unanimous testimony to the fact that more real and lasting good can be done by them in the latter than the former sphere of work. Hence the dismay produced by the legal decisions disqualifying women for membership of County Councils and London Borough Councils, and the dread of equally paralysing legislation in regard to the new Secondary Education Authorities, and the possible supersession of School Boards. Many wise and able men are doing their utmost to amend past errors and avert the threatened dangers; but considering the immense number of women and children whose interests are directly involved in all these proposals of legislation, it is especially a woman's question, and at the present time many of our ablest women are devoting to it all their energies. In this connection it is imperative to mention the vexed question of Women's Suffrage, for it is an undeniable fact that the vast majority of women whose names are in the forefront of the workers in philanthropy are more and more convinced as the years roll by, that the vote is the most powerful tool they can secure for accomplishing the good they have at heart.

It is, therefore, needless to say that women's suffrage societies are on the roll of the National Union of Women Workers, and to this are also affiliated the 'Women's Local Government Association" and the "Committee for Securing the Presence of Women on Secondary Education Authorities," which are now more active than at any previous time. There is also a "Legislation Committee," which holds, as it were, a watching brief on behalf of the Union over all legislative proposals concerning women and children. In connection with this Committee is an issue of papers by the Stansfeld Trust, which took its origin in a fund raised to commemorate the services to the woman's cause of the late Sir James Stansfeld. Under its provisions a scrutineer is appointed to examine all Bills brought before Parliament, and to prepare brief, prompt, and up-to-date reports, which are posted at once to all subscribers.

Besides the one concerned with legislation there are ten other sectional committees of the Union of Women Workers, taking special subjects into their consideration. All of these do very important work, but it is only possible in this short space to mention a few of their present activities.

The Industrial Committee takes in hand all subjects connected with women's work and wages, and the condition of various industries in different parts of the country. In Birmingham, for instance, an exhaustive investigation was made by a sub-committee in 1900 into the conditions of women's employment in the pen-making trade, and many useful suggestions were made in their report. It is in great part owing to the facts discovered and the representations made by the Industrial Committee that women inspectors are now being appointed in larger numbers than before; but the crying need still continues for more of the keen and sympathetic insight which well-qualified women alone can give in this department of public work.

Another committee, which covers a large field of action, is that entitled the Preventive and Rescue Committee. It aims at promoting preventive work mainly through existing agencies, and has of late made special efforts to press forward the moral education of the young, through mothers' unions and mothers' meetings, and in girls' and boys' schools and clubs. It is also concerned with the painful and difficult work which women guardians encounter in their dealings with girls and women in the wards of the Unions, and the visiting of prisons is one of its recognised branches. It is, of course, in close touch with the National Vigilance Association, and offers help and counsel to Rescue workers everywhere.

One of the first objects aimed at by the N.U.W.W. was the establishment of a bureau for the employment of women, but there were many difficulties in the way of its accomplishment. These, however, have been overcome, and the Central Bureau is now one of the most useful and most widely known of the institutions connected with it. It endeavours not only to place employers and employées in communication, but offers advice and practical help to the sadly large number of applicants who are in need of training before they are fit to undertake any situation. It has also to remove the almost universal ignorance as to where such training may be had. Thus it is stated in the last report:—"There are multitudes who had heard neither of the Swanley College nor of the Norland Institute, nor of your bureau, nor of the National Union of Women Workers." During 1900 the bureau found work for 149 women, 820 received information through the medium of interviews at the office, and about 1,800 were advised by correspondence. Miss Margaret Bateson is the secretary, and the address of the office is 60, Chancery-lane, E.C.

Much good work has been done in past years by a Joint Committee of the Charity Organisation Society, the Women's University Settlement, and the National Union of Women Workers, which arranged courses of lectures on charitable and social work. This year, however, the Committee is dissolved, but only to be reconstituted on a wider basis as a separate organisation to do enlarged work. Applications for lectures may still be sent to Mrs. G. F. Hill, 10, Kensington Mansions, Earl's Court, S.W.

The Union does not confine its interests and activities to the United Kingdom, but has lately formed a Committee for dealing with Indian and Colonial affairs. Its efforts in 1900 were mainly directed to helping in various ways the movement for assisting the famine-stricken people of our great dependency.

The feature, however, which perhaps calls for the most special attention is the incorporation of our British N.U.W.W. with the International Union established just at the close of the 19th century. This latter is an immense undertaking which will take some years to get into real working order, but all who were privileged to be present at the great International gathering in London the year before last, must recognise in it a potentiality for good, rich in promise for future years.

The annual meeting of the British National Union of Women Workers was held in October last in London, when much interesting information was given as to the working of the branches, and a Conference was held at Zion College on the Housing of the Rural Poor. The secretaries and delegates were also gathered together for an informal meeting for discussion of plans and difficulties, and the reporting of successful experiments, a new departure which was keenly appreciated by many of the scattered workers who have few opportunities of meeting colleagues and friends associated in the work of the Union.

WE shape ourselves the joy or fear
Of which the coming life is made,
And fill our Future's atmosphere
With sunshine or with shade.

The tissue of the life to be
We weave with colours all our own,
And in the field of Destiny
We reap as we have sown.

Still shall the soul around it call
The shadows which it gathered here,
And, painted on the eternal wall,
The Past shall re-appear.

WE believe that every man's subliminal self opens Godward, as the inlet opens to the sea; but the mystics are they who have found it out as a fact because the surges of the Eternal Self broke upon the shores of their personal being, and they have realised that only sin could separate man and God.—Prof. Rufus Jones.

THE TARGUMS.

SIR,—The antiquity of the Targums might not on the surface seem to be an important matter, and yet it is no exaggeration to say that if Mr. Manning could produce satisfactory evidence for the view he has published, he would create as complete a revolution in modern Biblical criticism as if he should demonstrate that it was Moses, after all, who wrote the Pentateuch. For if the Targums originated with Ezra, then already in the fifth century B.C. Hebrew had become so much a dead language that the Jewish people needed Aramaic translations of their Scriptures, and consequently any subsequent literature intended for these people would be written not in Hebrew but in Aramaic. Therefore the modern critical dates assigned to Chronicles, Esther, Joel, Daniel, to portions of Isaiah, Zechariah, Psalms, and Proverbs are all hopelessly wrong, and the histories of the post-exilic period based on these dates are all hopelessly vitiated. Of other implications of Mr. Manning's view I need not speak: it must suffice here to say that if Mr. Manning were right, most of the work of the last generation of Biblical scholars would have to be done over again, and he would have dealt the modern criticism of the Old Testament a blow more decisive than all of its professed enemies have been yet able to deliver.

Mr. Manning iterates in his last letter that he will discuss the matter with me no more. It is, however, not merely to me that he owes the evidence to substantiate his far-reaching theory, but to those workers in the Old Testament field among whom unshrinking loyalty to historical truth is the supreme inspiration of their labours, and to those others who believe that the modern criticism of the Bible has drawn the life-blood from their faith.

Mr. Manning's failure to produce his evidence I do not understand. The need for special defence of his view was all the greater because it was a tenable position in the dark ages of criticism, and his Address might have been easily misjudged, if it had fallen into the hands of an unfriendly reviewer, to be the work of a man not acquainted with the modern developments of his subject. He will not affirm that a College Address did not provide a suitable medium for his evidence; for the Address, though unhappily it confuses two similar letters of the Hebrew alphabet in its spelling of Halachah, is a learned production, and the audience which could estimate the exposure of Siegfried, Cornill, and Wellhausen which it contains, might have been safely entrusted with the evidence required to connect the origin of the Targums with Ezra. But if the necessity of evidence existed nowhere else, it at least arose when Mr. Manning was defending his work from alleged unjust treatment by a carping critic. Here it must have been clear that no oracular ipse dixit would be regarded as convincing.

How far the deficiency of courtesy in Mr. Manning's letters is worthy of the dignity of learning and the temper of scholarship I may safely leave to your readers to determine; but since he has committed to the permanence of print a charge against me of incompetence to judge his work, I may be permitted to illustrate the method by which he endeavours to establish his charge. In his address Mr. Manning rightly rejects the theory that the Jews forgot their Hebrew during the Babylonian exile; but he proceeds in the same connection to reproduce, following Deutsch, Literary Remains, p. 322, the view that the exiles brought back from Babylon a knowledge of Aramaic, without seeing that this view is part and parcel of the theory he has just repudiated, and that it, as much as the other, is a survival from the days when the Book of Daniel was regarded as a reliable historical witness for the period of the exile. The whole theory is refuted in such easily accessible sources as W. Robertson Smith, Old Testament in the Jewish Church, edition 2, pages 35 fg., Driver, Introduction, edition 7, page 503, "Commentary on Daniel," page 59 fg., Nöldeke, Encyclopædia Biblica, s.v. "Aramaic Language," § 4, and frequently elsewhere. It is not surprising, in the face of a mixed impression of this kind, that Mr. Manning should not see the point of my allusion, but it is almost incredible that he should proceed, without investigation of the matter involved, to fasten upon me, with accessory reproaches, firstly the opinion that the exile did not influence the Jews at all, secondly the charge of criticising his address without reading it carefully. I hope that Mr. Manning will now look the matter up.

RECONCILIATION.

SIR,—Will you allow me a word of explanation with reference to your note on my letter in your last issue?

1. I had no intention of representing Mr. Gannett as pleading for a "limp comprehensiveness." I spoke of such as a danger attending Mr. Gannett's attitude. In doing so I had in mind the possible effect of his sermon as quoted in an English paper for English readers, and I still maintain that in a country where real issues are already obscured by moral and intellectual lethargy, the cause of progress will not be furthered but retarded by the addition of a false sentiment of unity.

2. I hold there can be no better "recognition of definite changes of doctrinal conviction" than for those who experienced such changes to plainly say so instead of remaining in equivocal positions.

3. Mr. Gannett certainly does not "applaud" "mistiness of thought" and "blurring of phrase," nor did I intentionally represent him as so doing. His words, as quoted in your leader of Dec. 7, are:—

> There may be a mist in their thought, and a blurring of phrase in their pages, but what yearnings for the new erections of faith which shall take the place of the old, &c.

"The new erections of faith" are, as Mr. Gannett is aware, in course of construction. When those who yearn for them so greatly leave the old and boldly join in the work of reconstruction, their thought will emerge from mist and their phrases will be unmistakeable. Mistiness and yearning may be pathetic, but are not indicative of a state of conviction, which alone can help us, especially in the present crisis. THOMAS J. HARDY.

UNITARIAN STUDENTS AT CARMARTHEN COLLEGE.

SIR,—The Rev. R. J. Jones admits the inaccuracy of his Preface, and also the fact of publication without leave, but offers no expression of regret; thinks the offence is at most only a little one, and would apparently have no objection to repeating it. Inasmuch as I attach importance, personally, to the distinction between meum and tuum, and have a further list—of eighteenth-century students—which it may be desirable to issue privately some day, as a preliminary to publication, I venture to protest anew against Mr. Jones's attitude.

My roll of students, which extends over several volumes, includes contributions from many noteworthy sources, but is in every other sense my own creation. It has occupied much of my leisure for ten or twelve years, and has involved, inter alia, a minute inquiry into the history of the Unitarian churches in Wales, to which it is now in a large sense the key. It thus forms no part of the College Records which Mr. Jones affirms to be in my custody; and in truth there is no such thing as an official list previous to 1867, as this keen antiquary must surely know, for he was one of the College professors in 1876 (cf. his book, p. 66).

My list of nineteenth-century students—comprising nearly 700 names—was compiled from the above roll, as Mr. Jones might have learnt from his newspapers, and did learn from Dr. Pan. Besides the features indicated by Mr. Jones, it specifies—what was of cardinal importance for his purpose—the denominations to which the students belong. And prefixed to it was a letter by Dr. Pan, concluding with the words "Anybody willing to help may have a copy of this list."

Mr. Jones acknowledged this document in the Carmarthen Journal as an important authority, without which his notes "would probably have never been sent" to that paper; and in his Preface he declares that his "special thanks for valuable help are due first and foremost to Dr. Pan." If he chooses in his letter to belittle the list, and to that end to misdescribe it, and, under the influence of a question-begging epithet, to forget his gratitude to Dr. Pan, it is a matter that concerns him rather than me.

Dr. Pan, who was not favoured by Mr. Jones with the Journal notes, regards their publication as an unfriendly act. And since Mr. Jones assures your readers that he might have had the Student-list from me for the asking, I must point out that when I had once supplied a copy—for the purposes of an expensive work—to Dr. Pan (who came to me with a letter from a Unitarian authority in London), it was not open to me, in common fairness, to put anyone in the way of forestalling and so injuring his undertaking. PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

MANY changes occur with the passing seasons, but the situation—as strategists say—is always the same in London. That is, the vast population ebbs and flows around us day by day, and we are caught up into one current or another of its seething tides; but the total of its life is beyond our power really to survey, much more beyond our power to affect. Even the religious bodies that are most numerous and least unpopular find their efforts mocked by the magnitude of the work needing to be done. Each district has its peculiar set of difficulties. Residential suburbs seem to be, and I think really are, the most favourable fields of labour; but even here the conditions are bewildering. I believe Mr. Charles Booth can prove that in almost all such districts the numbers attending worship are far below those that abstain. Is it that the established forms of worship are distasteful? Well, every type of Nonconformist worship may be provided, and, in general, is; and still the suburban resident is not attracted. Is it that some radically different type of thought is required, such as Unitarians or other Liberal Christians might represent? Alas! the flattering unction avails nothing, as actual experiment proves. It is saddening, not to say appalling, to find how little hold the habit of attending public worship has on the majority of Londoners. Of course, church-going is not all. People may be honest, decent, and substantially blameless in the eye of the law without any gathering of themselves together for serious thought and stimulus. But, on the other hand, none of us are too well-provided with spontaneous goodness. We need culture; and for lack of it whole masses of people are worsening, losing tone, sinking into selfish indifference, while the great city's problems knock ever louder at the doors.

How urgently the knocking goes on may be perceived by any reader of the daily papers; and we who live in the midst of the struggle are often bewildered by cries for help, and know not how to help or what. Consider the case of the City of Westminster and the "West End" generally, as represented by a most influential deputation recently to the Home Secretary. The hearts of men and women, who have any heart, sicken at the hideous story of the streets, nightly repeated. What redress? Mr. Ritchie plainly enough hinted that the police are dependent on "public opinion," and that while large numbers of men are willing to have things as they are, it is next to impossible for existing statutes to be put into force. Or take the evidence supplied in the courts daily as to the spread of gambling, which John Burns, no incompetent observer, declares to be the deadliest canker of our times. What steps are possible to prevent the spread of a disease so fruitful in crime and demoralisation of all kinds? As to the defects permitted, not to say the injuries inflicted, by owners of house property, there is a mass of testimony which no one can dispute; but the remedy seems equally beyond present invention. "Public opinion" will have to grow much clearer, and public feeling much more intense, before evils such as these can be mitigated in any important degree.

We who are interested specially in the work of the score and a half of Unitarian congregations in London are, God help us, doing what we can to promote this healthier, nobler, more potent public opinion. "Citizen Sunday" has from its inception found our preachers foremost in readiness to proclaim the gospel that fulfils every law of righteousness, civic as well as individual. Temperance Sunday, Peace Sunday, Hospital Sunday, and others of special local interest find them no less willing. Every Sunday, indeed, we may confidently hope, hears a very practical religion commended from our pulpits. In our schools, classes, guilds, and other societies, the effort is made to knit young souls, especially, into those personal ties which are, in the long run, more powerful than exhortations, however eloquent. Measured against the needs of London, it is all very little; viewed beneath the shadow of London's poverty, ignorance, greed, and shame, these are but tiny lamps that we seek to hold up. But we are holding them up—and with the New Year, we bid each other take courage, trim the lamps afresh, and do our part loyally—however insignificant it may appear.

"We" do this, I say. On whose behalf am I writing? I have no "mandate" from my brother ministers, but I know this is true of them. I have no "mandate" from the congregations; but I am persuaded that in each there are valiant souls who are ever willing to respond to the summons to self-denying labour for their neighbours and for the great Kingdom. I am not fully persuaded that it is true of all—even of the little "all" that does consider itself attached to our churches. How shall we measure the reality of our people's zeal? I have spoken of the attendance at public worship, or rather the non-attendance of the crowds of the unattached. But what about the attendance of people who are nominally members of our churches, but whose membership is as little worthy of the name as may be? Time was when a member was a limb; but the body that never knows where its limbs are, when they should be present, and helping the rest, had better find another name for them. And what about the service of our mission institutions? Is it not mean, indeed, scandalous, that when a minister is put down to work in some poverty-stricken area, where the aspect of things every day is enough to take virtue out of any man, he is left to fight it out alone, for the most part? It is "such a distance" from any decent neighbourhood that the Christian spirit which sent the Apostles to the ends of the Roman Empire fails to carry men and women so far as to these churches and missions, in spite of our omnibuses, "tubes," railways, or even easy walking gear of the latest invention. I could tell a tale of more than one such case where young wives have looked up in vain for kindly eyes, and working folk have grown hard and harder in their scepticism as to a gospel of "Brotherhood" with so little carrying power as this.

Passing from these supreme questions of present service, here is another:—The Domestic Mission Society has recently asked for funds. I do not know what is the actual result—but I have my fears. If my fears are realised, and funds are not forthcoming, one of our stations will have to be given up. Think of it! Nay, it will not bear thinking about. This work, down there in the depths, picking up individuals and families out of the ditch, not in any sensational way, but soberly, quietly, lovingly, as a man would help a child or tend a plant—this work, to be crippled, stopped! There is a saying that it were better to go into life maimed and halt than with sound body into "Gehenna." It looks as if it is not life at any rate that is before the people who will endure, if they will, such maiming as the loss of one mission station.

Last week, Mr. Terry, the successor to Mr. David Martineau in the treasurership of the London District Unitarian Society, pointed out that the list of subscribers to its funds was only about 200 strong. He pathetically urged that for five shillings annually one may be enrolled. Here is another subject for thought. Let no one cast his eyes back to "The Bazaar," and suppose that because that remarkable and highly successful effort set the Society "on its legs" nothing more is wanted to keep it going. I understand that the Committee is seriously considering the proposal to appoint a minister-at-large to evangelise where it may be deemed wise. Other proposals calculated to strengthen existing congregations are also before the Committee. The time is specially ripe for a canvass for new members in all our congregations. No doubt the "present" claims are many; but a people that can "superannuate its ministers" so handsomely can, if it likes, effectively help those who are still at work.

I have occupied so much space with general matter that I can only mention a few particulars. First, let me say that some generous friends have readily responded to a private application for funds to equip the premises at Bermondsey in a manner which is urgently necessary if the work that can be done there is to be done. Two or three of us have personally much to rejoice over in the prospect which is thus clearing. It is proper, however, to admit that it is only a few who have as yet been asked for special help in this case. The general appeal will be issued shortly, I trust, and then I confidently hope for wide-spread response. Meanwhile, let me here also acknowledge the contributions of those who have enabled the teachers to give their scholars a little seasonable festival.

Next, I should like to refer to several of our churches, specially, at this time—it is inevitable that many interesting points escape mention. The friends at Plumstead have done very bravely their good work up till now. Beginning in tentative lectures on Sunday evenings the congregation has slowly but surely pushed on from point to point, hired halls, acquired ground, built its church-schoolroom, and meanwhile has built up its subsidiary institutions solidly—Sunday-school, choir, social meetings, club, and so forth. The district is not a favourite one with the wealthy; the bulk of the congregation are drawn from the ranks of the skilled workers connected with the great Arsenal. The rush of work during the war has been in several ways unpropitious for the good of a Christian Church, but, thanks to unflagging zeal, things are going the right way. In March there is to be a bazaar to raise £200 by which to secure a grant of £500 from the fund raised in 1900, and so remove a heavy burden of debt. It is splendid to see how heartily and universally the members, down to the children, are working to get this money. There are two months yet to the date of the bazaar, but it is not too early to send gifts of money or otherwise to the minister, the Rev. L. J. Jones, 72, Genesta-road, Plumstead, S.E.

Coming nearer in there is another admirable piece of congregation-building going on at Lewisham under the tactful care of the Rev. W. C. Pope. This church also grew out of tentative efforts, and had, and still has, its material disadvantages, but in the matter of faithful self-devotion it has never lacked, its minister and members have marched together, and the neighbourhood is already distinctly the richer in intelligent and elevating purpose and effect through our friends' work there. It is safe to prophesy a grand result here in a few years, for the congregation keeps increasing, as well it may, under such untiring diligence.

At Highgate, the long interregnum since the lamented death of the Rev. Robert Spears is closed at last by the arrival of the Rev. R. H. Greaves, of Troy, U.S.A., who enters at once on his duties, and will be welcomed formally on Saturday, Jan. 25. There are sure to be many friends present to join in the welcome, and to rejoice with the congregation in their new prospects. They deserve well, for they have done well in a very trying time.

Our congregations are to have an opportunity shortly for united devotional fellowship, if the suggestions of the the Provincial Assembly Committee are carried out, as it is fully expected they will be. The plan as sketched will provide simultaneous services at two churches, one on the north of the river, one on the south. As in our Twentieth Century service last year several ministers will take part in each, and the congregations generally will be invited to attend. This is a matter of deep importance, and I hope it will be considered by our people at large. The arrangements will be announced as soon as complete. W. G. TARRANT.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Ballymena, co. Antrim.—Through the kindness of Mrs. A. Lawrence and Dr. Courtney Kenny, a Christmas party was given to the children of the Sunday-school and their parents, the Rev. J. Pollard presiding. On New Year's Eve a Watch-night service was held.

Carlisle.—The scholars' annual party was held on New Year's Day, when about 160 children and adults sat down to tea. The Unambitious Queen was rendered by some of the elder scholars, and Mr. Charles Dixon distributed the prizes for regular attendance, about 60 per cent. of the scholars qualifying for them. A feature of the evening was a magnificent Christmas-tree, the presents given by Mr. David Ainsworth, and the tree by Mr. Arlosh.

Chowbent.—Nineteen young people from the Sunday-school, who had joined the congregation through the Guild within the past three months, were specially welcomed as members of the chapel at the last meeting by the minister (the Rev. J. J. Wright), and each presented with a Hymnal and Service Book, on behalf of the chapel and school. The "Children's Christmas Dance," for some years now a special feature among the season's festivities here, was again in aid of our "Children's Homes," and resulted in £10 8s. 6d., which sum has been equally divided between "Aunt Amy's" Convalescent Home (London) and the Manchester District Sunday School Association's "Holiday Home" in Derbyshire. By individual subscription and in other ways the young people of Chowbent Sunday-school have raised during the past year, for various special purposes, upwards of £70.

Colne.—The congregation have declined to accept the Rev. Thomas Leyland's resignation, and have released him for a six months' rest in the hope that he will recover health and be able to resume his work at the end of that time. This has been made possible by an offer of the Rev. C. J. Street's to find ministerial supplies for half a year without expense to the congregation.

Elland.—Christ Church was well filled on Sunday evening, when an excellent performance of Handel's "Messiah" was given, this taking the place of the ordinary evening service. The choir had been considerably augmented, and both the choruses and various recits were admirably rendered.

Evesham.—The Mayor, Mr. Councillor Hughes, on Sunday morning last, attended service at the Oat-street Chapel in state, accompanied by the members of the Corporation, the Borough officials, the police force, and the fire brigade. There was a large congregation. Mr. Hughes has for many years been a member of the congregation of Unitarians, worshipping in the Oat-street Chapel, and a member of the Chapel Committee.

Leigh: Lancs.—The annual scholars' party and prize distribution was held on Saturday last. Mr. Councillor Thomas Boydell distributed prizes to 58 scholars, 19 of whom had not missed an attendance during the year. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin presided, and the party was in every way very successful. The report stated that there had been an increase in the average attendance during the year of 23 in the morning and 37 in the afternoon school over last year's attendances. It was decided, in view of the increasingly successful work here, to ask for £150 for the purpose of providing additional accommodation in the form of classrooms.

London: Central Postal Mission.—At the last meeting of the Committee at Essex Hall, at the close of the usual business, Miss Tagart, on behalf of the members, presented a handsome silver inkstand to Miss E. M. Lawrence, as a token of warm regard and with sincere good wishes on the occasion of her marriage. The Committee lose in Miss Lawrence an admirable treasurer, and an indefatigable worker for the cause. In the work of the Suffolk Mission, her constant co-operation will be specially missed.

London: Highgate.—The Rev. R. H. Greaves arrived in London from America on Wednesday, and will enter on his ministry to-morrow (Sunday), preaching morning and evening. A special service of recognition is announced for Saturday afternoon, Jan. 25. The annual Sunday-school parties were held on Thursday and Saturday last week. On Thursday 120 teachers and elder scholars sat down to tea, the younger children being entertained on Friday afternoon, while in the evening a very successful soirée for parents and friends was held, upwards of eighty visitors being present. Two admirably staged plays, Mildred and Patty, and selections from A Midsummer Night's Dream were given, and the evening closed with the singing of "Auld Lang Syne."

Loughborough.—The Sunday-school annual party was held last Saturday and was largely attended by the scholars and their parents. The Rev. Peter Dean, who presided, congratulated those present on the prosperous condition of the school, and then, on behalf of the teachers, presented a silver-plated teapot to Mrs. Wright, a former superintendent, now of Leicester, and a photograph frame to her daughter, Miss Edith Wright, a former teacher. Prizes were then distributed to the scholars, thirteen of whom had been never absent, and beautifully-bound copies of the Revised Version of the Bible were also presented to three new teachers. A successful entertainment by the children followed, including Mr. Hawkes's play Cinderella.

Manchester: Moss Side (Presentation).—A very interesting social gathering was held in the schoolroom on Tuesday, Jan. 7, the object being the presentation to the Rev. Charles Roper and his wife of a cheque for £95, as a mark of appreciation of their services on behalf of the church. About 150 members were present. Mr. John Tyson occupied the chair, and in the course of his remarks referred to the spontaneity of the movement and the heartiness with which it had been supported. Mr. John Lawson, in making the presentation, gave expression in feeling terms to the regard and esteem in which Mr. and Mrs. Roper were held. Mr. Roper, in thanking the members, gave an account of his ministerial career and experiences, and especially of his connection with the Moss Side Church, since his appointment as its first minister in the year 1888. He urged upon the members the need of increased effort now that they were in possession of a splendid church building, so that their influence for good in the district might be beneficial and lasting. Mrs. Roper, in a graceful little speech, also expressed her acknowledgments of the gift. The musical fare of the evening was provided by duets and solos, rendered by members of the choir.

Scarborough.—On Friday evening, Jan. 3, a most successful social evening was held to inaugurate the second half of the 1901-2 session of the Social Union, over seventy friends being present. The Social Union (hitherto the Literary and Musical Society) is this session making the experiment of holding meetings fortnightly instead of monthly, and so far has been justified. The programme for the coming half of the session includes lectures by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, on "A Visit to the Transylvanian Unitarians," and the Rev. Charles Hargrove on "Caedmon," and a dramatic entertainment. In the first half the children gave a representation of Princess May and her Wonderful Law on two nights, and scored a great success. The Young People's Guild, formed in September, also enters on the New Year with bright hopes and a good programme.

Stockton-on-Tees.—On New Year's Eve a coffee supper was held in the schoolroom, followed by a Watch-night service in the church, conducted by Mr. Henry Cross, who has been appointed minister of the congregation. A special subscription has been started to provide a new heating apparatus for the church.

Taunton.—On Thursday and Friday week two excellent entertainments were given in Mary-street Schools, in aid of the Sunday-school funds, the Rev. G. V. Crook presiding; and after the Thursday entertainment prizes for regular attendance were distributed by Mrs. Crook to the scholars.

Tunbridge Wells.—The late Mrs. Dobson has left £50 to the Free Church here. It is proposed to apply it to the building fund, in aid of which collections were made on Sunday last. The intention is not to erect a church, but a hall where other meetings can be held, with convenient class-rooms adjoining. The principles for which the church stands are beginning to be understood and appreciated. The morning attendance shows a sensible improvement, while a full room is now usual in the evening. Several adherents are coming in from other churches. They say they derive fresh thoughts and breathe a different atmosphere to what they have been accustomed to, while they remain unpledged as to dogma. The sense of comradeship is very strong. There is therefore with the demand for better accommodation a deepening loyalty to the basis of the church—namely, the bond of a common spirit and aspiration, and not agreement in any creed. The pulpit is often supplied by the members themselves, who are encouraged to voice their thoughts, and friends from a distance in sympathy with the movement conduct the services when necessary. Owing to the methods employed, public worship is maintained at a very moderate cost.

HIGHGATE HILL UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

In breadth of thought and force of conviction Mr. Fiske's contribution to the literature on this momentous subject is equal to the most weighty of the many volumes that have preceded it. Like Mr. Fiske's volumes on "The Idea of God," "The Destiny of Man," and "Through Nature to God," its power and value are out of all proportion to its size.

PRESENT DAY PAPERS.

A Monthly Review of Modern Thought in its application to Christian Faith and Practice.

EDITORS:

J. WILHELM ROWNTREE & HENRY B. BINNS

It is the purpose of these Papers to aid, by broad, spiritual, and unprejudiced discussion, in removing those intellectual obstacles which hinder many thoughtful and earnest men and women from taking their full share in the service of Truth and of Man. They are carefully written and printed, and should be read by all who take a liberal view of religion. The Spectator describes them as "thoughtful papers well worthy of attention."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WEDNESDAY next is the anniversary of the passing of Queen Victoria, and amid the pageant of the re-opening of Parliament this week, and the renewed pressure of Parliamentary business, our thoughts go back to those solemn days of last year, when the aged Queen, "revered, beloved," was taken from her people. Jan. 11 and Jan. 22 are two dates which will long have sacred and solemn associations for us. The earlier day belongs to our more intimate circle, in the thought of what is holiest and most venerable in our life, for on that date our beloved teacher, James Martineau, entered into his rest; the latter day belongs to the whole people, in the remembrance of our Queen.

IT will be seen from the London Domestic Mission Society's advertisement in another column that the appeal of the Committee has brought promises of new subscriptions amounting to £54 4s., but what is needed is an additional income of £300 a year. We can only refer once more to Dr. Hicks's letter of last week, and ask of our readers renewed attention to the subject. In our leading articles this week and last we have tried to show how vitally it affects our common religious life.

FURTHER lists of additional donations and annual subscriptions to the National Conference Ministers' Superannuation Fund will be advertised in next week's INQUIRER. Since the New Year's acknowledgment, when we rejoiced in the welcome news that more than the first £20,000 had been secured, further donations amounting to £585 have come in, and further ministerial contributions bringing that list to a total of £297. Thus the donations to the Fund amount altogether at the present moment to over £21,360, and there is more to come. Friends will, of course, understand that the greater the gifts, in a matter of this kind, the greater the benefits secured for the present and coming generations of ministers, and through them to the churches. Further annual subscriptions amounting to £34 11s. 6d. have also been promised, bringing up that list to £295 1s., so that the £300 a year asked for is also very nearly achieved.

OUR National Conference Ministers' Superannuation Fund figured prominently in Tuesday's Daily News as the "Unitarian Twentieth Century Fund; Subscribed in Seven Months; Some Church Talk; Interview with the Rev. Copeland Bowie." The Daily News Correspondent who reports the interview obtained from Mr. Bowie much interesting information concerning the Fund happily raised before the end of last year, and the use to which it is to be put. Having described how the insurance is to be effected in the Equitable Life Office, the "church talk" continues :—

"One of the great advantages of such a method—which was thoroughly well considered by Sir John Brunner and others of our first-class business men—was that the fund was thereby saved practically all the expenses of management, as well as the anxiety of providing security; moreover, it obtained the advantages of the experience and organisation of a first-class insurance office.

"The scheme of rules for such other management of the fund as may be necessary is now under consideration, Dr. Blake Odgers, K.C., the President of the Unitarian Association for this year, taking an active part in the matter.

"At the present time we have 292 Unitarian ministers actually in charge of congregations, and the fund is intended to provide a pension for fully-recognised ministers."

The latter part of the interview was concerned with the entrance of clergyman and ministers of other bodies into the Unitarian ranks, and the work of the Advisory Committees, and concluded as follows :—

"Have you any vacant pastorates at present?"

"About twenty, some of them being small Mission churches. I should say that, as for the students from one or other of our two colleges, there is no need for them to go before the Advisory Committee. The college is held to be a sufficient guarantee. Still, believing that our churches are free in matters of thought and religion, we do get a number of applicants from other denominations.

"But," continued Mr. Bowie, with a smile on his shrewd face, "our applicant's form is often sufficient. We have a form filled with questions as to character and general fitness for ministerial work, and the polite request to fill up this form often prevents candidates from going further in the matter. On the other hand, a man whose heart and soul are in the work, and who feels he can conscientiously join our body, has no objection, and gladly answers our questions. No; applicants find that, while we may be 'free' as to religious thought, we are not 'free" as to character."

To Wednesday's Daily News Mr. Howard Evans contributed an interesting column of statistics on "The Strength of the Free Churches," following up a practice which he began in the Contemporary Review early in 1897, and has since continued annually, of collecting figures relating to the Evangelical Free Churches in England and Wales. The following is his return as to the number of sittings provided by various bodies in buildings regularly devoted to public worship. Of these it is estimated that less than half a million are in hired buildings :—

Baptists	1,237,424
Congregationalists	1,645,092
Presbyterians	166,391
Wesleyans	2,224,057
Primitive Methodists	993,909
Calvinistic Methodists	455,349
Salvation Army	540,000
United Methodist Free Churches	381,872
Methodist New Connexion ...	167,945
Bible Christians	153,600
Six smaller bodies	123,579
Total	8,139,218

What proportion of those sittings are habitually occupied no attempt is made to estimate, and it should be noted that "sittings" provided by the Salvation Army can have but slight significance in considering the extent of the work of that organisation. But while Mr. Evans does not give us any idea of the numbers in the congregations of worshippers thus provided for, he gives a table of 1,945,932 communicants, in which, however, we do not understand what is meant by including 17,346 communicants in the Society of Friends. With regard to Sunday-school work, the totals given are 383,778 teachers and 3,275,257 scholars.

COMPARING the statistics of the Evangelical Free Churches with those of the Church of England, Mr. Evans gives :—

	Sittings.	Communicants.
Established ...	7,000,375	... 1,974,629
Free	8,139,218	... 1,945,932

The number of Established Church communicants is only an estimate.

	S.S. Teachers.	S. Scholars.
Established ...	293,902	... 2,841,862
Free	383,778	... 3,275,257

Then follow some international statistics, which bring out the well-known vast extent of Methodism in other countries and especially in the United States, and for Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians and Congregationalists (set here in the order of their numerical preponderance) give a total of 18,231,688 communicants, while (according to the "Church of England Year Book for 1901") of communicants in the Anglican and Daughter Churches the estimated total is only 3,367,052. On these figures Mr. Evans makes the following concluding remarks:—

These figures are fruitful of suggestions, but I will content myself with only three propositions. First, they demonstrate the contention of the Liberation Society that Christianity thrives without a Church Establishment; secondly, that the theory of a mechanical Apostolical succession is refuted by facts; thirdly, that the idea of Christian reunion by absorption into the Anglican Church is a delusive dream.

IN the Christian Register of Dec. 26 is the monthly bulletin of the A.U.A., the eight-page supplement on "Unitarian Word and Work." It deals this month with the churches of the Middle States, with which are joined the four Unitarian churches in Canada, the old established churches in Montreal and Toronto, dating from 1842 and 1845 respectively, and the more recent churches at Hamilton, founded in 1889, and at Ottawa, the capital of the Dominion, founded in 1898. These churches, with the exception of Montreal, are partly dependent on the A.U.A. for their support. The Rev. J. T. Sunderland, who is stationed now at Toronto, writes of the prospects of Unitarian work in Canada. The people, he says, are intelligent and earnest, with a keen and very general interest in education, but, theologically, very orthodox, with a severe ban upon liberal religion, so that Unitarian missionary work is very difficult and greatly needed. Yet there are signs of a movement of thought. At Ottawa, the Rev. Albert Walkley, who was the first minister of the church, has accepted a call to Marblehead, Mass., and his place is to be taken by a young Presbyterian minister of much promise, the Rev. William Hutcheon (or is it Hutcheson?). There is no debt on the church, except $2,000 to the Building Loan Fund. Toronto, with its population of nearly a quarter of a million, has two Universities and many other important educational centres. The church has had a chequered history, but there are increasing signs of vigour, especially among the young people. Of Mr. Sunderland's work the Rev. D. W. Morehouse, Superintendent of the Department of the Middle States and Canada for the A.U.A., writes as follows:—

Mr. Sunderland's own work in Toronto has, during the past year, been cautious and wisely planned. He is slowly growing into the esteem and confidence, not only of his own people, but of the citizens of Toronto outside his own church. In other words, he has been gaining the standing there which will enable him, as time goes on, to increase the effectiveness of his work and make it tell in the building up of his society in numbers and as a working and effective force for good in the city. I feel that the important thing is that he shall be sustained in his work until he can have time to organise all the liberal forces in the city and bring them into his fold.

THE Council Room at Essex Hall was well filled on Tuesday evening, when the Rev. W. J. Jupp, of Liverpool, lectured on Ruskin, in the course on "Pioneers of Humanitarianism," under the auspices of the Humanitarian League. Speaking first of the story of the Halcyon in "The Eagle's Nest" as perhaps the most perfect piece of Ruskin's writing, and contrasting the gift of insight which entered into the beautiful life of all things in the world about us with the sportsman's pleasure merely to pursue and kill, Mr. Jupp said that Ruskin had the supreme gift of sight, of imaginative sympathy. In this he was closely akin to Wordsworth. It brought him the purest joy and the worst sorrow of his life. It turned even the glory of the Alps into "mountain gloom," when he remembered the hard lot of the peasants, unjustly oppressed, which made such joy as his impossible for them. So he was brought to devote his whole life, his wealth, and his many gifts, to the cause of the people, studying social problems and passionately pleading for the opportunities of completer manhood and nobler life for all. His theories might be mistaken, and the remedies he suggested might not be practicable, but his analysis of the social state was unanswerable. The lecturer read some searching passages from the section of "The Stones of Venice" on the "Nature of Gothic," now issued as a separate little book, and also from "Unto this Last," of which he spoke as "the most disturbing book of the century." Ruskin's example of devotion was noble and inspiring, and could not fail to have many followers, his plea that men should face the darker aspects of life Mr. Jupp enforced by reading some of the closing words of "Unto this Last."

Luxury is indeed possible in the future—innocent and exquisite; luxury for all, and by the help of all; but luxury at present can only be enjoyed by the ignorant; the cruelest man living could not sit at his feast, unless he sat blindfold. Raise the veil boldly; face the light; and if, as yet, the light of the eye can only be through tears, and the light of the body through sackcloth, go thou forth weeping, bearing precious seed, until the time come, and the kingdom, when Christ's gift of bread, and bequest of peace, shall be "Unto this last as unto thee."

Mr. J. A. Hobson, who presided, said that he could not agree with Mr. Jupp that "Unto this Last" had been the most disturbing book of the century. He wished it had been so; but people, even in Ruskin societies, were too apt merely to enjoy the beauties of Ruskin's style and to overlook the radically disturbing influence of his deeper thoughts. We trust that Mr. Jupp's lecture may appear in the next quarterly number of the Humane Review. The January number contains Mr. H. S. Salt's lecture on "Shelley as Pioneer." (Ernest Bell, 6, York-street, Covent Garden. 1s. net.)

A DISTRESSING letter comes from Iceland, brought by a chance Norwegian steamer on Christmas Eve, for there is no regular post in mid-winter. Our old friend, Rev. M. Jochumsson, writes:—"On Dec. 19, at 5 A.M., we were alarmed by a conflagration at our only hotel. As fire of any moment was unknown here, we had no fireman nor any contrivance to subdue the flames. Every man in Akureyri hastened to the place, and at once we united in a plan of struggle against this dreadful enemy. Our most hardy and daring young men climbed the nearest houses, and did wonders to defend them, till the main danger decreased as the flames fell down with the consumed houses. In three hours we had mastered the fire, but besides the only hotel in the north half of Iceland, ten houses were completely destroyed. How fortunate that the weather was calm, and every life was saved! A little more, and the whole town would have been lost. It was an awful time. For four days the ruins smouldered, and what a picture our little town of a thousand inhabitants—the streets full of articles of furniture thrown out, and eight families ruined and homeless! Shelter has been found for them, and a subscription is being made; but they cannot raise 100,000 crowns, the estimated loss. Our poor little community has not a single man of wealth. If some of our rich tourist friends only knew, I feel sure they would send us help. Can you, through The Christian Life and THE INQUIRER, let friends know of our disaster? What shall we do now, without some generous helpers from abroad come to our succour? I am just returned from church, where I have tried to preach a consoling sermon; but I feel tired and disheartened."

THE Rev. Frederick Summers, of George's-row Mission, writes to enforce Dr. Hicks's appeal of last week on behalf of the London Domestic Mission Society. Mr. Summers urges that the appeal may rightly meet with a response not in London only, but throughout the country, since there is a constant stream of the poor flowing from the country to the metropolis, and often of the poorest and most needy in every sense. And he adds:—

"In London the degradation—from overcrowding and from special and peculiar temptations—would simply appal some who only know rural life, or life in small towns. As the Macedonians cried out to Paul to come over and help them, so our London Domestic Missions ask you to assist them. Even in the Sunday-schools of almost all orthodox chapels throughout the country collections are constantly being made for missionary work abroad as well as missionary work at home. Will not our friends over a larger area than London help our Committee to carry on their missionary work among the lower (even the lowest) strata of their own metropolis?"

THE annual meeting of the Trustees of Manchester College, Oxford, held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday afternoon, will be reported next week. The number of students in the College is at present unusually large, and the report eminently satisfactory.

EACH man has his own vocation. The talent is the call. There is one direction in which all space is open to him. He has faculties silently inviting him thither to endless exertion. He is like a ship in a river; he runs against obstructions on every side but one; on that side, all obstruction is taken away, and he sweeps serenely over God's depths into an infinite sea.—Emerson.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

JOHN FISKE.

THE important service which Fiske has rendered to the philosophy of religion through his three brief but weighty treatises on "Man's Destiny," "The Idea of God," and "Through Nature to God," has been more than once gratefully recognised in these pages.* But now that he has passed from us, we more vividly discern his true worth; and the recent publication of his Ingersoll Lecture on "Immortality,"† delivered shortly before his death, forms, we think, a suitable occasion for a brief summary of that continuous line of strenuous thinking which brought the eminent Evolutionist into full accord with the main principles of theistic belief.

Every great revolution in the scientific conception of the universe, such as the promulgation of the Copernican theory, and the present acceptance of the theory of Evolution, necessarily disturbs and dislocates for a time the logical passage by which the popular mind is wont to rise "through Nature up to Nature's God"; and it needs gifted and powerful thinkers—thinkers in whom a thorough acquaintance with the new scientific idea is combined with clear philosophical insight and genuine religious experience—to make a new and careful survey of all the facts, and to discover, if possible, a higher point of view from which it may be seen that the apparent inconsistency between the new scientific knowledge and the old religious faith vanishes when the new science is more profoundly understood, and when religious faith discards some unessential and irrational elements with which it was previously associated. Amongst those thinkers, at once thoroughly scientific and thoroughly religious, who have done good work in thus helping the present generation to see that the truths of Science and the truths of Religion are accordant aspects of one Divine Reality, the future historian of religious thought will assign honourable places to two kindred American authors, who passed almost simultaneously into the Unseen World—the one being that able and loveable philosophic scientist, Professor Joseph Le Conte, of California; the other the distinguished writer on history, science and philosophy, who so fittingly closed his literary career on this earth with a confident utterance of rational faith in the "Life Everlasting."

We find the intellectual germ of Fiske's religious faith in the somewhat faint belief in the "pervading rationality of the cosmos" which finds expression in his able and interesting work on "Cosmic Philosophy." But so indistinct was his recognition at that time of a Divine Will and a Divine Purpose in the process of evolution that both Sir Frederick Pollock and Fiske's personal friend, the late Professor Romanes, said that they could not discern in that book "any single element that is specifically distinctive of Theism." In the Preface to the "Idea of God," Fiske contends that these writers somewhat misunderstood him, and that even in his earlier work he really taught what he calls "Cosmic Theism." Be this as it may, it is clear from his own distinct admission that a true teleological conception of the universe did not become an assured and creative conviction in his mind till, at a later date, the idea suddenly flashed upon him that evolution is not simply a continuous rational process, but is, further, a process directed towards a certain definite and discoverable end, and that this end is the development of the "highest spiritual human qualities." This is, he declares, the evident goal "towards which God's creative work has from the outset been tending; and hence in the deepest sense it is as true as it was ever held to be that the world was made for Man, and that the bringing forth in him of those qualities which we call highest and holiest is the final cause of creation."

In proof of this purposive action of the Spirit of the Cosmos, Fiske dwells in a very suggestive and instructive way on the circumstance that physical evolution evidently reaches its goal in the formation of the human frame, and that when psychical evolution then comes to the front, the development of the brain which is the material instrument of this spiritual development becomes so complex that it is not organically completed, as the rest of the bodily structure for the most part is, at the time of birth, so that the human offspring necessarily passes through an exceptionally long period of infancy. Fiske contends, and we think rightly, that this lengthy infancy of the human babe is clearly the result of a definite purposive action in the course of evolution, for it is just in this long period of dependence and in the consequent continued inter-personal relations between parents and children that the necessary physiological condition is provided for the gradual emergence in the human race of altruistic and moral sentiments and ideas. This line of thought is fully developed in the little treatise on "Man's Destiny in the Light of His Origin," which forms the first of the series of booklets in which Fiske has given his Theodicy to the world.

In order to understand the aim of the second treatise, that on "The Idea of God," it is necessary to remember that Fiske's view of the possibilities of man's theological insight differs somewhat widely from Mr. Spencer's complete Agnosticism. Accepting from Mr. Spencer the doctrine that the human soul is an effluence from the same self-existent Absolute of which the phenomena of Nature are another expression, Fiske maintains that while the finiteness of human minds renders us unable to comprehend the Infinite, and that, therefore, all our conceptions of God are necessarily to some extent "symbolical," we, nevertheless, possess in our reason, in our causality and in our conscience an increasing measure of real insight into the essence and character of God. This second treatise took its origin from Fiske's perception that when we seek to harmonise God's "creative work" with the facts of evolution, it becomes evident that the old Deistic conception of the Divine activity is wholly unsatisfactory. It was providential that several years before Darwin and Spencer established the scientific conception of evolution, philosophical and religious thought had, on both sides of the Atlantic, come to conceive of the Eternal, not as acting on nature and the soul after a mechanical fashion from without, but rather as the immanent World-spirit who progressively manifests His power and His character in the physical cosmos, and especially in the soul's ideals. Biological analogies had to a considerable extent supplanted mechanical ones in the endeavours of philosophers and preachers to reach the most adequate conception of the creative relation between God and the material and spiritual universe. Hence it is that the highest religious thought of to-day finds no insuperable difficulty in adapting its conception of God's nature and causality to the process of evolution as science now conceives it. And, as Fiske clearly shows, this modern idea of God as active from within is, after all, not wholly new, but is largely a revival of the idea of God as it presented itself to the subtle Greek fathers of the Christian Church before the more practical and prosaic Roman mind made the shallower Deistic conception prevalent in Western Christendom.

Seeing, then, that God gives some real revelation of His character in man's moral ideals, it follows that the actual cosmos, if it be His creative work, must be fundamentally in accord with those moral and spiritual ideas and aspirations which become dominant in the most fully developed rational beings. In evolving a cosmos, the definite end of which is the development of the highest human qualities, we cannot but expect that He has never acted inconsistently with His essential character. The reasonable presumption, therefore, is that what we call natural and moral evils are unavoidable conditions for the attainment of God's supreme end; and that, accordingly, "even what look like failures and blemishes have been from the outset involved in the accomplishment of the all-wise and all-holy purpose, the perfecting of the spiritual Man in the likeness of his Heavenly Father." The justification of this statement is Fiske's main object in the first half of the third treatise, which is entitled "Through Nature to God." We do not think that here Fiske has done much towards the solution of the Problem of Evil. In regard to the extensive presence of pain in the process of evolution, he agrees with Professor Bain that pleasure and pain cannot exist apart from one another; and in dealing with moral evil he appears to follow Spencer, and to avoid any distinct recognition of the real Freedom of the human Will. But his lucid and conclusive criticism of Huxley's assertion, "that the Cosmic process has no relation to moral ends," is in the highest degree interesting and seasonable. With singular force and brilliancy he shows the emergence and the increasing dominance in cosmic evolution of the principles of self-sacrifice and love in modifying and counteracting the self-seeking instincts.

Probably, however, it is the latter part of this book—the part in which Fiske eloquently insists on "The Everlasting Reality of Religion"—which will be finally accounted his most important addition to religious thought. As he truly says: "One of the greatest contributions ever made to scientific knowledge is Herbert Spencer's profound and luminous exposition of Life as the continuous adjustment of inner relations to outer relations." Carrying this principle from the physical stage of evolution into the psychical stage, Fiske shows that the ethical and spiritual development of man imperatively demands for its adequate explanation the stimulating and guiding action upon human life of a real, though invisible, spiritual environment. At the critical moment, when rationality emerges in the process of biological evolution, we find the "Human Soul vaguely reaching forth towards something akin to itself, not in the realm of fleeting phenomena, but in the Eternal Presence beyond. An internal adjustment was achieved in correspondence with an Unseen World." Space does not allow us to dwell on this grand idea, so suggestive of quite a new continent of Reality, the earnest exploration of which as the needful complement to the study of physical evolution will erelong be discerned to be an indispensable factor in an all-round and truly liberal culture. All whose faith in the reality of the Unseen and the Spiritual has been weakened and perplexed by the negative arguments of scientists should carefully read and digest this section of Fiske's writings; and we shall be surprised if many of them are not brought to acquiesce in Fiske's contention that "so far as our knowledge of Nature goes the whole momentum of it carries us onward to the conclusion that the Unseen World, as the objective term in a relation of fundamental importance that has coexisted with the whole career of Mankind, has a real existence; and it is but following out the analogy to regard that Unseen World as the theatre where the ethical process is destined to reach its full consummation."

Individual Immortality, then, is the conviction to which we are inevitably led, if we accept Fiske's interpretation of the process of Evolution; for the true key to the meaning of that process must naturally be sought, not in the temporary physical portion of it, which is simply the preparatory stage, but rather in the later psychical development in which the main purpose and the complete fruition are being ever more fully realised. In all three of his treatises Fiske gives solid reasons for the "life everlasting," and the lecture posthumously published confirms his previous reasoning. It is written with much vigour and literary grace, and is highly interesting. But we do not think it makes much substantial addition to what he has so well said before. One argument in it is new, but its soundness is very questionable. He argues, apparently after the fashion of the late Professor W. K. Clifford, that the consciousness of man exercises no causal power over the movements of the molecules of the brain. "The physical circuit of motions," he says, "is complete in itself. As for our conscious life it forms no part of the closed circle of force, but stands entirely outside of it." This appears to imply that all our muscular movements go on quite independently of the causal action of our ideas and our personal volitions. The facts of consciousness appear to us to fatally oppose any such theory; and although it is sometimes said that the doctrine of the conservation of force requires it, we cannot but agree with Sir John Herschel that, though the dynamical force exercised by our wills may be too small to be scientifically appreciable, it must really exist, for, otherwise, "the mechanical results of human or animal volition are inconceivable." But whether this particular argument for the soul's possible independence of the body be tenable or not, Fiske has elsewhere given us abundant ground for his confident assertion that "the more thoroughly we comprehend that process of Evolution by which things have come to be what they are, the more we are likely to feel that to deny the everlasting persistence of the spiritual element in man is to rob the whole process of its meaning." DANTE AND GIOVANNI DEL VIRGILIO.*

A BOOK on Dante and his friends and connections of later life which two such accomplished Dante scholars as Mr. Wicksteed and Mr. Gardner have combined to produce, could hardly fail to be excellent; but I think that the present work will surpass the expectations which may have been formed of it. That such a book should have been produced at all is a proof of the interest which is taken at the present day in everything that concerns the mighty Florentine, an interest which less than a hundred years ago would have seemed nothing short of ridiculous, and which even Boccaccio, living as he did under almost the immediate influence of the poet, and holding him, spite of the essential differences of their genius, in the utmost honour, would have altogether failed to understand. "Some will have it," writes Boccaccio in his Life of Dante (in a passage quoted by the Editors at p. 326) "that he dedicated the whole (Commedia) to Messer Cane della Scala; but as to which of these is the truth (this or the separate dedications asserted by others), we have nothing else to go on, save only the random discourse of diverse; nor is it matter of so great weight as to call for serious investigation." It is otherwise now: wider and more sympathetic study and the labours of generations of scholars have enabled us to see Dante as what he truly is, the greatest Italian not only of his own age but of all ages, a man not the least detail of whose life or whose work is unworthy of the most serious study. Now hundreds of scholars are busy collating MSS. and ransacking archives; contemporary documents are eagerly published which can throw light in any way on the poet or his life and environment; the rectification of the date of an unimportant embassy† creates quite a little excitement. In this work of reconstruction English scholars are playing an honourable part, witnessing once more to the traditional love of cultivated Englishmen for il bel paese là dove il sì suona, and bringing to the task perhaps greater mental precision and a saner critical judgment than distinguish the majority of their Italian confrères, to whom, nevertheless, in regard to the niceties of Italian language and style, they must necessarily remain at a disadvantage. An excellent example of what the enthusiasm and sound scholarship of our countrymen are capable of producing in this field of study is afforded by the present work, the result of years of patient labour and investigation. It can hardly fail to raise still higher the already high reputation of the Editors as Dante scholars; while at the same time they will have placed under a pleasant debt of gratitude all serious students of the divine poet.

It is not likely that many, even among professed Dante students, will know very much of Giovanni del Virgilio, of whom, indeed, it appears that our knowledge is exceedingly limited, or will have made any very elaborate study of the Eclogues in which he and his illustrious friend exchange their thoughts and communicate their mutual plans. The Latin is often very crabbed, and the hitherto received text (as Mr. Wicksteed has shown by his collation of existing MSS.) often very corrupt; while, regarded from the purely artistic standpoint, they can hardly be considered very remarkable productions. They are graceful poetical exercises—hardly more: such as in an age when Latin was the universal medium for all writing which aspired to be elegant, men of any culture and any poetic sensibility, with Virgil's Eclogues before them as a model, cannot have found much difficulty in producing. Their main interest, indeed, is not properly poetical at all, but personal: we prize the Eclogues for the light they throw upon those closing years of Dante's life at Ravenna, upon his thoughts and hopes, his occupations, his friends. It is a pleasing picture—that of "the world-worn Dante" resting under the hospitable roof of Guido Novello da Polenta, as in a welcome haven after all the tempests of his agitated life, surrounded by the loving care of affectionate friends, and able to solace himself, while he closed his life's work with the "sublime cantica" of the "Paradiso," with the thought of the enduring fame which he knew would be his.* It must be said, too, that while none of the Eclogues and other poems printed by the Editors can be said, perhaps, to rise to the level of really great poetry, there can be no doubt of the superiority of Dante's contributions to this poetical correspondence over those of his fellow-contributor. This is particularly noticeable if Dante's First Eclogue (Carmen ii. of the Editors) be compared with the "Egloga Responsiva" of Del Virgilio (Carmen iii.). Here no one, I think, who, having first mastered the difficulties of language and style, should be free to regard the two purely from the standpoint of poetical merit, would have any hesitation in assigning the palm to the former, undoubtedly a genuine production of Dante. It has more of "the accomplishment of verse," and also somewhat of that indefinable quality which transforms verse into poetry.

A brief description of the contents of the work will not be out of place. The opening Prolegomena, dealing with Albertino Mussato, the historian and poet of Padua, and with the later years of Dante's own life (from the descent into Italy of Henry of Luxembourg onward), contain a mine of valuable information, brought together with the greatest patience and industry, and much of which will be entirely new to most readers. It is perhaps somewhat of a pity that the book should open with an elaborate study of a man, whose direct connection with Del Virgilio was but slight, and with Dante nothing at all; but he forms such an interesting and important figure, and his career has so much bearing on the history of Northern Italy during Dante's closing years, that most readers will not be sorry that the Editors availed themselves of the inclusion of Del Virgilio's epistle to Mussato as an excuse for an adequate account of the man himself. An Introduction follows, dealing with the occasion and matter of those various poems of Dante and Del Virgilio which form the proper subject of the book; and here the Editors present us with the little that is known of the life of Giovanni Del Virgilio himself. That he was in 1319 Professor of Poetry (or, as it would then be called, Rhetoric) in the University of Bologna; that his cognomen was no family name but derived from his admiration for the Mantuan poet, and his success in imitating his manner or in expounding him learnedly to his pupils; that he was on terms of intimacy with Dante; that he afterwards removed to Cesena, where he seems to have died without earning the poetic crown which he coveted—this appears to be the substance of what we know about him. Happy, indeed, for his fame was his friendship and poetical intercourse with Dante, who had scandalised him by writing in the vernacular, and that, too, on such weighty, terrible and mysterious themes (verily "a throwing of pearls before swine"), and whom he besought henceforth to write in Latin, suggesting at the same time in the most naïve manner a variety of subjects for his Muse from contemporary history, which he thought much more suitable than the dim realms of Tartarus and the state of souls after death! A Critical Text and Translation follow, not only of the four poems (two by Dante and two by Del Virgilio), which, under the name of "Egloghe Latine," find a place in all complete editions of Dante's works, but of all the other existing poetic remains of Del Virgilio, the most important being the long epistle in verse addressed to Mussato, which induced the Editors to bring together all that is known about that distinguished Paduan and present it in their Prolegomena. This part of the book, then, consists of the best available text of the poems included, with a literal prose translation, arguments, and a list of all important variants yielded by the MSS. appended in the form of footnotes. The final portions of the book are formed of the Editors' own elaborate and valuable commentary, an account of previous editions, &c., and of existing manuscripts, a litteratim reproduction of the valuable Laurentian MS. (xxix. 8) of the first four poems, with the original Latin interlinear and marginal Scholia (to which are appended the Scholia and headings existing in this MS. relative to the other poems of Del Virgilio which it contains) and a number of Appendixes, of which the one on the Epistle of Frate Ilario (now generally rejected as apocryphal) is particularly interesting. It will be seen that, from the arrangement adopted by the Editors, the text of the Eclogues, the Editors' commentary, and the original Latin Scholia have all to be sought in different parts of the book—an arrangement which is certainly inconvenient to the student, involving as it does the constant turning over of leaves, but which the character of the book perhaps rendered unavoidable.

To criticise such a book in detail in any worthy manner would demand a knowledge of this particular field of Dante study not much inferior to that of the Editors, and one at any rate far beyond that of the present writer. One or two points, however, may be briefly touched upon. It is hardly correct to say (p. 208) that there are "no marked echoes of the Eclogues in Del Virgilio's first poem," when there is at least the obvious derivation of v. 50 from the 36th line of Virgil's Ninth Eclogue; while the phrase Iovis armiger, afterwards referred to, is clearly from Aen. ix. 564. In regard to the much controverted passage, Carmen iii. 88-89 (p. 164), it is difficult (at least to a lay person who has had no opportunity of studying the MSS.) not to suppose that with sitim in v. 88 one ought to read potabor in the following line; that the hypothetical r never existed at all in the authoritative Laurentian MS.; and that the portabor of the Estensian MS. ("very incorrect," say the Editors) is due to a blunder of the copyist—especially as it is not easy to see what good meaning portabor can be made to yield. Reading potabor, on the other hand, both the pastoral cipher and the real meaning seem plain enough. "Despise me (and my invitation), if you like. I shall at least be visited by the great Mussato of Padua, who, if you don't happen to know it, is a countryman of mine." (For a learned account of the whole controversy see pp. 235 seq. and 277 seq.)

The book is a handsome one, well printed on good paper, and does great credit to all concerned with it. A few errors of the press have, however, as was almost inevitable, escaped detection, the most important I have noticed being paratus for paratis (Carmen ii. 63, p. 156). In conclusion, one can only congratulate the Editors on having brought their long and arduous labours to such a satisfactory result, and made such a valuable addition to the wealth of learning and illustration which is ever accumulating round the life and work of the divine poet, who, in the light of the imperishable fame which is now his, may well seem to have been thinking especially of himself when he makes Statius speak of the name of poet as

"Il nome che più dura e più onora."

SHORT NOTICES.

WE have received from Messrs. Williams and Norgate four little books [1s. each] on momentous subjects, by the Rev. George Henslow, M.A., the well-known Professor of Botany in King's College, London. The subjects are:—

1. The At-one-ment; or, the Gospel of Reconciliation.—The very way in which the author prints the word is an indication of the broad interpretation he gives to the old terribly-perverted doctrine. It is to him, as it is to Liberal Christians generally, the keynote of Christian harmony. Atonement and Reconciliation are synonyms in the earlier Bibles of the sixteenth century, and "to atone" signifies "to reconcile" in Shakespeare's plays. "Appeasing God" is an idea of barbarism; man is reconciled to God, but God is nowhere said to be reconciled to man. The misunderstood words, "Propitiation," "Sacrifice," "Expiation," and the like are explained in the same reasonable way, and, as thus interpreted, the At-one-ment may well be said to be the fundamental doctrine of the Gospel, and the "Orthodox" and Liberal theologies may be brought into harmony.

2. Christ no Product of Evolution.—Admitting, as almost every scientific man now does, the value of Darwin's theory of evolution as applied to the physical world, Mr. Henslow endeavours to show that "instead of Christianity being a gradual development out of Judaism it is a regeneration, often, indeed, involving a reversal of what had been previously thought to be right conduct," so that the assumptions of Herbert Spencer, Huxley, and Leslie Stephen that Christianity has been naturally evolved is a purely a priori induction, unverified and unverifiable. We may admit this, and yet hold that Jesus was largely influenced by his "environment," and that much of his highest teaching is founded upon the utterances of the Hebrew prophets, although restated with divine sanctions and the authority of a perfect life. Jesus, however, was not the mere product of his environment; he introduced a new motive-power into the world, making all things spiritually new. Even Leslie Stephen admits that he was "obviously a new factor in history," and Mr. Henslow closes with an apt quotation from Renan's "Vie de Jésus"—"He alone has introduced into the world a new spirit by which pure Christianity still presents, after eighteen centuries, the character of a universal and eternal religion."

3. The Argument of Adaptation or Natural Theology Reconsidered is an attempt to show that the argument from design, notwithstanding the doctrine of natural selection, is still tenable, as, we believe, Dr. Martineau maintained to the last. With many striking illustrations of his argument, derived from his rich store of scientific knowledge, Mr. Henslow comes to the conclusion that the theory that all animals and plants are naturally evolved in accordance with some principle of creation possessed by crude, unintelligent matter alone is altogether inadequate, that there must be a Divine Being, who has impressed the forces of life upon inorganic matter, who "created living protophasm with all its wonderful powers of heredity, variability, responsiveness, and adaptability — powers practically illimitable!" Mere matter whether protoplastic or any other, is not the measure or the limit of spiritual force.

4. Spiritual Teachings of Bible Plants is a popular interpretation of the symbolism of Nature, and the exquisite parables of the "Garden of God." In the teaching of Jesus many of the deepest lessons are taken from the simplest and most familiar scenes and processes of the natural world, and the ministers of his Gospel might with advantage, both to themselves and their hearers, more closely follow his example in this as in other ways. Throughout all these excellent little manuals there is a fine liberal spirit, showing that the writer is not one of those who believe "that salvation can only be secured by holding their own shibboleth."

The Ethical Philosophy of Sidgwick: Nine Essays, Critical and Expository. By F. H. Hayward, M.A., B.Sc. The student to whom is set the appalling task of mastering Sidgwick's "Methods of Ethics" as a "text-book" will find in Mr. Hayward's volume just the guidance that he needs; but the general reader will certainly be repelled by its style and arrangement. This is to be regretted, for few things would be more interesting and instructive to the general reader than a book which should bring into focus the arguments of Sidgwick's volume, which to all but experts is a volume seven times sealed. The convergence of different lines of ethical theory in England is evident, and equally evident is the rise of a new set of problems, seen in discussions of social questions in general and questions of international morality, as in the South African War, before which the old controversies of Utilitarianism, Intuitionism, &c., sink into insignificance. A book like Mr. Hayward's helps us to see that the old theories are converging to a result which becomes of practical importance as soon as it is understood. This makes us regret all the more that the author has not taken the trouble to arrange his material in a better form. (Sonnenschein and Co. 4s. 6d.)

MRS. BARBAULD AT HAMPSTEAD.

Hampstead boasts, for a fifth year, what is undoubtedly the most artistic and interesting of local annuals. It sets a high standard for this class of publications. Eminent writers (and Hampstead is fortunate in possessing so many) contribute poems, stories, and articles—notably this year being three papers on "Romney," "Sir Francis Palgrave," and on "Shelley's Adonais." But that which will particularly appeal to many of our readers is the excellent paper by Canon Ainger on "Mrs. Barbauld." (Is the Churchman or the compositor responsible for small "p" and "u" for Presbyterian and Unitarian?) It does not pretend to be a biography, or even a biographical notice, except for the mention of a few facts relative to her Hampstead life. It is chiefly a reminder of the general good accomplished by a woman remarkable in many ways. The writer speaks of her life at Palgrave, though apparently knowing it only as a time of school-keeping, and the writing of "Hymns in Prose for Children," and unaware of the ministry of her husband in that quiet village—years before the congregation removed to Diss. But the chief part of the paper deals with the life and doings in Hampstead, "the pleasantest village about London," with its distant view of "lofty Harrow, so conspicuously placed that King James called it 'God's visible church upon earth.'" Here the Rev. Rochemont Barbauld became minister of what is now the Rosslyn-hill congregation, then worshipping in but a third part of the present schoolroom. A tiny gathering, but the nucleus of the spiritual and intellectual activity and liberty of the place. Here, in collaboration with her brother, Dr. Aikin, Mrs. Barbauld produced the volumes called "Evenings at Home," still spoken of sometimes by the elders, and often with a tone rather disparaging to modern rivals—a tone which Canon Ainger echoes when he says "The children's books of to-day are written for the most part with one eye on the children, and the other on the adult readers, with the results we all of us know so well." Comparing the Aikins' work with that of Maria Edgeworth and Thomas Day, the Canon quotes a distinctive illustration:—

The Aikins have a way of striking a child's moral imagination which had no counterpart in the rival caterers for the nursery of their day. They, for example, tell of the little girl and her mother walking through the city on a Sunday morning, when the Anglican was coming out of his church, the Quaker out of his meeting-house, the Wesleyan and the Baptist out of their respective chapels. "See, my child," is the mother's remark, "how mankind differ." By-and-by a poor wayfarer is struck down with a fit in the open street. The Churchman takes his head in his lap, the Dissenter fetches a doctor, the Friend administers remedies, and all are alike keen to succour the distressed. "See, my child," is the mother's second comment, "how mankind agree."

Of Mrs. Barbauld's poems there is, perhaps, one only that will survive, and that only in its concluding stanza, the poem called "Life," which is quoted entire in the "Annual." The poem, which is based on the Emperor Hadrian's "Animula, vagula, blandula," begins and ends as follows:—

Life! I know not what thou art,
But know that thou and I must part;
And when, or how, or where we met
I own to me's a secret yet.

Life! we've been long together
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather;
'Tis hard to part where friends are dear—
Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh, a tear;
Then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time;
Say not Good Night—but in some brighter clime
Bid me Good Morning.

It was of that last stanza chiefly that Wordsworth spoke when he said to Crabb Robinson—"I am not in the habit of grudging other people their good things, but I wish I had written those lines."

Looking at the admirable portrait given in the "Annual," Mrs. Barbauld's profile seems indicative of her character, one who, in the essayist's words, "in an age of frivolity and dissipation in high life, set up noble standards and lived by them herself, and more than one generation of children has had reason to call her blessed."

CORRESPONDENCE.

UNITARIAN STUDENTS AT CARMARTHEN COLLEGE.

Sir,—Principal Evans writes with such strong reiteration and emphasis that I ought at last perhaps to have no doubt as to his meaning. I may be dense, but I must confess that I cannot for the life of me see how anything in my little book can be the real cause of his writing with such warmth. If I have transgressed, I have done so, as I said before, unwittingly. My obligations to Dr. Pan have been acknowledged, and in defining their extent in my letter, there was certainly no intention to "belittle" their value. On the question of the extract given from Dr. Pan's letter, I repeat again that my notes were sent to the Journal wholly and solely with the object of helping Dr. Pan and others, and sparing myself further trouble. I am sorry my effort to supply a known want has not been received in a more generous spirit. I had hoped it would be looked upon as a contribution to help on a subject of common interest. To me it is inexplicable why this protest was not made when the notes first appeared in the Journal.

Mr. Evans says he has been collecting his materials for ten or twelve years. It is not for me to doubt, nor to dispute the value of these materials—not having seen a line of them; but I happen to be older than Mr. Evans, and I have been collecting and adding to materials left me by my father and others, bearing on eighteenth and nineteenth century Unitarianism in Wales, for more than thirty years.

I have no wish to "belittle" Dr. Pan's list, and perhaps Mr. Evans has no wish to magnify it; but whether it be of little or much importance, there can be no harm in defining it. Take the first name as an example of the lot. To the best of my recollection it reads thus: "1796—David Davis—U," and that is all. That is the text, the whole of it. The sermon on the text is mine, and I cannot conceive it possible for any two persons independently to discourse alike on that text.

I began a series of biographical notes on Welsh Unitarians in the Christian Life as far back as 1884, as Mr. Evans may know, and he can hardly be ignorant of many a contribution from my pen to the Ymofynydd, even earlier than that, from 1873 onwards. But it looks, Mr. Editor, as if I must not write any more on this subject, lest I should trespass on Mr. Evans's "private material."

R. J. Jones.

Sir,—No one who knows Mr. Jones will for one moment believe that he has used unfair means to acquire the information contained in his new book. The ministers and laity alike of our churches in South Wales must have read Mr. Evans's accusation with astonishment. Mr. Jones has been gathering information about Welsh students and Welsh congregations, not for ten or twelve years, like Mr. Evans, but for thirty or forty years. He is a veteran in the work. When I settled in Swansea twenty-five years ago, I found at once that Mr. Jones was everywhere regarded as an authority on such matters, and I have frequently asked him for information which was always readily given. Many others are equally indebted to him, probably Mr. Evans himself. His book is an excellent and useful manual, giving in concise form information not easily accessible elsewhere. Mr. Evans's book will be, no doubt, a valuable addition to the literature of a very interesting subject, and will cover a much wider field than Mr. Jones's manual. But surely there is room for both. In giving a separate account of the Unitarian students, Mr. Jones has done good service, and there are many, like myself, grateful to him for the care and trouble he has taken with it.

PERSONAL.

Sir,—I have received a letter this morning embodying an utterly false report that I had given up Unitarian Christianity and gone over to Trinitarianism. I shall be glad if you will allow me here to repudiate this falsehood. To quote from my reply to the above-mentioned letter, "I should like to make it quite clear that I am a Unitarian Christian in theology, and that anyone who is not a Christian has no right to call himself or herself a Unitarian. There are so many who nowadays call themselves Unitarians and are not, that I avoid the word as, in England, deceptive." VERNON HERFORD, O.C.F.

Percy-street, Oxford.

WE have been interested to receive from the Rev. B. Walker, of Manchester, a copy of his annual report as Minister to the Poor, at 2, Goulden-street, Oldham-road, with a note appended by Mr. R. D. Darbishire, the treasurer for this ministry. Mr. Walker vividly describes some of the experiences of the poor people among whom he labours, and particularly the miseries of "washing day." The following passage of the report tells of another aspect of the work connected with the religious conferences the faithful missionary holds with his people:—

These are held after every religious service on Sunday evenings, and, like the old-fashioned Methodist Love Feast, afford a good opportunity for the expression of religious experience and mutual help.

May 31.—It was resolved that, taking into consideration that J. L., 21 years of age, a confirmed invalid with an affection of the brain, no father or brothers or sisters to work for him, but only his mother, who works from early morn to late at night at a machine for his sake, and to keep him out of the asylum or workhouse—this congregation agrees to give him threepence every Sunday evening out of their free-will offerings.

This gift—composed mainly of poor widows' mites—has been faithfully bestowed ever since.

Feb. 17.—I was never more impressed with the value of this "means of grace" than I was this evening.

H. A., an old man of 86, who had worshipped with us for the last five years, was full of trouble, and he needed our sympathy. His son, with whom he lived, the night before came home drunk and turned him out of doors. Being midnight, and not wishing to expose his son, he was obliged, having no money, to go and sleep all night on the seats in front of the Infirmary. And he was waiting out of doors until Monday morning, when he intended to seek re-admission into the workhouse (for he had been there before)—the last dismal refuge on earth to many from present misery and sorrow, and from the hardness of heart of those who drive so many thither for shelter. And this old man, on this cold February night, comes into our humble Meeting Room to unburden his heart and to bid us farewell.

We found him a bed for the night; reconciled him to his son; he is still amongst us, and, also, a recipient of threepence per week from our free-will offerings.

When I look into the faces of my poor flock of thirty or forty, as the case may be, on a Sunday evening, not knowing but it might be the last time on earth we shall be privileged to meet and join together in hymn and prayer, and that some present may part from us to seek a future home in the workhouse, it is pathetic in the extreme; and I feel grateful that such poor souls may have heard their last words of religious comfort, and found true sympathy, at this simple conference held in our Meeting Room every week in the year.

In this manner does this conference bring out the best heart qualities of those present, binding the poor together in neighbourly sympathy and friendship, and thus fulfilling, in some measure, "the law of Christ,"

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Small Things of the World.

II.

WE were noticing last week what the Epistle of James says about "The tongue is a little member," and there follow these words, "Behold how much wood is kindled by how small a fire." A little while ago I told you of a lovely lake amongst the mountains. Well, those words might have been written about that lake; for one hot summer day, in the forest beyond the lake, where the heather grew thick and deep, a little column of smoke began to rise. No one knew how it began, or if they did they never told. Perhaps someone lighted a pipe and threw down a match. Anyhow, some little spark set fire to the heather; everything was very dry, and the heather blazed, and in a few minutes the fire spread, and great clouds of smoke rose up; the wind was blowing strongly, and it blew the fire rapidly through the heather and into the firwoods, burning the trees, till an immense fire was raging, creeping on faster and faster, and seeming to lick up everything as it went. All the men in the district collected and tried to beat out the fire, and they worked till they were exhausted, but they could not stop it, and for several days it burnt, and left a sad scene of ruin behind it. It was terrible to see, both at the time and afterwards; and for nearly two years a large party of men have been cutting down the poor scorched and burnt trees, and floating them like rafts across the lake to a saw-mill, where a great engine cut them up.

Sometimes in their play children drop a cross or angry word; it sets companions' hearts in a flame, and anger spreads like that fire, burning up all that is near it—the pleasure and fun of the game, the kind thoughts of the players—even the fairness of their play. Everything is spoiled. "Behold how much wood is kindled by how small a fire."

If God is behind all the little things, was He behind that cross word? He was there to tell that child not to speak it—only the child did not listen. He would say that he did not hear; but that was because he was cross and unkind, and he shut his ears against everything that could stop him. God leaves us to choose what we say or do. He does not force us. That child might have stamped out that match of a cross word, and then the flame could not have spread to his companions, and the beauty and the pleasure of the game would not have been consumed and spoiled by the fire.

All our lives through it is little things that influence us. The song of a bird as we go through the street may bring back to us things long ago which we had forgotten. The drops of rain are very little; but think of the refreshment they bring; and how in hot lands and deserts poor travellers or soldiers have welcomed even a few of them. A nail in your boot can spoil your pleasure during a whole day's pleasure in the country. A little bit of dust in your eye will prevent your enjoying anything all day long. Sums on your slates are made up of little figures, but even ones and twos may grow to millions. The two little letters which make up the word "No," or the three that make up "Yes," may change the whole of a person's life.

You know that in India elephants are very much used; even in war they are very useful, and are trained to be most obedient and good. In a battle in India an elephant was employed to be the standard-bearer, and carry the flag of the British troops. The war raged around him, but he stood firm and proud, as if he knew what he carried. If it had not been for the steadiness of their standard, the troops would many times have lost hope when overpowered; but there it stood, firm and upright, and they fought on and kept up their courage. At last the elephant's keeper was killed; but as he had given the order to the elephant to stand there, there he stood, and the flag still floated above the battle. So the British troops were victorious, and great was the triumph amongst them as they saw their enemies flying before them; and great was their exultation as their flag still waved over the huge steady form of the faithful elephant.

And now they turned to leave the place, and tried to lead the elephant away; but he had had orders from his driver not to move from the place, and there he stood, and refused to move for any one except the master whose voice he was waiting for. But that voice was silent for ever, and someone must lead him away; one after another of the men tried, but no one could get him to move.

Then the men remembered that the master's little son used to drive and ride the elephant, and that he would obey the boy; so they sent a messenger to fetch him, but they had to send a long way, and before he could be brought the elephant had stood in that place three days and nights! But when the little boy came the elephant knew his voice and let him lead him away, and obeyed him in all that he told him to do.

What the little boy did was nothing wonderful at all, except as showing what wonderful power of love and understanding God has put into the hearts of people and animals.

So every person, however young and small, has his place in the world and his work to do. And the work and the place are specially his own, and no one else can exactly fill that place or do that work. If there were one ant the less the ant-hill would have one little stick the less; if there were one worm less there would be one little heap of soil the less; if one horse had no bit to guide him he might go all wrong and do a great deal of harm. If a boat had no rudder it would drift about and perhaps be swamped and overturned. Little things are wanted in the world as much as great ones or more; and little people have their place just as truly as the greatest men. The little coral insects make the coral reefs and coral islands that rise out of the sea.

Let us never despair then, but join hands, one and all, with our comrades—men and women and children, ants and elephants and coral insects; let us each carry our tiny stick and add up our ones and twos, and see how the work which none of us could do alone will grow and strengthen and come into order, till we learn how true it is that everyone has his place and his work and cannot live in vain. GERTRUDE MARTINEAU.

IF we live truly, we shall see truly.—Emerson.

MINISTRY TO THE POOR.

ON a Sunday afternoon last December the seventy-fifth anniversary of the establishment of the "Ministry at Large" in Boston, Mass., was celebrated in the Bulfinch-place Church, which, among the five churches now dedicated in that city to this special service, stands in the direct line of descent from the building in which Dr. TUCKERMAN began his great work for the neglected poor. Dec. 3, 1826, is the Sunday from which the establishment of that special ministry is dated, and at the Boston celebration, on Dec. 8 last year, the Rev. CHRISTOPHER R. ELIOT, the present minister at Bulfinch-place, told the story of its origin, while an address on "Dr. Tuckerman and his Work" was given by the Rev. S. H. WINCKLEY, who for more than fifty years has been devoted to that ministry. The memory of JOSEPH TUCKERMAN was gratefully recalled, not only as that of a founder, and a man who, in his own person, gave the noblest expression to what is known in America as the "Ministry at Large," but as "the inspirer of works greater than he himself could accomplish, the prophet of the best principles we have to guide us to-day in our Christian service and philanthropy." It was in the impulse derived from his example, as we stated last week, that our English Domestic Missions to the neglected poor of great cities had their origin, and when we desire to renew our loyalty to that ideal of Christian service we do well to remind ourselves of the kindling enthusiasm of that pioneer and the far-reaching significance of his life.

There is one feature of his work which we would specially note at this time. CHANNING called attention to it in his beautiful and most stimulating "Discourse on the Life and Character of the Rev. Dr. Tuckerman," and at the recent celebration it was again rightly emphasised by Mr. ELIOT. This feature was that TUCKERMAN in his complete devotion gathered up and gave more concentrated direction to efforts that had already begun to be made in Boston, seeing that before he came into the field a group of earnest young laymen had heard the call and felt their responsibility, and were already doing what they could to minister to the moral and spiritual, as well as the physical, needs of the neglected poor. Four years before TUCKERMAN had been obliged by failure of health to resign his long ministry at Chelsea, and had come to Boston, two young laymen had founded an "Association for Religious Improvement," into which were gathered with them a few others of like mind. The object was two-fold—to stimulate one another in a true religious life, and to give themselves to the service of their poorer brethren in neglected quarters of the town. Their first step was to establish a Sunday-school, and they also arranged, with the help of some of the Boston ministers, and notably of HENRY WARE, jun., at that time quite a young man, to hold Sunday evening services in a building to which the poorest of the poor would not be afraid to come. These services while they lasted were conducted, when the help of a minister could not be secured, by the young laymen themselves, but after the first two winters had to be regretfully abandoned. The ideal of such ministry to the poor was not, however, abandoned, and when in October, 1826, Dr. TUCKERMAN was elected a member of the Association the way quickly became clear, and the permanent "Ministry at Large" was established. As the work grew and shaped itself under the inspiration of that Apostolic man, kindling the fire of a new zeal in this country also, the sense of responsibility and the greatness of the opportunity came to be more widely felt, and in Boston, eight years after TUCKERMAN'S entrance upon his new ministry, the larger society, known as the "Benevolent Fraternity of Churches," was formed, organising the united strength and devotion of the city churches for this work among the poor. The Benevolent Fraternity now superintends the work of five mission centres, of one of which, the Parker Memorial Church, the Rev. C. W. WENDTÉ is now the minister.

But what we are anxious here especially to emphasise is that this most beneficent ministry in its beginnings was due to the zeal of that first group of young laymen, and that from the first, even to the present wide extension of the work, it has appealed to the men and women of our churches, and has needed their enthusiasm and their active co-operation for its perfecting. TUCKERMAN, indeed, set before us the noble ideal of personal service in this ministry. In middle life he had been compelled to abandon the charge in which he had found his happiness, because he could no longer bear the strain of regular preaching; but then, through his single-hearted, utterly unselfish devotion, there came to him in Boston a yet greater happiness, as CHANNING, in his Memorial Discourse, has told :—

> In a favoured hour the thought of devoting himself to the service of the poor of this city entered his mind, and met a response within which gave it the character of a Divine monition. He consulted me; and, in obedience to a long-rooted conviction, that society needs new ministries and agencies for its redemption, and that men inspired with self-sacrificing zeal for its redemption are God's best gifts to the world, I encouraged his faith and hope.
> At first he entered almost tremblingly the houses of the poor, where he was a stranger, to offer his sympathy and friendship. But "the sheep knew the voice of the shepherd." The poor recognised by instinct their friend, and from the first moment a relation of singular tenderness and confidence was established between them. That part of his life I well remember, for he came often to pour into my ear and heart his experience and success. I well remember the effect which contact with the poor produced on his mind. He had loved them when he knew little of them, when their distresses came to him through the imagination. But he was a proof that no speculation or imagination can do the work of actual knowledge. So deep was the sympathy, so intense the interest, which the poor excited in him, that it seemed as if a new fountain of love had been opened within him. No favourite of fortune could have repaired to a palace, where the rays of royal favour were to be centred on him, with a more eager spirit and quicker step than our friend hastened to the abodes of want in the darkest alleys of our city. How often have I stood humbled before the deep spiritual love which burst from him in those free communications which few enjoyed besides myself! I cannot forget one evening, when, in conversing with the late Dr. Follen and myself on the claims of the poor, and on the cold-heartedness of society, he not only deeply moved us, but filled us with amazement, by his depth of feeling and energy of utterance; nor can I forget how, when he left us, Dr. Follen, a man fitted by his own spirit to judge of greatness, said to me, "He is a great man."

There is the ideal for all ministers, devoted, in our Domestic Missions, to the service of the poor, and about them are gathered, in the same spirit, many helpers, active in various forms of beneficent friendliness. Through these Missions our whole people are called in each great city, and with the greatest urgency in London, to hasten to the help of the poorest of their brethren. The ministers themselves devote their whole lives to that unselfish service, representatives of many others, not lacking in faith and heartfelt sympathy, who yet cannot personally take up that most CHRIST-like work, and in the dreariest haunts of our modern life "go about doing good." To those others it is given to supply the means that shall adequately sustain the ministers and equip the Missions; and as to this, the appeal of the London Domestic Mission Society has made it known that the supply is not now sufficient. But there are many others also, who not only help with money contributions, but give abundantly in personal service to extend the work, and strengthen the ministers' hands and heart, going down, according to their opportunity, to the fields of labour, sharing many beautiful and helpful gifts with those who have so little of what makes the nobler strength, the beauty and the joy of life. There are innumerable ways of helpfulness, and no one with good-will, and even a little time and strength to spare, will fail to find something that he or she can give.

Greatest gift of all, whatever the work may be, is the simple presence of a friend: if it is merely the organising of a pleasant evening, helping a club of boys or girls, of young men or young women, to run smoothly—if it is teaching any kind of class, or helping just in the mechanical working of some society, keeping the books, or keeping order—or if it is in home visitation, perhaps in Provident work, or seeking ways of help through a wise charity—however any gift may so be bestowed among those whose needs are so great, it is always the same, Love will show the way—and the greatest gift of all is love, in the heart of a friend.

We cannot believe that our churches will fail to supply all that is needed for the adequate maintenance of the work of their Domestic Missions, and in time to extend yet further and in fuller measure that witness to a living Christian faith, and single-hearted ministry to the most pathetic needs.

A RACE IN THE HEAVENS.

DURING the last few months the Heavens have been developing before the eyes of men a beautiful and impressive event—a Race in the Heavens—a race of stars—of planets, rather, or worlds. To anyone watching the sky just after sunset, four planets, or worlds, other than our own, were visible. To the west Mars—soon lost in the wake of the sun. Farthest to the east, brilliant Venus. In the space between, two bright planets not far apart—Saturn above, and Jupiter below.

In the summer Jupiter was far behind; but night by night as one watched these two amongst the host of stars, with a black wall of pine trees below serving to throw them into more vivid contrast, one soon saw that the relative positions were changing; and that, little by little, the planet behind was gaining upon the one in front. It was a race in which the competitors were moving at the rate of from 20,000 to 30,000 miles an hour. Closer and closer they drew together until at last Jupiter, which was so far behind, was at the beginning of December just in front. The race was over—the goal was won.

This we have seen, and what we see provokes reflection. For we likewise have our race to run. It was a figure of life of which the Apostle Paul was fond, reminded of it as he so often was by the lithe forms of the Greek runners, and the broad, level stadia or courses on which they ran. Earthly athletics these, he said, and, admirable as they are, we all have a heavenly course to run as well. We can very easily make our life only an earthly race. But we can make it a heavenly race. And as with these shining planets, affording a still nobler figure, our life-race is no sensational sprint, over and won or lost in a few seconds, but a long-sustained pursuit—long as all our years, and pressing on into the infinite beyond whither no eye can follow. Yes, our race may be run solely on an earthly course amid the dust and lust and lucre of the world—amidst it and for it—but it need not be, even though we live upon the earth. The sphere of our senses is not the only country of the soul. Ours is a heavenly country and amid heavenly things the mind may, if it will, run its course.

All goodness is a tract in the heavenly country. All truth is a tract. All right praise and purity, all loveliness and love and health and gladness are territories over which the spirit may run its heavenly course. Whatever is true, whatever is serious, whatever is just, whatever is pure, lovely, courteous—all excellence, all merit, keep these in mind, pursue these things.

But while we may run our spiritual race among the stars, we are not fulfilling our duty by wandering aimlessly even among good things, wise books, honourable people, wholesome surroundings—even among stars. Persistence is a high quality—purpose is indispensable to character. It is needful to set the mind on one bright object and pursue it, even though it be very far off. If it calls to the soul, the soul must go.

I have a love, the love of years,
  Bright as the purest star,
As radiant, sweet and wonderful,
  As hopeless and as far;
I have a love, the love of years,
  Its light alone I see,
And I must worship, hope and love,
  However far it be.

Thus, if our calling be to any art or craft, let us exercise it until we do it with precision and generous ideas. One's reading may be wholly of scientific and wholesome books, and yet be to very little purpose—if there be no purpose in our reading. A commendable plan is to pursue a subject—and the busiest man amongst us can learn much of one thing in course of time, if he does not ramble about amongst twenty. Especially is this kind of pursuit inviting and ennobling when our subject is a human soul; and we work our way into a great thinker's mind, reading everything he wrote, observing everything he wrought, and taking note of everything that is recorded about him. Pursue your star—press on until, perhaps, some day you reach it.

Perfect knowledge of one thing is some knowledge of everything. It may be the star of your soul is a fellow creature. Dante has shown us to what heights of character, of joy and song, the love of man for woman may lead and lift the heart and intellect.

Or your particular star may draw you otherwise, into the track of compassion and dutiful care. If so, pursue it, and press on with steady devotion. It also will keep you moving among the lights of God.

We have been lately reminded how that gifted woman and indomitable explorer, Miss Mary Kingsley, held herself for years—the brightest years of life—a captive to a weary and trying invalid parent. But she won her prize through it—the prize of strength of character before which all fears fall into the dust, and a compassion which claims the right to help the suffering. Which, then, is the star that wins in the heavenly race? In the race of the Planets it is that which is nearest the Sun which wins at last.

We are planets, or wanderers, as the word means, round God, our central and sustaining light and life. He is our Sun—joy is His sunlight upon us. The victor in life is he who runs his course nearest to God—whose heart glows with trust in the eternal goodness, and who, by clear reflection of His grace, is most like what we feel God must be in spirit—not in form.

There are many sagacious ways among men, and many useful purposes, yet of these some do not strike the mind as being of the finest quality. It may be there is a touch of materialism about them—too strong a savour of worldly wisdom—an ambition for things of to-day and to-morrow, but a callousness to the things that are eternal. There are those who labour to please other men besides themselves without doing anything that we can think is very pleasing to God. That is good, but it is not good enough. Let us try to run our course near to God—with His flowing light of love upon us, with a fine daily confidence in His strength and His wisdom, awaiting in calmness of hope for the working out of His plan rather than ours.

Live near to God—near to Him in the heart of your heart, so that you do not have to attend church, and do not have to read your Bible, and do not have to say your prayers in order that, as you are at such a distance from Him, you may remind Him that you are there. But live in purpose and affection and thought so near to His purpose and His love and His thought that the motion of your mind is a prayer to Him, and that the inclination of your heart is a prayer to Him.

Speak to Him thou, for He hears, and Spirit with Spirit can meet—
Closer is He than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet.

Who runs his race near to God is a victor in life. And so let us provoke one another to strenuous moral effort—give one another points of character to emulate.

There is little honour in overcoming what we are ashamed of. The honour comes in surpassing what we admire; and admiration for virtue is itself a stimulus to acquire the same virtue. We must win our glory over stars of light—not merely over blank regions of darkness. He who has left gross sin behind has not come to the end. He has only begun the heavenly race—which is a strife to excel the light. As strong men let us rejoice to run this race, for it is a glad and noble enterprise. H. M. L.

"THE OLD HOME."

I WAS talking the other day with a lady who had spent last summer in Europe. She said: "It was interesting to travel on the Continent, but to be in England was pure delight, for it was getting back to the old home." Then she added: "And yet my father was born in Germany and my mother in Sweden."

In these days when there is a growing desire on both sides of the Atlantic to strengthen the ties that bind together the people of Great Britain and the United States it is well to understand what these ties really are. It is often taken for granted that race identity is the element that unites these two nations against the world. John Bull and Brother Jonathan delight to assure each other that they are "Anglo-Saxons," and that blood is thicker than water.

Now, whether John Bull is really so much of an Anglo-Saxon as he thinks he is, I shall not ask; but the plain fact is that Brother Jonathan's claims to this family tree are of the flimsiest character. The majority of the inhabitants of the United States are not Englishmen, nor are they the descendants of Englishmen. Every nation of the Old World is largely represented. Politicians know how varied are the elements to which they must appeal. The "German vote," the "Irish vote," the "Scandinavian vote," must be conciliated. In some sections a candidate with a Spanish name has an advantage. There are cities where the Poles or the Finns may hold the balance of power, or where even the "Syrian vote" may not he treated as a negligible quantity. Only this morning I read of indignation meetings of Portuguese-Americans in various parts of Massachusetts protesting against some remarks of the senior Senator of the State which had seemed disrespectful to their fatherland.

Not only do the majority of American families trace their origin to other lands than England, but the greater number of States are without any local traditions that connect them with the British Empire. Only the thirteen Atlantic States, out of the forty-five States of the Union, were ever British colonies. Here we have names like New England, Virginia, Carolina and Georgia. Everywhere in Massachusetts one is reminded that it was settled by Englishmen. Its counties bear familiar names—Norfolk, Essex, Suffolk, &c. Its important towns are Boston, Worcester, Cambridge, Gloucester, Lynn, Taunton. But when one reaches the Mississippi, the centre of the Union, he is confronted by another tradition. One may follow the Missouri River for four thousand miles from the Rocky Mountains through territory which was gained by purchase from Napoleon. The names of cities like St. Louis and New Orleans remind us that it was once a part of the colonial empire of France. Or through the south-west one may travel for two thousand miles, through Texas, New Mexico, Arizona and California, through land which was settled, and, until the last half century, controlled by the people whom Mr. Dooley, of Chicago, designates as "Spanish Anglo-Saxons." Here the towns bear such names as San Antonio, Santa Fe, Los Angeles, San Buenaventura and San Luis Obispo.

When one thinks of the heterogeneous population scattered over vast spaces and with such diverse local traditions, what becomes of the feeling about England as "the old home"? Is it, after all, one of those pleasant fictions which are suited only for after-dinner oratory? I think not. The ties that unite the typical American to England are not less real because they are more intellectual and spiritual than those which the Jingoes of both nations emphasise. They are not so much the ties of blood as of language, thought, and ideal purpose. The descendants of Swedes, Russians, Bulgarians, Italians are taught the English language in the American free schools, and become familiar with the great names of English literature and history. Mental associations are formed with the land of Shakespeare and Milton, of Hampden and Pitt, which cling to them through life. On visiting a school building, where children of various nationalities are being prepared for American citizenship, I was struck by the significance of the two pictures on the walls. On the one side was the Capitol at Washington, on the other the Houses of Parliament. The two buildings were symbols, easily recognised, of ordered liberty. There are now 17,000,000 children in the schools of the United States. These 17,000,000 young Americans are imbibing sentiments of undying hostility to George III., but they are also learning that Washington was contending for "the rights of Englishmen," and that that struggle went on on both sides of the Atlantic. Their imaginations are filled with pictures of English life seen through the genial eyes of men of letters. It is because the same currents of thought run through both countries, and the same ideals are cherished, and the same great names are household words, that the American whose ancestors may have come from other lands thinks instinctively of England as home.

As I think of the happy days spent last May in England, of the overflowing hospitality, and of the inspiring gatherings of liberal thinkers and workers in London, it seems to me that it is in such ways that our unity must be realised. When we compare the things which we have most at heart, we feel that we belong to one family. Every occasion which brings us together to compare our ideals makes us forget the things in which we differ, as we realise the greater things in which we agree. S. M. CROTHERS.

PROFESSOR HARNACK.

THE interest that is still manifested in Professor's Harnack's book on "What is Christianity" justifies me in sending at this late hour some account of the man himself and the circumstances under which the lectures were delivered. Every year the number of English students who visit the German Universities increases. During the past few years most of the theological students have made their way either to Berlin, where Harnack, Kafftan and Pfleiderer lecture, or to Marburg, where Hermann and Julicher hold forth. The name of Harnack at once caused me to decide upon Berlin, and I learnt the wisdom of my choice on noticing, as soon as I entered the University, that he was announced to lecture on the "Essence of Christianity." There was not a large number of British students present—I say British, because I met only one other Englishman. Among theological students the Scotch Presbyterians were in a decided majority. Of course, there was a goodly number of Americans, and here again the Presbyterians had the majority.

The lectures excited the keenest interest throughout the University. Students of all the Faculties flocked into the large lecture-room to hear what "the renowned Professor" had to say upon the subject. Rarely in modern times has such widespread interest in theological discourses been aroused among students attending so many diverse courses. In the Preface to the book it is stated that the lectures were delivered to a class of some 600 students. This is rather an understatement. In the lecture-room, or theatre, there are 660 numbered seats, which were all occupied. The students who came last, though they were all early, had to content themselves with any space that was free. They were to be seen leaning against the walls, filling all the window-sills, and blockading both the doors. A few were sitting on the low platform, from which the lecturer spoke, endeavouring to take notes in the books which rested on their knees. After the first lecture there was a general rush for the desk in order to secure numbered seats which were near the platform. But on this occasion the lecturer had not time to number the books, and his signature in my book is almost a straight line. I claimed seat 150, which I had occupied, but in order to make sure of it I had to go at a quarter to three every Wednesday. The lecture began at 3.20, the usual convenient academical twenty minutes being allowed. I generally found the seats in front of me filled when I arrived.

Prompt to time the lecturer appears, and the students at the door make room for him to pass. He is greeted with loud applause and stamping of feet to which he bows as he steps on the platform, at the same time taking his notes out of his pocket. By the time he has reached the desk, he has said "Meine Herren," and thirty seconds later is in the midst of his subject, as though he has been speaking half-an-hour. It will be noticed in the book that he wastes no time over introductions.

Harnack is of medium height, slim, wiry and erect. Indeed he is so straight that no one would suppose he had leant many hours over books. His hair and moustache are iron-grey. The former is brushed back as far as possible from a long and powerful forehead. His nose is aquiline, and his chin, though firm, tapers almost to a point. His bright eyes sometimes look out thoughtfully and piercingly from behind spectacles. The expression of the face is intellectual and genial. I must confess that all my prepossessions as to his appearance were dispelled at first sight. It is very difficult to say to what type his face belongs. It is not decidedly German, but I remember reading in a paper that his ancestry was partly Russian. The face grows upon one. I saw more and more in it every day, and at last was quite fascinated by it. From first to last I thought that its distinguishing characteristic was great strain. I shall always remember his uttering the following:—

> A great many books are written and sermons preached on the joy of work. I have always noticed that those who have worked little, speak of it as pleasure, and those who have worked much, speak of it as pain. Its joy comes in labouring for others and in serving in love. He who has worked much knows that it is a joyous thing to come to the end of the work. So labour in itself cannot be an ideal.

I have extracted this from my note-book. The full passage will be found on page 120. These words thrilled me at the time. They were delivered with great fervour. I felt he was speaking them out of a deep experience and that they were imprinted on his face.

The lectures have undergone little alteration through preparation for the press, and they were delivered from a very few notes. Many have expressed surprise at this fact. They would not, if they had heard Harnack give an Introduction to the New Testament extempore, bringing up the various opinions which had been put forward and criticising them in perfect order. Usually he lectured without a note. This was the case in his lectures on ecclesiastical history. Dates and events came in right sequence, and he never halted, wandered or drivelled. He seemed always to be at his best. As a lecturer he was eminently above every other professor in the University that I heard, and I heard many. Sometimes he came forward and, leaning one elbow on the corner of the desk, talked away in a most friendly and eloquent manner. He was prevented from doing this in the lectures on "What is Christianity?" owing to the proximity of the students. He was always absorbed, in his subject and seemed altogether free from self-consciousness. He would occasionally play with a penholder or other article, with which he used to emphasise his points, generally by moving it in a straight line from the middle of his face towards his audience.

It was really a most natural and effective movement. His build prevented him from gaining any control over his audience through physical force, which is so often the secret of oratorical power, but he threw so much nervous energy and enthusiasm into his lectures that he magnetised his hearers. Often, there would be a solemn silence and a sudden cessation of the rattle of paper and of the screeching of pens, as he reached the climax of one of his flights of oratory.

Harnack was most charming in his seminar or theological coaching class. There he was one with the students, encouraging them in the pleasantest and liveliest manner to express their opinions on the passages under discussion. His humour would at times cause the class to be convulsed with laughter. The twenty of us who gathered round the table got to know him as others did not. I once met him in his library at home, but he was busy and dismissed me politely in half a dozen sentences, granting my request and bidding me refer to him in all matters in which he could help me. I thought he would be rather nervous in society.

At the time I was living with a Congregationalist student, and later we were joined by a Presbyterian. We always invited our landlord, a very thoughtful man, to our discussions, in order that we might be compelled to carry on the arguments in German. We fixed a penalty for every English word spoken. The landlord was a Unitarian, and was surprised to come across an Englishman who had sympathy with his views. We first compared notes, and then followed a discussion on the lecture, which was continued on several successive evenings, until we heard the next lecture. Sometimes we were joined by one or two German theological students, and I was led to believe that there were several little knots who were similarly engaged in discussing the lectures.

Professor Harnack is an enormous worker. During my semester, which, unfortunately, I was unable to complete, he was delivering thirteen lectures weekly In winter his classes commence at 8 A.M., and in summer at 7 A.M. As he lives a great distance from the University, he must be a very early riser.

I cannot now give any criticism of the book itself, but I think that, in spite of the simple language of the lectures, many reviewers and preachers have misunderstood his meaning. It certainly does not favour the orthodox views common among us, though some orthodox leaders have hailed its publication with glee. Harnack does not, indeed, stand exactly where Unitarians do, but he does make an attempt to eliminate Christology from Christianity, and to make the basis of the Christian life independent of any belief as to Christ's person. He delivered twice with great emphasis the following sentence, which is to be found on page 125: "Jesus Christ desired no other belief in his person, and no other attachment to it than is contained in the keeping of his commandments." And he finished this head with the words: "To lay down any 'doctrine' about his person independently of his Gospel was, then, quite outside his sphere of ideas" (126). Here, I believe, I have his exact words in my note-book, which are:—"A doctrine to fix eyes on himself apart from his teaching Jesus Christ has not founded." The following passages are also of importance:—"This feeling, praying, working, struggling, and suffering individual is a man who, in the face of his God, also associates himself with other men" (126). "Jesus Christ and his disciples were situated in their day just as we are situated in ours; that is to say their feelings, their thoughts, their judgments, and their efforts were bounded by the horizon and framework in which their own nation was set, and by its conditions at the time" (p. 12). He does, however, assert that Jesus thought his relationship to the Father was unique and peculiar (pp. 128*f.*)

One other quotation on which he laid stress may be given from my notes. It is not in the book in this form, though its setting was in Lecture II., p. 29. It illustrates his frankness and called forth a storm of applause. "Gentlemen, do not let the stories and wonders in the Gospels deter you from reading the New Testament. You may not be able to understand them. Neither do I."

The Protestant clergy of Prussia, assembled in conference at Berlin a few months ago, condemned the book ("What is Christianity") as "a relapse into the superficial attitude of an antiquated rationalism," and declared that "by thrusting what, according to Scripture and history, is the essential part of Christianity into the background," Professor Harnack does justice neither to "the intelligent appreciation of history, nor to the true Gospel, nor to the necessities of mankind." But in spite of this and a hundred similar resolutions all broad-minded men in Germany and England will feel they owe a debt of gratitude to the "enthusiastic listener" who rescued these lectures from the ephemeral existence which Dr. Harnack in his modesty had assigned to them.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

THE activity of our churches seems to be as great as ever, and on the whole the prospects are very encouraging. The outlook of our Forward Movement churches is brighter than ever, and good work is being done. One thing causes anxiety, and that is the condition of the District Association's resources. Certain it is that more annual income must be secured somehow and from somewhere, and it is to be hoped that the personal canvass which is now being made throughout the churches will result in the increased financial support which the work eminently deserves. At Bradford the accommodation is taxed to the utmost. During last December the average attendance of scholars at afternoon school was 308, an increase of 58 on the previous year. There are about 360 scholars on the register, boys predominating; 134 scholars have qualified for prizes by their regularity and punctuality, and there has been an average attendance of 37 scholars over 16 years of age. There are 23 classes in the school. The evening congregation averages about 75, and its contributions, &c., are sufficient to cover local expenses. Classes and meetings of one sort or another are held every night of the week, and it is evident that this church is doing an immense amount of good in the neighbourhood. Students of the Home Missionary College still help in the visiting, and in this and other ways they render very valuable assistance.

At Heaton Moor the services are being better attended, and there are encouraging signs of more life in the congregation. Several new members have joined; the net gain, notwithstanding losses by death and removal, being six. There are more young people interested, and they are being organised in various branches of work. The social side of the church life is also being fostered. There are signs of a decided strengthening of the healthy working and worshipping element which, after all, is the secret of true success in any church.

The reports which reach me concerning Urmston are highly satisfactory. Both old and young are being interested in a variety of ways, and a feeling of attachment is growing which augurs well for the future. A series of sermons before Christmas, expository of the principles of our Faith, met with very gratifying results; they attracted inquirers who expressed themselves as being much interested and helped. A morning service has been started, with encouraging results. A great deal of week-evening work is done in connection with a Literary and Social Union, which embraces a social guild, an ambulance class, a girls' sewing class, a boys' wood-carving class, a recreation club, a rambling club, and a Shakespeare reading class for elder scholars. Improvements have been effected in the choir arrangements, a jumble sale has realised about £15, and the finances of the church are in a satisfactory condition; and, finally, the Sunday-school is growing and vigorous.

Chorlton also is consolidating and strengthening. Its congregations are increasing. Many an older congregation would have been discouraged by the difficulties it has had to surmount. A very handsome organ was presented to them some while ago; but the overhauling and fixing of it has cost about £80, and the final certificate from the architect shows an unexpected additional cost on the church building, so that instead of being free from debt the members find they have to raise £200 somehow or other, as, according to their Trust Deed, they cannot have a mortgage on the church. Accordingly, they have decided to hold a bazaar in the spring, at which they hope to raise the sum required. They deserve any help that friends in other churches can render them.

In my last letter I referred to the settlement of a new minister at Sale. Already there are signs of a growing vitality. The church is now free from debt, there is an increase in the number of seatholders, and everybody is in good spirits. A feeling is strengthening that something more must be done for the young people than is at present possible in the building known as the Old Chapel. It is small, inconvenient, and damp, and the congregation has made up its mind that new schools must be built soon on land adjoining the present church. If the folk are as earnest as they seem to be, they will quickly overcome this difficulty, for the ladies are organised for work, and that fact invariably spells success. A glance at the monthly calendar which this church publishes shows that the minister is determined to set a good example of persistent industry, for the work in which he is weekly engaged is about as much as the present accommodation will permit.

I also mentioned in my previous letter that a bazaar was to be held by our friends at Upper Brook-street. Their effort has met with the following result:—The subscription list amounted to £526 3s. 6d., of which £190 came from the congregation and Sunday-school. The bazaar produced about £420, and, after paying expenses, there is a total balance left of about £740. A supplementary sale of the goods left over will be held in March. Already the school and church parlour have been redecorated; in the spring the restoration of the stonework of the church will be carefully undertaken, and later on the church will be redecorated and relighted. After the proposed sale of work it is hoped that there will be money enough for all these purposes. Apart from this special effort, the church has had a successful year of work, and as many as eighteen new members have been enrolled.

The church at Blackley is making a brave effort to shake off its burden of debt incurred in the building of the new school. A sum of £330 is still required, and I do not know of any band of workers more deserving of help and encouragement. The school is admirably suited for all requirements, and a great deal of useful work is being done in it both on Sundays and week evenings.

Swinton is another outlying church that deserves well of us. They are a sturdy-spirited working-class congregation there, who never lose heart, but are always endeavouring, one way and another, to strengthen their position. Last November they held a sale of work with a view to clearing off a deficit on current account, &c., and by means of it they realised the sum of £72. The life there is vigorous and hopeful, both in church and school.

At Strangeways the question of removal is still engrossing attention. The Bridge-street Church has not yet been sold, but the feeling of the congregation has been thoroughly tested, and the committee, I understand, are asking the members to meet shortly to confirm a resolution which will definitely and formally pledge them to the policy of sale and rebuilding. This should mean a requickening of Unitarian life and interest in that part of Manchester.

It is a pleasure to report that the two Domestic Missions are working almost to the fullest extent of their capacity. Each could extend its Sunday-school, if it only had more accommodation. Mr. Bishop, at Willert-street, has held some very successful monthly lantern services, which have attracted as many people as the building will comfortably hold. Amongst other institutions for the young people at Willert-street is a Religious Guild, which is working extremely well, and exercising a good influence upon its members and through them upon the school. Eight young men and women connected with the Moss-side Church journey across town on Sunday afternoons and week evenings, to help in Sunday-school teaching, &c., while one of them is permanently taking up his abode in the midst of the Collyhurst population in order that he may devote all his spare time and energy to helping the missionary. Five other young women connected with the Moss-side Church go over to Renshaw-street Mission to help in Sunday-school teaching and other work there, where, since Mr. Timmis's settlement, a remarkable awakening of interest has taken place. The discipline of the school has very much improved, and the various institutions fostered within the Mission are encouragingly healthy. It would be impossible to estimate the influence that these two Missions have upon the lives of the people amongst whom they are situated.

In this connection I must not omit to mention the fact that a "Police-aided Association for Clothing the Destitute Children of Manchester" has now been established, with the Rev. S. A. Steinthal as Chairman of Committee. Indeed, it was mainly due to the initiative of Mr. Steinthal and our own Domestic Mission Committee that this institution was formed. It is backed by all denominations, and the Chief Constable is much interested in its welfare. When the subject was first publicly discussed in the Lord Mayor's parlour, the speech which made the deepest impression, and which probably did most to disarm any sectarian suspicion or disperse any fears as to the value and workability of such a scheme, was that of the Rev. W. J. Clarke, of Hurst-street Mission, Birmingham. His enthusiasm and his testimony were irresistible.

At a recent meeting of the Manchester Unitarian Sunday School Union held in my school, and at which a paper on "Sunday-school Music" was read by the Rev. A. Cobden Smith, a recommendation was unanimously passed on to the Union Committee requesting that steps should be taken to encourage the cultivation of singing amongst our scholars, and that if possible a yearly competition should be arranged amongst school choirs, on similar lines to that which has been established in London. We believe that some good things can come from the South!

There are interesting items I could record of other Manchester churches; but already this letter is a long one, and there is one more thing to which I must refer, because it affords unqualified pleasure to so many of us. You have already announced briefly the fact that Alderman Harry Rawson has consented to sit for his portrait. Who is to paint it, and where it is to hang, I cannot at present say; but we rejoice that he has given his consent any way. Some years ago a similar request was made to Mr. Rawson without avail; for he has always been one of those faithful, modest workers who find their truest and highest reward in their work, and who shun all public and formal recognition of it. The circumstances, however, are very special. We have something more than an admiration for Mr. Rawson—we have an affection for him. He is always so gracious and kind, and ready to give friendly counsel; and his fourscore and odd years sit so lightly on him that his heart is still as young as ours, and there is nothing going on in this city or in our national group of churches in which he is not deeply interested. The measure of his strength is the measure of his work—what more is possible to a man than that? We trust he may be spared a long time yet to pursue his self-sacrificing public work, and to be an example to us of sterling integrity, religious trustfulness and cheery optimism. It may, after all, be a small matter for so many admirers as he has to present his portrait to some public building; but the privilege of giving expression to our affectionate regard in this way is the main thing with us, and of handing down to posterity the presentment of a man whose quiet, loving service is an inspiration to all who know him.

CHARLES ROPER.

MATTHEW HENRY'S CHAPEL, CHESTER.

MEMORIAL WINDOWS.

ON Friday afternoon, Jan. 10, two memorial windows in Matthew Henry's Chapel were unveiled by Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., being his gift to the congregation, in connection with the recent bicentenary celebration. The windows commemorate Matthew Henry and James Martineau respectively, and in their central panels contain full length figures of the two teachers, the first minister of the chapel two hundred years ago, and the most distinguished and revered member of the religious community to which the chapel belongs, in the century just ended. The portraits of both teachers are described as life-like, and each figure stands in a niche formed by the surrounding ornamentation, while above is some canopy work in the style of the Italian Renaissance. The windows are executed by Messrs. Powell Bros., of Leeds.

At the unveiling, in the unavoidable absence of Sir Thomas Frost, senior trustee of the chapel, Major Bryan Johnson presided, and among those present, in addition to Sir John Brunner, were the Lady Mayoress (Mrs. J. G. Frost), Lady Frost, Mr. Samuel Moss, M.P., the Revs. J. K. Montgomery, S. A. Steinthal, H. E. Dowson, L. de B. Klein, H. D. Roberts, H. E. Haycock, E. W. Lummis, C. H. Wellbeloved, A. Payne, R. S. Redfern,

G. H. Smith, A. E. Parry, and W. F. Turland; Messrs. H. W. Gair, Alfred Holt, C. M. Holland, W. G. Holland, J. Harrison, F. Nicholson, T. A. Johnson, Major Evans, and many others. A large number of letters from friends regretting their inability to be present were also received.

At the opening of the proceedings prayer was offered by the Rev. H. E. Haycock, present minister of the chapel, and the Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved read a Scripture lesson, after which the Chairman welcomed the visitors, and having referred with regret to the absence of Sir Thomas Frost, acknowledged their great indebtedness to Sir John Brunner, who was one of their trustees, and called upon him to unveil the windows.

Sir JOHN BRUNNER, in the course of his address, said: I am glad, indeed, to be instrumental in putting into the possession of those who worship in this building a memorial of two beautiful lives, whilst I have to express my regrets that this little dedication is not to be performed by more competent lips than mine. We shall see in a few moments a memorial of two men whose work is among the treasures of the world. Their personality may be forgotten as time goes on, and their gracious and winning ways whilst here on earth; but the influence of their characters, though it may be more subtle and diffused as time goes on, is, I think, never to die. It is like the ripples on the water caused by the movement of a body, which are large and obvious at the first commencement of their creation, but which become less apparent as they spread. Their influence is exactly, it seems to me, in a degree, as the influence of a great mind—of the possessor of a great mind—the age of the possessor passes away, and the memory of his personality becomes more indistinct. Now, Matthew Henry, as most of us know, was the son of one of those ejected ministers of the Church of England of 1662. That disruption, that ejection, was a great loss to the Church of England; it was a loss to the religious life of the whole nation. We have had but little in our days—very little indeed—of movements of that character, inside the Church. The Church to-day is milder, is wiser, is more broad-minded. It contains to-day a Bishop of Hereford and a Bishop of Worcester—men almost as wide apart as were the Conformists of 1662 from the Nonconformists — indeed, I think, rather further apart. There are energetic persons, to give them the most praiseworthy and flattering adjectives that I can apply to them—there are energetic persons within the walls of the Church of England who would willingly expel the Bishop of Hereford and the new Bishop of Worcester. But glad we must be that they are not much listened to and that those two men are safe within the pale of the Church of England to-day. Happy change! The other whose memory we are honouring to-day is James Martineau, who has passed away so recently that a large number of us can claim to have had the intense pleasure of personal communication with him. He died quite recently full of years and honour. His personality, therefore, is still actually living. I remember very well my last interview with him. It was at Burlington House during the time of the annual exhibition of pictures. He was at that time ninety-two years of age, and he was there in company with his daughter going the round of the pictures which the Royal Academy annually exhibits. He took an intense interest in these, and his daughter by his side, who was no mean artist—and those who do not know that may learn it from the fact that the face of Martineau in this window is copied from a portrait of the late doctor by the lady of whom I am speaking. Dr. Martineau was considered by one who was an eminent judge, to be perhaps the greatest thinker he had ever known. His enormous genius surmounted all the difficulties in which his opinions placed him. In spite of the fact that he was a Nonconformist minister, he was invited by learned university after university to receive at their hands the highest distinction that they could confer. Now that fact is proved by a point that is very interesting to me. When I had to search amongst all the gowns that Dr. Martineau had the right to wear for one that would be the most becoming for portraiture here in this window, I had a great difficulty in deciding which to select. I hope presently you will be able to agree that I have chosen the best gown I could get amongst a large selection. I mention that as an illustration of the fact that Martineau was honoured by the learned throughout the world. Nevertheless the fact that the State is connected with a belief in the Thirty-nine Articles put immense difficulties in Martineau's way as a teacher, and caused, I am satisfied, a loss to the religious life of England, just as the ejection of 1662 caused a loss to the religious life of this nation. So the connection between Church and State to-day is again a serious loss, a serious hindrance to our religious life. Now, I offer to the worshippers here with cordial good wishes—to those who are carrying on as best they can the traditions of Matthew Henry and the traditions of James Martineau—I offer to them with a heart full of goodwill these memorials, which we hope they will find to be as beautiful as skill and care could make them.

Sir JOHN then unveiled the windows, and Mr. WILLIAM ORRETT on behalf of the trustees and congregation, made grateful acknowledgment, saying that they and their successors would treasure them in memory of the bicentenary of the chapel and as memorials of two beautiful lives.

The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON offered a prayer of dedication, which was followed by an address by the Rev. L. DE BEAUMONT KLEIN. Mr. C. M. HOLLAND then proposed, Mr. F. H. ILLINGWORTH seconded, and Mr. E. POWELL supported a cordial vote of thanks to Sir John Brunner, and Mr. T. Arthur Johnson presented to him a photograph of the two windows, on behalf of the congregation.

The Rev. H. D. ROBERTS proposed, and Mr. F. GARSIDE seconded, a vote of thanks to the Chairman, and the proceedings were concluded by the benediction pronounced by the Rev. J. K. MONTGOMERY.

On Sunday special services were conducted the Rev. H. D. Roberts, formerly minister of the chapel. The attendance, both morning and evening, was good, and the collections for the Restoration Fund amounted to £6 8s. 7d.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdare: Highland-place. — The annual meeting and prize distribution to the members of the Sunday-school took place on Thursday week. Some seventy scholars and friends partook of tea. Afterwards the Secretary of the Church took the chair, supported by Lieut.-Colonel Thomas Phillips and Mrs. Phillips, Mrs. Williams, and others. After a short programme of recitations and music, Mrs. Phillips distributed the prizes, and the rest of the evening was pleasantly spent in games.

Accrington.—At the annual meeting of members, held on Tuesday last, a resolution expressing sympathy with Mrs. Salter and her family on the death of Mr. Salter was passed. William Salter, who died the day before Christmas Day, in his eighty-first year, came of an old Lancashire Unitarian family, members of which had been connected with the congregations at Warrington, Chowbent, and Bridge-street, Manchester. He had passed an eventful life, a portion of his early manhood being spent in Russia, in the neighbourhood of Moscow. At length he settled in Accrington, and for forty-six years discharged with great credit the duties of a responsible post. He was one of the founders of the Accrington Unitarian congregation, and a trustee of the chapel, in which he maintained his interest till the last. A similar resolution of sympathy was passed with the widow and family of the Rev. Joseph Harrison, who died on Sunday, at Starnthwaite. Mr. Harrison was minister here from 1879 till the spring of 1888, and is remembered with affection. It was reported at the meeting that the Ground-rent Redemption Fund (£250) had been completed. As the holder of the ground-rent declined to sell, the fund, with the bonus added by the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, had been invested in railway stock, the interest to be applied to meeting the annual rent-charge. The congregation desire to thank all who helped in any way to raise this amount.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The fourth annual congregational party was held on Tuesday evening, Jan. 14, when a good gathering assembled. A presentation was made to the Rev. W. C. Hall, M.A., of a handsome secretaire by the members of this, his first congregation.

Belfast: York-street.—The annual soirée of the Sunday-school was held on Jan. 10, the Rev. Alexander Ashworth presiding. A report of the past year stated, among other things, that a class for young men and women, conducted by the minister, for the study of the Bible and Channing, established in October last, was being highly appreciated. Prizes were distributed; a short entertainment given by scholars and a song by the chairman (by request) being enthusiastically received. A lime-light exhibition followed, illustrating the benefits of total abstinence. Those present felt the meeting to be the most enjoyable of its kind held for many years.

Bristol: Lewin's Mead.—Last Sunday evening the Rev. A. N. Blatchford preached his annual sermon on "The Dead Year: Its Memories and Lessons," which is very fully given in the Western Daily Press of Jan. 13. In eloquent terms and with much feeling the preacher recalled the passing of Queen Victoria and of the Empress Frederick, and then spoke of the tragic death of President M'Kinley. Coming then nearer home, Mr. Blatchford said:—"What touches our memories most deeply is the spectacle of many a vacant place in the circle of our personal acquaintance, and still more of our honoured and closer friendship. The good souls we have known, the men with whom in furtherance of some worthy purpose, we have stood shoulder to shoulder, whose earnestness inspired our efforts, whose brotherly word of cheer and whose friendly glance lightened life's burden for us, of these we can think, and for their memories we can abundantly thank God as they seem to look out on us from the past, and sweetly bid us have no fear to follow the path they have trustfully trodden, a little in advance of us. Can you not instantly and happily call before your mind's eye the form, the ever-welcome presence, and the brotherly spirit of our loved friend Urijah Thomas? It is sad, we know, to be able to reckon him no longer as a faithful servant of Christ, in the ranks of those who still serve God and their brethren here on earth; but, is it not good to think of him as one promoted to wiser and stronger service, in a nobler life and a fairer scene than this? So earnest for the truth he held! So tender to the heavy-laden, the painstruck and the afflicted! So fearless in the fight for principle! So gentle and loving to the child! Who that knew him, and therefore loved him, may not reverently and in good hope cry from amid the duties of earthly life, 'Well done, good and faithful servant.' Bright be his memory to the city he served and to the friends he loved, and may the progress of the church in which his best powers were consecrated, and the happiness of his successor there, amply prove that he has not lived or laboured amongst us in vain." Then followed a tribute to the Roman Catholic bishop and other public men, including the late A. H. Wansey, so long devoted to the work of the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission; and after reference to the losses in the world of art and literature, the sermon concluded with remembrance of those who have fallen in the war, and with these final words:—"God help us to put on 'the armour of light,' to be ever faithful in our toil for right, and in our ward against all ill, waiting as those who watch for the morning, and knowing that 'the Son of Man cometh at an hour when ye think not.'"

Cardiff.—Through the kindness of the members of the congregation, who supplied the necessary funds, the West Grove Sunday-school had a very enjoyable New Year's treat on Jan. 8. After a substantial tea there followed a variety of amusements, including a dialogue by the scholars, musical selections, and a very clever ventriloquial entertainment. Prizes of books for faithful attendance were distributed by Mr. H. Woolcott Thompson, assisted by the minister, the Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, and the Superintendent of the Sunday-school, Mr. W. A. Moore.

Chatham.—The Sunday-school, with 150 children on the books, supported by a congregation chiefly of working men, is in want of some better-class story-books for the library, and especially of those suitable for elder girls. The secretary, Mr. W. J. Bailey, 48, Melbourne-road, Chatham, would be grateful to any friends who would help to supply the need.

Chelmsford.—The annual meeting and tea were held on Wednesday, the 15th, with a goodly attendance of members and friends. The chair was taken by the veteran secretary, Mr. Madocks, and an interesting programme of vocal and instrumental music and recitations was given, to the sincere enjoyment of all present.

Exeter.—The Rev. F. T. Reid, of Colyton, lectured at George's Chapel on Monday evening on "Religious Life and Thought in India." Speaking from his own experience as a Missionary in that country, he said that the Bible miracle stories would not impress a people who could retort that much more marvellous things had been done by their own prophets. What India needed was a pure and simple religion based on the teaching of Christ. Teachers who went to India must recognise the truths contained in the native religions. An interesting discussion followed the lecture, in which the Rev. J. M. Connell and others took part.

Gateshead.—On Sunday Martineau Memorial services were held morning and evening, the hymns, readings, and prayers being selected from the writings of Dr. Martineau. In the morning, the sermon "The Communion of Saints" was read, and in the evening the Rev. Arthur Harvie preached on "Martineau in the Oratory," dealing with the great teacher's exposition of prayer as set forth in his various works, and making special reference to the examples preserved for us in "Home Prayers." The stained-glass portrait of Dr. Martineau which adorns the entrance of the church was tastefully decorated with ivy for the occasion.

Glasgow.—General Booth, of the Salvation Army, was in Glasgow three days last week holding Council meetings of Scottish and Irish field officers in St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church, granted to them by the Church Committee. At the conclusion of the meetings, the General stated that he could not close the meetings without tendering his heartiest thanks to the minister and the Church Committee for the kindly and brotherly spirit with which they granted the use of their church, and sincerely hoped that they and the church would be none the worse for doing a good turn to the Salvation Army.

Kingswood, near Birmingham.—On New Year's Day the annual Sunday school party was held. After a substantial dinner the scholars gave an afternoon entertainment, which was followed by a distribution of gifts to them.

Malton.—On Thursday, the 9th inst., the members and friends of the Mutual Improvement Class spent an agreeable social evening together at the chapel. On the Friday evening following the scholars of the recently-established Sunday-school were entertained in the schoolroom; thirty scholars were present.

Preston.—On Monday evening the annual tea and meeting of the Percy-street Sunday-school took place, the Rev. N. Anderton, B.A., presided, and in his opening remarks feelingly referred to the death of the late pastor, the Rev. Joseph Harrison, and the company expressed its condolence with Mrs. Harrison and her family in their sorrow. Mr. Anderton then referred to the progress the school had made during the year, and Mr. Newell, the school superintendent, spoke hopefully and enthusiastically of the work done and the prospects for the future. It was announced during the evening that a bazaar would be held in the early part of 1903 for the raising of funds to provide classrooms for the school.

Shrewsbury.—The annual New Year's party of the High-street Church Sunday-school was held on Thursday, 9th inst., when between seventy and eighty scholars and teachers sat down to tea. The evening entertainment was presided over by the Rev. J. C. Street, and consisted of music, singing, and recitations exclusively by the scholars. Rewards, to the number of twenty-three, were distributed for punctual and good attendance.

Tavistock.—The congregation of the Abbey Chapel were entertained at supper by General Jacob on Friday, Jan. 3, and the Sunday-school children were provided with a tea and New Year's tree, from which presents were distributed. First-class magic-lantern pictures were shown, and a very happy evening was spent.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE catastrophe at Akureyri, the little town on the northern coast of Iceland, described in the letter of the Rev. M. Jochumsson, which we published last week, will have wakened a quick response of sympathy in many of our readers, and we are glad to follow the suggestion of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, whose letter will be found in another column, that we should receive donations towards a Relief Fund for the sufferers. Mr. Jochumsson tells how in their little town of 1,000 inhabitants fire broke out early on the morning of Dec. 19, and the only hotel and ten houses were completely destroyed. Eight families in that lonely little community are homeless and ruined, and while neighbours are doing what they can, there is not a rich man among them. Mr. Jochumsson is our trusted friend, and we feel with Mr. Armstrong that some help may well be sent from this country towards making good the loss. In addition to Mr. Armstrong's guinea we have already received £2 2s. from Mr. H. J. Morton, of Scarborough, and shall be glad to receive further gifts, which will be duly acknowledged next week. We would beg for an immediate response, that we may be able to send a message to Mr. Jochumsson at once that substantial help is on the way. Cheques or Postal Orders may be sent to THE INQUIRER Office, or to the Rev. V. D. Davis, 9, Nightingale-square, Balham, S.W.

A MEMORIAL service was held in the Royal Mausoleum at Frogmore on Wednesday, the anniversary of Queen Victoria's death. The King and Queen, their children, and other members of the Royal Family were present; also the German Ambassador representing the Emperor, Lord Salisbury, and others. The Bishop of Winchester, assisted by the Dean of Windsor, officiated. On this day, in future, Prince Albert is also to be commemorated with the Queen. The service was very impressive, with much beautiful music. The Bishop, in the course of a brief address, spoke as follows :—

We meet on holy ground. Set apart to its sacred purpose nearly forty years ago, this sacred shrine has been reconsecrated year by year in the dark December days by the offering within its walls of the solemn memorial tribute of leal devotion and pure, whole-hearted family love. We should miss the very meaning of the note which has for these many years been struck if we did not in our memorial service for the great Queen-mother keep fresh and green also the thought of the loved lives of those who passed before her within the vale, and whose memory she strove to cherish here. . . . . Surely if there ever were place, occasion, circumstance, fitted to stamp indelibly upon mind and soul the thought of the City of God and hereafter, the larger, the nobler life whereof this is but the prelude, or ante-chamber, the occasion is ours to-day; the place is here. Two lives of lofty impulse, quiet, persevering, straightforward strength, were knit together sixty-two years ago in earth's high places in our land. A generation passes, one is taken, the other left, and for nearly forty years the daily burden of a tremendous public trust was simply and courageously borne alone. Then at length, a year ago to-day, the burden is lifted from off the tired head, and in the truer, fuller life which lies beyond the temporary sundering of two lives is ended. Let us give thanks unto our Lord God! It is meet and right so to do.

O crown of love, to live and bear
Life's highest sorrows, deepest, best,
The grief that might have sown despair
Bloomed fruitful in thy patient breast,
And now thou goest robed in light
From love in faith to love in sight.

Memorial services were also held in Whippingham Church, Isle of Wight, Crathie Church, St. George's Church in Berlin, where the German Emperor and Empress were present, at Rome and in other continental cities. On the same day the accession of King Edward VII. was celebrated with due observances, special services being held in St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey.

PARLIAMENT re-assembled on Thursday week, and was opened by the King in person. Of the speech from the Throne Lord Rosebery afterwards said "a more jejune speech was never placed in the mouth of any monarch." One notable sentence with reference to the war was the following :—

In spite of the tedious character of the campaign, my soldiers have throughout displayed a cheerfulness in the endurance of the hardships incident to guerilla warfare, and a humanity, even to their own detriment, in the treatment of the enemy, which is deserving of the highest praise.

In the legislation foreshadowed the first place was given to "proposals for the co-ordination and improvement of primary and secondary education." The subsequent proceedings have not been inspiriting, the Opposition being divided, and the cloud of the war overshadowing everything else. A further Blue Book on the Concentration Camps, issued on Friday week, shows that the mortality returns for December were less than in November and much less than in October. The deaths, out of a population of 117,017, of whom 55,424 were children, were 2,380, including 1,767 children. The vigorous action taken by Mr. Chamberlain has borne fruit, but it appears to be impossible to secure any but the most partial improvement.

AT a meeting of the National Conference Superannuation Committee at Essex Hall on Wednesday afternoon, the following resolution was unanimously passed :—

That this Committee places on record its grateful sense of the untiring, devoted, and successful efforts of the Chairman, the Rev. Joseph Estlin Carpenter, M.A., in the establishment of the Fund, and tenders to him the expression of its warmest thanks.

A meeting of the Contributors to the Superannuation Fund is to be held on Wednesday, Feb. 26, to adopt a Constitution for the Fund, to pass By-laws, and appoint Managers.

IT is pleasant to hear that news of the home contributions towards the building of the Unitarian church at Auckland, New Zealand, reached our friends on the day before the formal opening of the church. Of that opening, on Dec. 4, the Rev. G. Walters, of Sydney, who was present, sends us an account, which will be found in our present issue. The Rev. W. Jellie also writes with delight of the enthusiasm which characterised the celebration. From miles around friends came in for the opening service and meeting. It was a day not to be forgotten, Mr. Jellie says, and "for earnestness and warmth I have not seen it surpassed anywhere in England." And if the opening day was great, the Sunday following was greater. The contributions to the church in the two days amounted to over £50.

THE meeting organised on Friday week in the Royal Victoria Hall, Waterloo-road, by the National Unitarian Temperance Association, in connection with the Twentieth Century Temperance Crusade, was most successfully carried through. The floor of the large hall was well filled by an audience of the people of the district, whom it was desired to reach, the speaking was good and forcible, and the musical entertainment provided thoroughly wholesome and well rendered. The Rev. Frederic Allen presided, and the two chief speakers were Mrs. Ormiston Chant and Mr. Fred Maddison. Mr. D. S. Miller, who gave a much-appreciated performance on his set of ninety Canadian sleigh bells, also made a forcible and characteristic speech. Mrs. Chant appealed with much feeling on behalf of the children, and declared that unless a stand was made against the growing tyranny of drink our Empire would go down, as the ancient empires of Babylon and Rome had done. Mr. Maddison endorsed the recent forcible appeal of Mr. John Burns, and spoke with searching power to his fellow-workmen on behalf of their homes. He recalled the pledge he had himself taken as a boy, thirty-six years ago, and the effect it had upon his life, even before he understood its full meaning, because he felt he had undertaken a responsibility. He also quoted Huxley's opinion as to the effects of alcohol. It was a great satisfaction to him to find Unitarians thus taking part with members of other churches in common work which touched directly upon life, the most important part of Christianity.

We re-publish this week from the Christian Register the greater part of an article on "Church Extension," by the Rev. S. A. Eliot, D.D., President of the American Unitarian Association. In another recent article in the Register, Dr. Eliot referred to the experience of the International Council of "Unitarian and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers" with regard to the use in its title of the "Unitarian" name. It seems that when the Council was established at Boston, grave doubts were expressed as to the advisability of its adoption, and when the American delegates came over to London last spring, it was understood among them, that "if it was found in London that the name was a hindrance, and prevented other liberal religious thinkers and workers from co-operating with us, we should not urge its continuance." But the result showed the groundlessness of that fear. The name, Dr. Eliot says, far from proving a hindrance, gave to the Council a great part of its significance and power.

Our friends and fellow-workers in Europe have discovered through us a name and a fellowship in which they all rejoice, and they have repeatedly testified not only to their pleasure in the most inclusive and appropriate name which has yet been found for liberal Christians, but also to their great appreciation of the fact that organised fellowships in America and England and Hungary already bore this inclusive and honourable name and maintained an inspiring tradition.

If, indeed, the name "Unitarian" means nothing more than anti-Trinitarian, then, of course, it is, and always will be, a miserable misnomer; but our European friends have no such association with the name. It is not to them a sign of theological division or the outcome of a half-forgotten doctrinal controversy. It is the name which best signifies to them the unifying tendencies in religious history, such as many earnest souls the world over are ready to support and help forward.

Our impression of the attitude of our Continental friends towards the Unitarian name, if we understand him aright, is not quite the same as Dr. Eliot's. In the representatives of the Liberal Churches in France, Holland, and Germany, we found indeed no suspicion of the name or unwillingness to co-operate with those who bore it, but a most cordial sympathy and keen delight in that unity of spirit which was felt to unite the members of different communities. In the Unitarians of England and America they recognised brethren under different names; but for themselves we found no wish to adopt the name, but rather a clear perception that it would not be natural to them, or useful as a distinctive label in their Liberal Christian circles. And for our brethren in India the name would, of course, be quite inappropriate. But the great point is that the prominent use of the name has been no bar to the fellowship with others of kindred spirit who do not and do not wish to bear it. And in this wider association, used as a designation for our own people, Dr. Eliot rightly points out that any narrow interpretation of its meaning would be intolerable:—

> Must we not see to it that the name is now lifted out of its local and provincial meaning? We must not permit so good a word to be surrendered to narrow uses or to stand for its lower interpretations. It ought to be strength and joy to us to bear a name that represents the only doctrine that the whole Christian world accepts. All Christendom can repeat together the opening phrase of the Nicene Creed, symbol of Trinitarianism though the Creed is: "I believe in one God, the Father Almighty." It is clear also that it is to be one of the great missions of Unitarians to unite the warring factions of Christendom in recognition of the great truths which they all hold in common. The faith it is given us to represent is that which breathes in the true worship of all the churches, that lies back of all the theologies, that, when present, sanctifies all opinions, and, when absent, makes opinion but a delusion. There is nothing in the name "Unitarian" that implies a movement committed to cheap negations. On the contrary, the name admits us into the realm where people of different minds and inheritances and nationalities can come together in united work and worship as children of one Father. We all propose to hold our loyalty to the Unitarian name and fellowship absolutely secondary to our loyalty to the cause which name and organisation represent. We stand ready to surrender the name if the cause of spiritual freedom and unity can be thus advanced; but the International Council has discovered to us how fortunate and happy is the name which at present we bear, if only we use it in its largest and truest sense.

The William Ellery Channing, who died towards the close of last year, and was buried in the Sleepy Hollow Cemetery at Concord on Dec. 26, was a nephew of the greater Channing, whose name he bore, a son of his younger brother, Dr. Walter Channing (1786-1876), a physician, who for some time held a medical chair at Harvard. Ellery Channing was born at Boston, June 10, 1818. In the Latin School of his native city he had Charles Sumner for a teacher, and afterwards went to Harvard, but did not graduate. He was a friend of Thoreau's (1817-62), and as a young man went out to Illinois, where he lived for eighteen months in a log-hut which he had built for himself on the prairie, something, it would seem, after the manner of Thoreau's hut by Walden Pool. Thence he went to Cincinnati, where for some time he was connected with the Gazette. In 1842 he returned home, married a sister of Margaret Fuller's, and settled at Concord. Ellery Channing was active as a journalist, essayist, and poet. He contributed to the Dial, and published several volumes of poems, a volume of essays, "Conversations in Rome between an Artist, a Catholic, and a Critic" (Boston, 1847), and a memoir of Thoreau (Boston, 1873). One of his volumes, "The Wanderer: A Colloquial Poem" (Boston, 1871), was edited by Emerson. In 1886 he published a poem on "John Brown and the Heroes of Harper's Ferry."

The funeral service, before the interment was in the First Parish Church of Concord, in the course of which an address was given by Mr. F. B. Sanborn, in whose house at Concord Ellery Channing had lived for many years. "His life," said Mr. Sanborn, "was quiet and almost unknown to most of his fellow-citizens. He added nothing to their burdens or animosities. His duties to those who were his companions or who served him were silently performed. He chose a recluse life, not from misanthropy, but because he was so constituted as to admit of no other." Mr. Sanborn described him as "the poet of outward nature and inward sensibility; too keenly alive to all that vibrates in the chords of feeling to pursue, or even accept, the routine of discipline; but also too perceptive of all the shows of Nature not to delineate them well in such verse as the Muse gave him. This was often magical in single lines or whole stanzas. But his impatience rendered him incapable of revising or polishing." Among the letters read was one from Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, recalling the "veteran poet, liberal, and transcendentalist," and saying: "I remember when the early promise of his genius was warmly acknowledged by friends and contemporaries, most of whom must surely have passed away before him. I recall also, with gratitude, his poem at the public commemoration of Dr. Howe's life and services, held in Boston a short time after his death. I think no mention of Mr. Channing would be complete without a quotation of his admirable line:—

> If my bark sinks, 'tis to another sea.

Dr. Brooke Herford's condition has so far improved, after his recent very serious attack of illness, as to allow of his being removed next week to his new house, 1A, Christchurch-road, Hampstead. But all friends will understand that he must not be troubled with any correspondence. All communications concerning Rosslyn Hill Chapel should be addressed to the present minister, the Rev. Edgar Daplyn, Powis Lodge, Pattison-road, N.W.

That which we are we shall teach, not voluntarily, but involuntarily. Thoughts come into our minds by avenues which we never left open, and thoughts go out of our minds through avenues which we never voluntarily opened. Character teaches over our heads.—Emerson.

LITERATURE.

THE FOURTH GOSPEL.

CHRISTIANITY! It is a name which is claimed by, and not refused to, forms of religion which are not only very different but utterly irreconcileable one with another. On one thing only do all who call themselves Christians agree—it is in the acknowledgment of Jesus of Nazareth, surnamed by his disciples the Christ, as "a teacher come from God," a true prophet, a leader in the way of truth and righteousness to eternal life. If then we could but find out what Jesus did do and teach, with at least as much certainty as we are possessed of about the teaching of Plato or even of St. Paul, we should have come a long way to the far-off Reunion of Christendom. Of old the problem was simply one of the interpretation of authorities, and even as such it proved insoluble; for that cannot be admitted as a solution of any problem which half the competent students of it are opposed to. But in our days, while little or no relief has come to us on this count, there is added the graver question of the value of the authorities themselves. We ask not only what did Jesus mean? but what did he say?—not only what do the deeds recorded of him bear witness to? but how far can we rely upon the record as historical? And to a great extent the old controversies about the meaning of the text have given place to the new and more urgent problem as to its authenticity and value as evidence.

Now a certain measure of agreement may be said to have been obtained in respect of the three first Gospels. That they are dependent on a common source [or on two sources], and that this source had its origin from the first preachers of the gospel, the companions of Jesus in the days of his earthly life—moreover, that they do not as a whole impress the reader with the thought of Jesus as of a supernatural and divine Person, but rather as of one endowed from birth with extraordinary powers and living in constant communion with God—so much will perhaps be generally admitted. It is in respect to the Fourth Gospel, which differs from the Synoptics, to use Dr. Westcott's words, "in the general impression which it conveys as to the duration, the scene, the form and the substance of the Lord's teaching," that no sort of agreement is attained, or seems attainable. And this just because of the supreme importance of its evidence.

If it could be discovered that Matthew, Mark, and Luke were variations on an apocryphal Gospel of the second century, the popular faith would hardly suffer, and there would, perhaps, be a general feeling of relief in the assurance that the Sermon on the Mount need no longer be a burden on the Christian conscience. But if St. John were shown to be neither an apostolic work, nor reliable as history, it were the end of the Trinitarian faith among Bible Christians: not that the doctrine of the Gospel is Trinitarian, but it is certainly Arian, and as such leads on to Trinitarianism. He who accepts the Gospel as a truthful record of the acts and sayings of Jesus must acknowledge Jesus to have come from heaven and to have a nature above human. But has this central problem of Christianity advanced now to the position when all that can be said about it worth the saying has been said? Are we to accept the conclusion of a recent writer* that Dr. Martineau having "devoted sixty large 8vo, pages to an exhaustive examination" of it, and assigned the Gospel to A.D. 140, while "Lightfoot, who was the most accomplished scholar of our time, a trained critic, an acute judge of documentary evidence, &c.," declared for the Johannine authorship—"which of these two authorities are we to follow?" is henceforth the only question which remains to ask? If it were so, indeed, we should be compelled to urge that of the two scholars that one should be preferred as a guide who was entirely free in respect of the conclusions at which he should arrive.

But we are not yet, at all events, driven to accept such a humiliating alternative. It may perhaps be true that all the material which can help to form our judgment has been collected; it may be that no more is forthcoming from the mounds of Oxyrhynchus or the monastic libraries of the East which will bear on the inquiry; but there still remains to us the difficult task to form a fresh judgment, biassed by no prejudice for or against so-called orthodoxy, and in the new light furnished to us by recent discoveries bearing on the state of parties and religious movements in the period—A.D. 80 to 140—to which the Gospel must certainly be assigned. And that such a judgment may really advance our knowledge candid readers of the recent work of M. Jean Réville, of the University of Paris,† will, we think, be agreed. "There are many learned works upon the question," he writes "in which the ecclesiastical historian and Biblical commentator may find very valuable information, but there is no book, especially no book in French [and we may add, in English], which, following the scientific method and putting aside all thought of maintaining the traditional position, places before the educated man, who is not a specialist in theology, a review of the whole question, so as to enable him to appreciate the reasons which have led the majority of competent students of to-day to reject the apostolic origin of the Fourth Gospel."

Our author divides the inquiry under three heads:—1. The Apostle John, as known to us through the Synoptic Gospels, the Acts and the Epistle to the Galatians; the traditions respecting him which were current in the early Church, and the testimonies to his authorship of the Gospel, Apocalypse and Epistles which pass under his name.

2. The Gospel, considered as a fact, independently of any theory of date or author. Its theology as set forth in the prologue, with an analysis and brief commentary on its contents.

3. Conclusions, consequent upon such considerations, as to the real author and the design of the work.

In regard to the first head, that of external testimony, it is Bishop Lightfoot who asserts that "in every one of the Christian writers up to the close of the second century, we observe phenomena which bear witness, directly or indirectly, to the recognition" of the Gospel. But there are two assumptions involved in this statement—a statement in support of which an immense amount of laborious ingenuity has been expended—and apart from these assumptions the statement, even if admitted, is of little worth. The first is that a reference to the Gospel implies an admission of the claim made for it to be Apostolic and Johannine—a claim which does not appear in the book itself, certainly not prominently and clearly. Secondly, it is assumed that wherever we find words quoted which are indisputably akin to passages of the Gospel, such words must be taken from the Gospel; whereas it may be quite as likely that writer and evangelist both draw from a current but partly esoteric tradition of a higher teaching of Jesus, a tradition which must have preceded the Gospel in which it was incorporated. The really striking phenomenon, as M. Réville points out, is that a work which, if that of the last and most beloved of the Apostles, "the disciple whom Jesus loved," must have been of all apostolic literature by far the most esteemed, should have attracted so little notice. And the more testimonies are discovered which go to show that early writers had some knowledge of it, the more remarkable becomes their slight recognition of it. We could, for example, understand—strange as it would seem—that Justin Martyr had not heard of it, because he had not been admitted into the select company of Ephesian elders who kept the secret to themselves: what we cannot understand is that he knew the Gospel, and knew it for the direct evidence of the most intimate companion of Jesus, and makes no use of it!

The conclusion to which M. Réville comes after a lengthy examination of all the evidence available is that none of the so-called Johannine literature is apostolic, and that "until the second half of the second century there is no trace of the recognition of the Fourth Gospel as the work of St. John, except in the Gnostic schools." The exception must be admitted and is certainly striking, so that more than one has been led to make the extraordinary suggestion that the real author of the Gospel was the very Cerinthus, from whose presence as a heretic John is said to have fled with horror. But it should be added that, according to M. Réville, "there is no trace in the Gospel of anti-Judaizing Gnosticism." It is never the God of the Old Testament whom it condemns, it is the Jews of the day, blinded to the testimony which their own Scriptures bore to the Christ.

As to the Gospel itself, the key to sound interpretation our author finds in the Judæo-Hellenic doctrine of the Logos as set forth in the Prologue. To some it has seemed strange that this Prologue should stand apart, as something distinct from the subsequent narrative and discourses, in which no direct attribution to Jesus of the name Logos is to be found. Not so to M. Réville. "The doctrine of the Prologue," he avers, "dominates the narrative more and more as it proceeds." It is difficult to understand how certain commentators still refuse to recognise that all the declarations which Jesus makes about his own person are the pure and simple application of the doctrine propounded in the Prologue.

So an explanation of the embittered controversies between Jesus and the Jews—which to some of us have always been painful reading—is to be looked for in the historic controversies which raged between Jew and Christian at the end of the first century. "One finds it hard to put oneself in the position of a reader, intimate with the Palestine of the time of Jesus, who can accept these dialogues as reports of what really took place. It would be almost as reasonable to assert that St. Francis of Assisi taught the scholastic theology to the pilgrims who thronged to hear him in Umbria." Not what Jesus did say to Jews, his kinsfolk and fellow-worshippers, but what such a one as Justin used to say to "the Jews," a race apart, with their law which Christianity had set aside, this is what the animadversions of the Fourth Gospel represent.

But it is impossible in the brief space allowed to us to do justice to the admirable exposition of the Gospel narrative which forms the larger part of this delightful book. It is not intended to offer a detailed commentary, dealing with the numerous difficulties of the text, some of which never have been, and probably never will be, satisfactorily explained. The purpose of our author is of more far-reaching importance. He would discover out of the writing the mind of the writer, and the intellectual and religious conditions in which he lived. Having set aside the traditional view of the authorship as of little or no historic value, it remained for him to investigate the problem from the only evidence available, that of the work itself.

The conclusions to which this investigation has led may be set down as follows:—

1. The Fourth Gospel was written in Asia Minor, in one of those churches where the Greek element prevailed, and theological speculation was most active. Ephesus may very well have been its place of origin, and so far there is no valid reason for impugning the generally-accepted opinion.

2. As to date, it is difficult to assign one to a writing which affords no chronological clue of reference to contemporary history. The argument from the silence respecting it till after the middle of the second century cannot be used as evidence that it only then came into being. It may —if not recognised as an Apostolic work— have been until then little known, or, even if known, not regarded as of importance. Moreover the absence of Gnostic allusions in the Gospel is an argument for an earlier date than that which saw the formation of the Gnostic systems of Basilides and Valentinian in the second and third quarters of the century. The conclusion then is that the final edition of the Gospel, including the last chapter, was completed between the years 100 and 125.

3. The writer of the Gospel does not himself claim to be "the disciple whom Jesus loved"; indeed, the words of ch. xix. 35, respecting the piercing of the side of Jesus, "He that saw it bare record, and his record is true," would ordinarily be taken as a distinct intimation that the eye-witness was not the writer. Nor is it possible that he was the writer of the Apocalypse, of which the leading ideas are of quite another order. He was originally, and must remain to the end, anonymous.

4. The Gospel is absolutely without value as history. To reconstruct the life and teaching of Jesus in accordance with its descriptions is as if one should write the history of Israel out of the books of Philo. But as Philo has preserved for us, and, what is more important, did make available to his own times, the secret of the spiritual life of Israel, even so has this Gospel made known to us the true Christ, disengaged from the temporal conditions and carnal investiture in which the other evangelists discern him. It is, as Clement of Alexandria called it, "the spiritual Gospel." The others make known to us "Christ after the flesh," to use the pregnant phrase of St. Paul, the Christ who died; this reveals to us the eternal Christ, "who dieth no more, death hath no more dominion over him."

These conclusions may, perhaps, stand as those generally accepted by such students of our day as have not accepted the Johannine authorship. But they are held provisionally only, pending the acquisition of further light. The date assigned to the Gospel by the earlier liberal critics has been recognised as half a century too late: if further argument or discovery of documents should show that we, too, have been mistaken as much as they were, and that A.D. 75 is nearer to the real date of its composition than A.D. 125, we shall be thankful if we have lived to see our errors corrected. If the Apostle John did write the Gospel, and if it is a true narrative of the words and deeds of Jesus, we shall be greatly benefited by knowing it for what it is. Meanwhile, all of us are groping to find our way in the dim twilight of early Christian story—our advantage (we claim no other) is that we recognise the dimness and uncertainty, refuse to admit tradition as authority, keep ourselves free of obligation to theory or dogma, and seek only to know the truth.

CHURCH EXTENSION.

THE Monthly Bulletin of the American Unitarian Association, in the Christian Register of Dec. 26, dealt with the work and condition of the churches in the Middle States and Canada. It opened with an article by the President of the Association, the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D., upon the general principles of a wise and healthy church extension, which contains so much that may be helpful and suggestive for our work in this country also, that we are glad to reproduce the greater part of it here. After a reference to the particular churches in the districts dealt with, the President continues as follows:—

The Middle States department enjoys a great advantage in that it possesses in some of its older churches grand object-lessons of what a true church may be. We may set forth our spiritual and ethical ideals with persuasive and convincing eloquence; but, to reach the souls of our fellow-men with power, we must make it evident that to upbuild Unitarian churches is the best way to bring in the kingdom of God. We must make men sensible of the magnanimous spirit of our faith, and convince people by something more potent than words that a Unitarian church upbuilds private happiness and civic righteousness, and nourishes a fruitful public spirit. In the Middle States department we now possess strong churches in which men and women worship sincerely and joyously, study freely, and work nobly in ways of practical beneficence. Such object-lessons are an immense help and stimulus to the new-born churches whose energies must be, for the time, expended in laying foundations, overcoming prejudices, and devising ways and means of maintenance.

The missionary work of the Association is always deliberately planned, and the lines of its development obey the laws of spiritual architecture. The principles of efficient church extension may be laid down as follows:—(1) The careful selection of the most eligible strategic points; (2) the securing in each selected community of a nucleus of earnest people of good local standing and real religious interest; (3) the selection, in co-operation with the people locally interested, of a devout, industrious, and cheerful minister; (4) the production at the initial meetings of a first impression of high purpose, wide-spread sympathy, and power of persistence; (5) wise, constant, and efficient supervision by a trusted denominational officer. The organisation of churches is as much a matter of business as the organisation of banks or railroads, and practical experience and skill is as necessary in the one case as in the other. Organisation cannot create religious life, but organisation is needed to conserve, foster, and utilise motive power and spiritual energy. The Association has no satisfaction in the creation of machinery merely for its own sake. The machinery which we set up is simply that which can communicate life.

Intelligent seed-sowing precedes efficient organisation. Exploration comes before settlement. The Post Office Mission is often the advance agent of a Unitarian church. Our missionary agents must often go to towns simply to discover what the conditions are, to stir stagnant waters with a new thought and let the people know that there is a religion that appeals to reason and emphasises the upright life as the way to salvation. Time must be given for the seed thus scattered to grow. It will grow if the right seed has been properly planted. A taste of the bread of life creates an appetite for it. Having learned that it is possible to be Christian without being Orthodox, men and women begin to feel that they need a church wherein their children can be trained in the larger, freer way. When this spirit is abroad in a community, the time for organisation is at hand.

In each and every case of church extension it has been the purpose of the Association and its local representative to first secure the right nucleus of people. Unless the nucleus is composed of persons who really desire to help bring in the Kingdom of God all our effort is in vain. Music and sensational oratory may attract a crowd, but nothing but religion will do the work of religion. To build a church we must begin with people who are interested in religion. Opposition to Orthodoxy will not make a church; intellectual curiosity will not make a church; the deep root must always be faith and hope and love. In founding a Unitarian church, we mean something more vital and organic than getting people to accept our opinions or to pronounce correctly our passwords. Strictly speaking, we do not make Unitarian churches. Life is not made, but transmitted and developed. We gather the people God gives us, and do our best for them by doing our best with them.

The nucleus being once gathered, the initial meetings become exceedingly important. It has been the habit of the superintendent in the Middle States to inaugurate new movements with a substantial display of power. It is insufficient to place a minister in charge of a new movement, and leave him to his own devices. It is always best to enlist in behalf of the new organisation the sympathy and goodwill and eloquent message of the leaders of our body. The syndicate method of massing our resources is the only one that fulfils the requirements of good business principles. Once well started, the growth of a new enterprise depends chiefly upon the quality of the minister in charge. He must be a man of "grace and gumption," or, in more elegant phrase, he must have tact, timeliness, and some knowledge of human nature. He must not only preach in constructive, conciliatory, and cheerful fashion, and live a clean, consecrated life: he must also know how to co-ordinate a miscellaneous company of people, mostly strangers to one another, so that no one will become jealous, and no one imperious. He must direct the movement of all concerned to a common purpose. An injudicious man may fail to gather, even in fields ripe for harvest; and failure prejudices our opportunity in that field and its neighbourhood for years to come. The right man in the right place will soon establish a strong, self-respecting, fruitful church.

The problem of church extension is not finished when the church is organised and a good minister settled: supervision is a constant need. Every new church sooner or later comes to a crisis when it is necessary that inspiration be afforded, and wisdom supplied from some outside source. It becomes necessary that some capable and trusted leader should visit such a church to speak a word of encouragement to pastor and people, to untangle misunderstandings, to shed the light of a larger experience upon pressing problems. This confirming of the churches is a large part of the work of the missionary officer. When we have once planned our campaign and established our lines, there must be no retreat. To secure prompt and permanent success we have only to pursue the policy of church extension which has been proved good in the now abundant experience of our communion, and then give to each new society a hearty sympathy and kindly counsel and a generous financial support. Through the Association and the Alliance and the other denominational agencies we must make each new church feel that there is power behind it, that it is not a lonely and isolated effort, but part of a larger movement—one company in a marching regiment. Then the strength of the whole denomination will become the possession of its weakest member.

AUCKLAND, N.Z.

THREE years ago, at the urgent request of a small but enthusiastic band of Unitarians, I visited Auckland, and conducted services on two Sundays. The weather was altogether unfavourable, but we had congregations numbering about thirty in the mornings and probably sixty or seventy in the evenings. As a result of my observations and inquiries, I sent Mr. Bowie a message to the effect that the cause was promising, if only a young and energetic minister could be sent out to take full and entire charge.

Later on, under commission from the B. and F.U.A., the Rev. Mr. Lambley, of Melbourne, paid a visit, and as the result of his report the Association made such generous arrangements that the Rev. William Jellie, B.A., was encouraged to accept the position of resident minister in Auckland.

Mr. Jellie has not been here two years, but the advance under his ministry has been remarkable. In August the friends were able to lay the foundation stones of a building—the first building for Unitarian worship in New Zealand.

In response to a cordial and even flattering invitation, I arranged to leave Sydney for a few weeks, in order to attend the opening ceremonies in connection with the new church.

The building itself is a bright and pleasing one, and is so designed as to allow of extension when required. At the inaugural service last Wednesday, Dec. 4, the Rev. Mr. Jellie preached to a congregation of about 250, who comfort bly filled the floor of the building. At he evening gathering, the gallery was occupied also. Speeches were delivered by Mr. J. C. Macky (chairman), Mrs. Draffin, Mr. Bradley, Mr. Fourlds, M.H.R., the Rev. W. Jellie, and myself.

The first Sunday services were held yesterday, the 8th, when Mr. Jellie conducted the services and I delivered the two discourses, that of the morning being on "The Religion of Jesus contrasted with the Theology of the Churches," and that of the evening on "Saviours of Humanity." The morning congregation numbered nearly 200, and in the evening, after every available spot had been occupied, many had to be turned away.

From others a detailed report will probably be sent to THE INQUIRER, but I deem it my duty, at the earliest possible moment, to express my delight at the change which has taken place during the last three years. The Association will have the satisfaction of knowing that its liberal assistance has brought forth good fruit. Those who were responsible for the choice of Mr. Jellie as minister will be able to flatter themselves with regard to their own judgment. And those who, in the old country, have so generously subscribed towards the cost of the new church building will be pleased to know that that edifice is likely to be well filled by an earnest and devout congregation, and will not regret the fact if they soon learn that the building will have to be enlarged.

I may seem to be writing in too enthusiastic, too optimistic, a strain. Well—no. The outlook is distinctly hopeful. Time alone can prove whether or not the harvest will be worthy of the seed-time; but even to one, whose youthful ardour has been somewhat toned down by the years which are supposed to bring the philosophic mind, the progress made during the three years, since last I visited this city, is enough to make the heart glad and to foster the hope that a strong and vigorous Unitarian Church has now been established in Auckland. Of course, in one sense (as Mr. Jellie says) their difficulties are just beginning, but those are the difficulties which resolute and earnest men can and will conquer.

REPORT FROM BRUSSELS.

THE annual meeting of the Liberal Protestant Church in Brussels, of which the Rev. J. Hocart is the minister, took place on Sunday, the 19th inst., after the usual morning service. The attendance was good, and the spirit displayed was warm and brotherly. The minister having mentioned with some sadness the manifold difficulties and slow progress of the work, several members spoke most kindly of his labours with the view to cheer and encourage him. The financial report showed that, thanks to the answer made by six English friends to the recent appeal in THE INQUIRER, the deficiency had been reduced from £18 to about £13. A member, who is an officer in the police, and in modest circumstances, proposed that an effort should be made by the congregation to supply the missing sum, and following his example the subscribers present immediately offered additional donations. Thanks were voted to the minister, to the English and Dutch supporters of the work, and to the two barristers, both present, who are fighting with so much patience and disinterestedness the long legal battles of the church. The senior counsel, in responding, declared that he merited no thanks, as in serving the church to which he belonged, he was serving himself and his family. Mr. Hocart concluded the meeting by expressing the fervent hope that success would soon reward the courage, the devotedness, and perseverance of his fellow-workers.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

OBITUARY.

PROFESSOR C. P. TIELE.

A BRIEF telegram appeared in the Morning Leader of Jan. 13, announcing the death of Professor Tiele at Leiden, but as no obituary notice appeared in any London newspaper for several days afterwards, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie wrote to Professor B. D. Eerdmans, of the University of Leiden, inquiring if the sad news was really true. In response to this inquiry, the following letter has been received :—

"Professor Tiele died on Saturday, Jan 11. He had been ill some weeks before, but felt extremely well again, and was expecting a nice day for going out. Saturday morning he rose at his usual time in good health, but collapsed suddenly as he was dressing. A spasm of the heart killed him.

"Being seventy years of age, he had to take leave as a Professor in the Faculty of Theology in September last, but he was still lecturing as Professor of the Remonstrant Seminary, and hoped to be able to teach Remonstrant students some years more. Two days before his death he sent to the Editor the last proof-sheet of his 'Geschiedenis van den Godsdienst.' It is a great loss for us and for religious science generally."

For many years Professor Tiele was a correspondent of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and he was greatly interested in the proceedings of the International Council held in London last May.

THE Times, in an obituary notice last Saturday, records Tiele's death as a momentous loss to the science of religion, "one of whose earliest and most learned chroniclers" he was, and gives the following biographical particulars. Cornelius Petrus Tiele was born at Leiden in December, 1830, and was brought up in the Remonstrant Seminary at Amsterdam, in preparation for the ministry. His first appointment was at the Remonstrant church at Moordrecht, whence he removed in 1856 to Rotterdam. There he was associated with Albert Réville, of the Dutch Walloon Church, and other liberal religious teachers. When the Remonstrant Seminary was removed to Leyden in 1873, Tiele became one of its professors, and from 1879 held a professorship in the Science of Religion in the University also, the chair having been created for him. His 'History of the Religion of Zarathustra' was first published in 1864, and in a new and enlarged form was embodied in his 'History of Religions,' the second volume of which he was just able to complete before his death. His 'Outlines of the History of Religion' was published in English in 1877, translated by the Rev. J. E. Carpenter. His Gifford Lectures on 'The Elements of the Science of Religion' were published in two volumes 1897–99. We shall hope to publish shortly a fuller estimate of Professor Tiele's work and personality.

The funeral was on Tuesday week, and Tiele's grave is in the same churchyard at Leiden, where Scholten, Rauwenhoff and Kuenen had been laid before him.

THE REV. JOSEPH HARRISON.

JOSEPH HARRISON, whose death on the 12th inst. we recorded last week, was born at Thorner, near Leeds, on May 22, 1856, but his early years were spent at York. Chiefly through the introduction of the Rev. John Kenrick, who gave him considerable assistance in his studies, he became a student of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board (now College) in Manchester. There he spent three sessions, 1876–79; and on the first Sunday in October, 1879, he began what proved to be a nine years' ministry at the Oxford-street Unitarian Church in Accrington. The following year he was married.

It was a strenuous and faithful ministry to which he gave himself at Accrington. In addition to the ordinary pulpit and pastoral work, he engaged in many extra duties for the benefit of his congregation, the town in which he lived, the kindred churches of the district, and the cause which he loved. A fine new school was built, and the chapel was furnished and renovated under his guiding impulse and direction. With his intimate friends and nearest ministerial neighbours, the Revs. Thomas Leyland (then of Colne) and C. J. Street (then of Padiham) he helped to form the North-East Lancashire Free Congregational and Sunday School Union, an organisation which for years united the churches and schools of the district in co-operative work, and did much to strengthen the cordial feeling between them and to popularise the Unitarian faith. He took a keen interest in the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, and, along with Mr. Street, did his best, though unsuccessfully, to persuade the Mission to establish a church at Blackburn, where both of these ministers had done much pioneer work in the way of visiting. From an obituary sketch written by Mr. Enoch Bowker, and published in the Accrington Observer and Times last Saturday, we take the following tribute to his work outside the church :—

As a writer of newspaper articles, as an active politician, as an organising educationalist, he did much towards helping Accrington in that decade, to keep abreast with the age. He possessed a clear head, a logical mind, and a keen perception; he was quick to see to the heart of things, and almost by intuition detected a weak point or a foolish statement. These gifts rendered him invaluable on committees, and for regulating and guiding public movements behind the scenes. As a director of the Accrington Mechanics' Institution he laboured hard in its Educational Department, and as a member of the Executive Council of the Liberal Association, Sir Joseph Lees and others will remember his valuable services. He was an invaluable friend, frank, faithful and loving; it was a privilege and an education to hold converse with him about books and men. He possessed a fine grasp of English literature, and the writings of John Ruskin were as household words to him.

In June, 1888, Mr. Harrison removed to Johnstone, in Renfrewshire, in order to take charge of a Mission congregation, two miles away, at Kilbarchan, which had been established by his friend, the Rev. C. J. Street, who had preceded him to Scotland. For three and a-half years he remained there, giving theological lectures at Johnstone, Paisley, Rothesay, Greenock, and other places, and taking an active part in local affairs. But the climate did not suit him, and he had a serious attack of hæmorrhage of the lungs, and felt it desirable to make a change.

Accordingly he accepted an invitation to become minister at Percy-street Chapel, Preston, entering upon the pastorate there in November, 1891. Here he happily worked, sustained by the affection and confidence of his people, for nearly eight years. In January, 1896, mainly through his exertions, the sum of £886 was raised, with which two shops belonging to the church were rebuilt at an enhanced value, and a debt was cleared off. The dissolution of the Nonconformist Council, of which the Unitarians were members, in order to form an Evangelical Free Church Council, to which they were not admitted, hurt both minister and people, and in October, 1897, Mr. Harrison preached a strong sermon of protest on the subject, which was afterwards reprinted. His successor in the ministry at Preston, the Rev. N. Anderton, writes :—

"Mr. Harrison's splendid services in the cause of Education are still remembered and recognised. With the thoroughness and ability which characterised all his efforts, he went to work and copied the balance-sheets of all the elementary day-schools in Preston. And in a series of articles published subsequently in the Preston Guardian, the facts and figures were set forth with a commentary. They exhibited the relative position of the various schools with regard to efficiency, teaching, &c., and instituted a comparison with the country as a whole, which, except in the case of the Catholic Schools, was far from flattering to Preston. The effect of the articles was immediate, and the vastly improved condition of things to-day is in no small measure due to Mr. Harrison's searching criticism and exposition."

Mr. Harrison's health began to fail in the spring of 1897, and, when winter's work came, he broke down under the strain. The ministers of the district supplied his pulpit for six months, while he visited the Canary Isles. There he regained his strength, and then he resumed his pastorate at Preston. But phthisis had laid its deadly hand upon him, and in the spring of 1899 he broke down again, and this time finally, resigning his pulpit to the grief of his people. In September of the same year he settled at Starnthwaite, beyond Kendal, and thereafter carried out the open-air treatment for his disease, with a short spell of eight weeks at the Sanatorium at Meathop. The death of his nineteen-year-old son, Herbert, in June, 1900, from the same disease was a great trial to him, but he wrestled bravely with his trouble, both physical and mental, and faced the inevitable change with cheerful fortitude. His patience and gentleness, his courage and happy faith left an indelible impression on the minds of all who were brought into contact with him. On Sunday afternoon, 12th inst., he passed peacefully away to the higher life, to steadfast faith in which he had led so many of his beloved people.

Mr. Harrison leaves a widow, two daughters, and one son. Taken away at the comparatively early age of forty-five, he has made his mark on the life of the churches and of the towns for which he laboured so faithfully, and his memory will be cherished in many hearts for long years to come.

C. J. S.

The funeral took place on Thursday, the 16th inst., in the quiet and beautifully-situated churchyard at Crosthwaite. After a short service had been conducted in the house by the Revs. C. J. Street and H. V. Mills, the coffin was placed upon the governess car, which Mr. Harrison himself had often driven, and the horse was led by Mr. Wm. Lydgett, the farm bailiff of Browhead Farm, in connection with Starnthwaite Colony. The two officiating ministers were in front, and the bearers, who were all villagers, walked by the side of the car, followed by Mrs. Harrison and her children, Mr. John Harrison, of York (father of the deceased), and other friends. The Rev. J. C. Pollard (of Lancaster), the Rev. N. Anderton (of Preston), and several members of the Preston congregation joined on the way to the church. It was a touching sight to see the little procession wending its way through the sweet country roads. The villagers had drawn their blinds as a mark of sympathy. In the course of a brief address at the graveside, Mr. Street said that, mingled with their sorrow for the loss of one to whom their hearts had gone forth in love was a great sense of thankfulness that to him had come sacred peace. Were they not right in thanking God for having delivered him from the burden of the flesh and freed his beautiful spirit for abundant life and nobler work? Nothing but physical weakness kept him back in recent years from the full activity of the ministry which he loved. Yet even in the patient bearing of his cross and in the pervading influence of his gentle nature he remained a minister of God to the last, as indeed he was that day in the Nearer Presence. His life was not destroyed: it had only changed its sphere and its direction, and, being lifted out of its hampering conditions, it had found relief and release at last: new light and power had come as the divine benediction, and the tender faith of years had found fulfilment.

MR. WILFRED CHARLTON.

THE congregation at Swinton has sustained a serious loss by the death of Mr. Wilfred Charlton, of Beech Farm, who after a long illness passed away on the 10th inst. at the early age of twenty-eight. A life-long member of the Sunday-school, he had, as teacher, secretary, and in other capacities, been foremost in all its activities, and there was no branch of its work in which he did not take an energetic part. In spite of the many claims of a busy life and of a variety of interests, he was unsparing in his unselfish devotion to the school, and never grudged time and labour in its service. He was business-like and thorough in all his undertakings, and an influence and example that will be sadly missed. His loss is deeply deplored by a large circle of friends and fellow-workers. The funeral took place at the Swinton cemetery on the 14th inst., the service being conducted by the Rev. W. E. George, assisted by the Revs. John Moore and W. R. Shanks, former ministers of Swinton Chapel.

BETTER to stem with heart and hand
The roaring tide of life, than lie,
Unmindful, on its flowery strand,
Of God's occasions drifting by.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I WONDER if any of you who read the "Children's Column" ever feed the birds during the winter months!

If so, have you ever noticed how frightened the poor little things are when they first begin coming for the crumbs? and how when they have at last summoned up courage to approach the window-ledge, they keep looking about, and as often as not fly away without picking up any crumbs at all?

They are such very timid little creatures that the slightest sound seems to frighten them, and make them think they are going to be hurt by somebody.

The winter before last when I tried to feed the birds regularly every morning with the crumbs and bits from the breakfast-table, I remember that at first I used to put the crumbs out, shut the window, and then watch for the birds from the other side of the room. They would not come near the ledge at first whilst I was there, but after a little while, if I stood quite still, they came; but as soon as I moved they would fly away at once.

Then my moving about the room did not seem to make any difference to them so long as I did not go near the window, and in a few weeks they even allowed me to stand at the window and watch them; and before the winter was over they would come flying down from the trees all round the garden on to the ledge as soon as I opened the window, not seeming to mind me in the least.

They found out that I did not do them any harm, but only meant kindly by them, and so the timid little things became quite friendly.

And I think that most animals would be the same with us, if only we could remember always to treat them with gentleness and kindness. But sometimes we forget, and the temptation to tease and torment the poor dumb creatures is too much for us. I am afraid this is the case with some children and grown-up people too, though I hope it is not so with any of you.

What a difference it would make in the world if we could always remember this great need of gentleness and kindness.

The difference would not only be felt by the creatures to whom it was shown, but in our hearts too, for I think we should find—yes, even the very youngest of us—that we became more kind and gentle towards each other, especially towards the little children, and also that our pleasure in teasing and tormenting them was fast disappearing.

I heard a story not long ago, and as it is quite true, I expect you children would like to hear it too.

A gentleman went to live in a very pretty house in a lovely part of the country in the North of England, and the house was surrounded by some beautiful old trees, and squirrels were often to be seen running and jumping about amongst them. Have you ever seen a squirrel?

Anyway you will know what very timid little creatures they are, and how they start up a tree at the sound of a footstep in the wood, so as to be safe from any passers-by.

Well, when the gentleman first went to this house, the squirrels used to run away up the trees and were very frightened whenever he came out; but after a time when he took out crumbs and nuts for them they came down to eat them while he stood near.

By degrees they became more and more tame, and would take the nuts out of his hand, or jump up to his shoulder, and gradually become quite friendly. Now they will even go right into the house through the open windows, and if allowed, will take bits off the plates whilst the family are sitting at the table; and if the gentleman sits down in his armchair to read, with some nuts hidden in his pockets, the squirrels will find their way in and get them!

A friend who went to stay at the house this summer told me how surprised he was to find these beautiful little creatures so much at home indoors.

Of course at first they were not so friendly with him, and would not allow him to feed them; but before he left they had found out that he, too, was very kind and gentle and would do them no harm, and would come and take nuts off the footstool by his feet.

So you see how the most timid little creatures can be taught, by gentleness and kindness, to trust and have faith in us; and what a pleasure it is to feel that they are not afraid of us, but can really trust us!

And so it is with everyone, for if we can show a spirit of love and gentleness towards our friends, yes, and to our schoolfellows and playmates, they will in time show the same love and gentleness towards us.

May I ask you to remember this story of the squirrels, and will you all try to be more kind and gentle towards others?

ALISON HALL.

IN the article on "Aspects of Women's Work in 1902," by Miss M. C. Gittins, in THE INQUIRER of Jan. 11, the old address of the Central Bureau for the Employment of Women was given by mistake as in Chancery-lane. The address of the Bureau, of which Miss M. G. Spencer is the secretary, is now 9, Southampton-street, W.C. (between Holborn and Bloomsbury-square). The office of the National Union of Women Workers is at 59, Berners-street, W. The secretary is Miss Emily Janes, who is also editor of the Englishwoman's Year Book and Directory, a publication invaluable for all who are interested in women's work.

THE Rev. W. Garrett Horder, of the Ealing Congregational Church, we learn from a note in the Examiner, is to cross the Atlantic this spring, sailing on April 16, to fulfil an engagement to lecture on "The Evolution of Modern Hymnody" at the Union Theological Seminary, New York, and at Hartford Theological Seminary, Connecticut. Mr. Horder is also to preach, on June 1, at Cornell University, and intends to leave for home on June 4. As editor of the "Treasury of American Sacred Song," which has been as warmly received in the States as in this country, Mr. Horder is sure of a very cordial welcome among our kindred across the sea. Those who know his "Hymn-Lover" and "Poet's Bible," and his collection of hymns, now issued under the title of "Worship Song," will hope, in some form or other, to read, if not to hear, his lectures.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

THE 116th annual meeting of the trustees of Manchester College, held last week in Manchester, the old home of the College, is reported in our present issue, and the annual Address of the Committee will be found to be full of interest and of matter for sincere congratulation.

Since the removal to Oxford rather more than twelve years ago, and particularly since the opening of the present buildings in October, 1893, the College has enjoyed cordial relations with distinguished members of the University, and has entered increasingly into the privileges which only Oxford can give. While not itself incorporated in the University, but established in the city as a Free School of Theology, Manchester College numbers among its teachers members of the University, and Oxford graduates in increasing number are found among its students. The recent experiment of a common residence for the students is felt to be an unqualified success, as will be seen from a passage in the Committee's Address, quoted in our report. The residence is recognised in the University as a private hall, with Mr. ADDIS as Master, and it not only affords to the students opportunities for common study and recreation, but brings them, in a way that was not possible before, into some real touch with the University, so that they learn something of the social life which prevails in the Colleges, and are saved from the isolation from which in the former state of things they suffered. Another link established with the highest intellectual and spiritual life of the University the Committee naturally report with great pleasure. When the late Professor MAX MÜLLER accepted the office of Visitor, it was felt that the tenure of that office by one of the most notable teachers in the University conferred high distinction on the College; and it is a happy omen for the future of the College that the Master of Balliol has consented to succeed him in that position. The Committee also congratulate Mr. CARPENTER on the Master's degree conferred upon him last year, and on his admission as a member of Corpus Christi College.

It is pleasant to note that the College was able to offer hospitality in the residence to guests attending the Bodleian Tercentenary celebration, and another feature of the past year, more gratifying still, was the part the College took in the summer meeting of University Extension students. Three short courses of lectures were given, by the Rev. E. I. FRIPP, on "The Mediæval Chronicler in England" (the two lectures which were subsequently published in THE INQUIRER); the Rev. J. E. CARPENTER, three lectures on "Recent Advances in the Study of Comparative Religion"; and the Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED three lectures on "Alfred as Scholar and Translator." Mr. FRIPP's and Mr. WICKSTEED's subjects were directly connected with the special period chosen for the summer meeting, and the former was taken at the instance of the secretary of the University Extension Delegacy, because not otherwise provided for in the programme. The lectures were so largely attended that they had to be delivered in the chapel, where the whole available space was occupied, and the College received officially, from the Secretary of the Delegacy, cordial thanks for the contribution thus made to the success of the meeting. On the three August Sundays during the summer meeting there were also large congregations in the College Chapel, morning and evening; in the evenings Mr. CARPENTER gave three lectures on the Life of Christ in Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible," Hastings' Dictionary, and the "Encyclopædia Biblica" respectively. This was one of those happy occasions in which the College is able to make its influence felt in wider circles, among large numbers of earnest students gathered from all parts of the country; and another such occasion, though on somewhat different lines, has been afforded by the Summer Session for Sunday School Teachers, which has already been twice held, and to a repetition of which many of our teachers eagerly look forward.

While the life of the College thus grows richer, and it finds ampler opportunities of service, the precious memories of its past are not forgotten. In this year's Address it is recorded that the white marble medallion of the late Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER, presented in accordance with the bequest of his daughter, the late Mrs. T. SMITH OSLER, has been erected in the chapel vestibule. The medallion, it is added, "is from the hand of Mr. HOPE-PINKER, who has thus had the honour of placing within the walls of the College presentments in marble of two successive Principals of the College, held in abiding reverence by their pupils and the whole body of Trustees, as they themselves were colleagues bound together by ties of close affection." And there is this further record :—

The Beard Memorial, presented by the family of the late Rev. Charles Beard, B.A., LL.D., has been fitly placed on the wall of the chapel vestibule, on a line with that to his beloved friend and teacher, Mr. Tayler; and the Committee receive with equal welcome both these gifts, bearing enduring testimony to the honour paid in the College alike to the beloved teacher of so many generations of students, with his high scholarship and broad charity and sweet and gentle spirit; and to the brilliant son of Alma Mater, who was one of the finest embodiments of its learning, one of the most eloquent exponents of its principles, for years its able and zealous Secretary, and, with his colleague and life-long friend, Mr. R. D. Darbishire, one of the two chief inspirers and initiators of the movement which led to its establishment in Oxford.

In bringing their Address to a conclusion the Committee note that the number of students now on the College books, either studying within its walls, or as undergraduates preparing to enter upon its course, is unprecedented in its recent history. And they add :—

Never were the Committee entrusted with the administration of the College full of more sanguine hope. The removal to Oxford is becoming justified by its results. The Residence is creating a new College-life, and bringing the Students into closer touch with the University. The College class-rooms are filling with students full of promise. The enthusiasm for the liberal religious movement throughout the world, awakened by the International Council in London, is fraught with inspiring hope for the College, all the more that an Indian and a Japanese are on its Students' Roll. The spirit of the age is with its vital principle of free search for the truth of God, and for religion unhampered by the impositions of creed or test, for the direct intercourse of the human Child with the Divine Father, no priest barring the way. The College goes forth to another year of its high task of preparing ardent young souls to minister to this religion of the free human spirit, with a hope and confidence born of the times.

With such a prospect the Committee confidently ask of their supporters means sufficient for the growing work. In the year ending with September, 1900, the New Century Fund, contributed by twelve friends of the College, cleared off an accumulated deficit of over £850, and enough remained to meet the deficit of the present year; but now it is necessary to secure new annual subscribers to prevent the accumulation of a fresh debt. The College has great opportunities and a noble mission, which its friends and supporters must help it greatly to fulfil.

LONDON AND DARTMOOR.

RIGHT in the whirling vortex of the city's central roar
I stood, and idly ponder'd on the ages gone before.
What a shifting scene of actors, of pageantry galore!

What a tangle of emotions in the human hearts that beat
'Neath the fustian and the broadcloth! What a maze of hurrying feet!
All that has been before them increasing crowds repeat.

Tho' outward fashions alter, the heart is still the same;
Life is to some a burden, to some an endless game,
Some rise in wealth and honour, others are crushed with shame.

But the eye is caught by fashions which quickly come and go,
And the changes too around us are more than outward show,
The same unvaried instincts in alter'd channels flow.

The story of the nation might here unfolded be,
If the eye that views the present could the past as clearly see,
When Plantagenets and Tudors were as full of life as we.*

. . . . .

In the silent heart of Dartmoor on primeval turf I lay,
And I scann'd the far horizon, and mark'd the fall of day,—
I rose while yet it linger'd to take my homeward way.

For the trackless moor was round me, and the wilderness was wide,
Save a distant tor fantastic I could trust no other guide.
A lizard and a lapwing were the only life I spied.

The rustle of that lizard, as it stirs the heather near,
And the peewit's cry complaining are the only sounds I hear,
Till the frogs renew their croaking by yon solitary mere.

Then this thought my soul possesses, as I feel the evening breeze,
Was it always thus on Dartmoor, with sights and sounds like these?
No tints of human passion did this picture ever seize?

Did no change but that of seasons, of the day and of the night,
Of the frost, the mist, the sunshine, mark Time's unceasing flight,
While on thy breast grew blossoms to greet no human sight?

In the march of man's proud progress, in its retrograde arrest,
Did neither one nor other stir the calmness of that breast?
Save by Nature's wild marauders were thy weak ones ne'er oppress'd?

It may be one passing moment, that some conflict here was fought
By our race in distant ages, whose rites are vainly sought
In avenues and circles with vanish'd meaning fraught.

But solitude and silence, for all that man might do,
Reign'd supreme in past millenniums, and now are present too—
Here where peace from sordid turmoil the weary heart may woo.

THE CATASTROPHE AT AKUREYRI.

SIR,—To those who have ever visited Iceland the catastrophe described by Pastor Jochumsson in last week's INQUIRER must present a distressing picture indeed. The extreme poverty of the people, unrelieved by the interspersion among them of any wealthy neighbours, must render such a conflagration appallingly direct in its production of something on the very verge of starvation. The burden of a few homeless and penniless families thrown on the community will be directly felt by all. The industry of the typical Icelander is incessant, but its reward is scanty in the extreme, while his abounding hospitality and goodwill should ensure him prompt and ready succour in the day of his distress from dwellers on less barren shores. It is painful to think of the many weeks that must elapse before an atom of relief can reach these poor folk from England or Denmark, or even an expression of fraternal sympathy. But better late than never. I venture to enclose a guinea in the confident hope that you will start an INQUIRER relief fund to be entrusted to the hands of Mr. Jochumsson, that you will appeal to your readers with an authority which a private correspondent cannot wield, and that those of your constituents whom fortune has prospered will come to the rescue with prompt and substantial aid. TEMPERANCE REFORM.

SIR,—May I call attention to the two suggestions by Mr. Street in his article on "Temperance Reform," as I believe these to be based on a wrong principle—Force—and would be injurious in their application.

The first suggestion is, that the family physician should be subjected to a system of boycotting if he does not declare in favour of total abstinence, and if he remains obdurate and refuses to become an "unwilling convert" he is to be dismissed.

What are we to understand by an "unwilling convert" in this connection? To me it has but one meaning, this: that a man shall be compelled to sacrifice his liberty of thought and self-respect, and profess a belief in doctrine and practices for which he has no preferential regard, before he shall be permitted to earn his living. The immoral pressure by which this deplorable result is brought about is lightly called "firmness." May heaven save us ever from "unwilling converts" in any department of thought or life! No doubt the discipline thought good enough for the doctor would soon be extended to others—with dire results. And the second is like unto it, namely, this: that Temperance reformers should unite in an "informal Vigilance Committee" for the detection of offenders under the new Act.

A gigantic evil attaches to this form of action, as it can only operate by the tactics of the spy and the methods of the common informer, which most men agree to call despicable. Surely that zeal is not according to wisdom, and very far removed from charity, which would stir up strife over "doubtful cases," when it is admitted that "the difficulties and dangers" of the new Act are so great.

I venture to hope that Temperance reformers will repudiate both these "suggestions," and the principle that underlies them, and refuse to advance their cause by unworthy means.

Curiously enough, the article concludes with an aspiration for sobriety and freedom.

A PARALLEL.

SIR,—There is perhaps sufficient resemblance between some of the phenomena recorded in connection with the Crucifixion (A.D. about 30) and some of those which according to Shakespeare presaged the assassination of Cæsar (B.C. about 50) to suggest the question:—Is the resemblance simply accidental, or did Shakespeare adopt and modify a passage in the first Gospel, and use it as a description of a "precurse" of a "fierce event"; or had he any, and, if so, what classical authority for the belief with which he credits a mediæval Dane that—

A little ere the mightiest Julius fell,
The graves stood tenantless, and the sheeted dead
Did squeak and gibber in the Roman streets.

MINISTERS' SUPERANNUATION FUND.—The acting treasurer (Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, 63, Bishopsgate-street, Within, London, E.C.) will be much obliged if all donors who have not already sent their donations would forward them to him at the above address. Receipts shall be sent with as little delay as possible.

UNITARIAN WORK IN THE KHASI HILLS, INDIA.—Prize distribution in connection with the eighth anniversary of the Jowai Unitarian Free School took place on the morning of Dec. 8, 1901, at Jowai, presided over by Captain D. Herbert, Deputy Commissioner. It was not held in September as in former years, on account of the ill-health of the manager (Mr. Kissor Singh) and of the headmaster of the school. Captain Herbert expressed himself very much pleased with the conduct of the children. Three boys passed the Government L.P.S. examination this year. A memorial service in connection with the death of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams was held in the Unitarian Church at Jowai, on Dec. 15, 1901. The events which took place during Mr. Williams's sojourn in the Khasi Hills were recalled to memory by Mr. Kissor Singh. The Nongtalang Conference will take place on Dec. 28, 29, and 30, 1901.—HAJOM KISSOR SINGH.

VOYAGERS TO THE LIGHT.

ON an island in the great ocean there dwelt a boy. Across the waters he saw the white sea birds come, the only strangers who ever visited that land, while year by year the same blue sky shone over it by day and the star-lit heavens by night. But the people amongst whom he lived were toil-worn and wretched, for they had not learnt how to help one another; and so each of them spent every hour of his day in gathering upon the sea shore or in the woods just enough to keep himself alive, and in fighting to save himself from the wild beasts he disturbed. And yet there was no escape from this weary life, except when one or another managed to make himself a little boat, and sail away across the ocean to the land beyond the setting sun.

As he grew towards manhood, like many a one before him, this boy's ambition was to build himself a boat and sail away. But the work proved hard, and his days were often spent in hunger and weariness. He had many failures, and when at last the boat was finished he was no longer very young, but nearing the middle of his life.

At last, one evening, everything was ready, and he stepped into the little craft, pushed her off from the beach, and hoisted his sail. A cloud hung over the island, making it dark and gloomy, but a gentle breeze blew off the shore and he steered across the rippling waves, away towards the light of the setting sun. Further and further behind he left the island, where hundreds of longing eyes followed him; fainter and fainter grew the wails and groans of those he left behind; and the air, which had blown hot and close off the shore, became fresher and sweeter as he got out to sea. Before him the Western sky flamed with red and gold, beneath him lay the black sea, pure and calm and mighty; while above, the sky grew to an even deeper blue, and the silent stars, one by one, began to light the night. Then with a mind full of such joy as he had never known before, he lay down in his little boat, and fell into a deep and peaceful sleep; and while he was asleep he dreamt a dream.

He seemed to wake, but his boat was gone, and he was on shore reclining on a couch within a gorgeous Indian palace. Everything about him was luxurious and beautiful, while all the people he saw had happy smiling faces. Everyone was eager to serve him, and he knew that he was a prince, born to be lord over millions of his fellow-men. For many years, as it seemed, he dwelt in happiness amongst his loving people within the palace and its wide domain, and nowhere did he see any sorrow or sin or suffering. But sometimes faint memories would come to him of the island, and he wondered whether that land of misery had been an evil dream, and whether, in truth, all God's creatures were good and happy; till at last one day he rose early, and, disguising himself as a poor man, he went outside his palace gates to see what life was like in the outer world, and there he saw a peasant with two lean hungry oxen ploughing in a field The man had hollow cheeks and sunken, fiery eyes, and was forever goading his weary beasts with a sharp stake tipped with iron. The Prince was sorry for the patient, struggling animals, and going up to the man he laid his hand gently on his shoulder and begged him to be merciful to the dumb creatures. But the man turned round angrily and asked how he was to earn bread for his sick wife and his little children and to pay tax to the Prince's men unless he drove his cattle hard. And the Prince was struck dumb and filled with wonder. All through that day he went about and saw men and women and beasts toiling beneath the fierce sun until evening. Some seemed happier than others, and often he would see acts of kindness and mercy which sent a light into his heart, but everywhere they seemed unable to escape a life of struggle and weariness that reminded him of the island.

So at last he returned heart-sick and weary to his palace. But he could not rest. All night long and all day grief filled his mind for the poor toiling world outside his gates, so that even his palace became a place of sorrow to him, and he longed again to escape to the land of peace beyond the world since all life seemed full of pain.

But as he pondered day by day some of the things he had seen fell out of his memory, and others remained and grew upon him. And first of all the patient oxen, toiling without complaint for their master, filled his mind with a sense of peace, and it seemed to him that he would gladly live their life of unselfish service. Then, one by one, acts of love and humility which he had seen came back to him, so that at last he felt that he had reached nearer the land of light on that one day than ever before in his life.

Then he awoke and found that he had never stirred from his little boat which still rocked gently on the waves. He raised himself, and over the lonely grey sea he saw a faint light behind some land. His first thought was that he was nearing the land of eternal day, where he should at last find perfect joy. But then he saw that it was nothing more wonderful than the daily sunrise, and that the land before him was only his own island home. For a moment he was overwhelmed by an unutterable sense of loneliness and grief, until the memory of his dream returned, and then it was as though a light had broken forth in his heart brighter even than the sunrise, and he was filled with a great longing to return to his people and teach them the lesson the Prince had learnt from the patient oxen and the toiling peasants. Visions rose in his mind of a great white-sailed ship which all should build together, and which should bear all in one great company away to the land of light. But the wind was now contrary, and he had to labour hard to reach the shore, and oftentimes in weariness he lay down his oars. Yet ever as he turned to see the land it seemed more lovely in the rising sun which bathed the steep rocks and woodlands and green slopes in the morning light.

When at length he reached the shore weary with his toil, no one helped him land, and even when he spoke they shunned him, thinking him mad to return to this land of sorrow. No one listened to him when he spoke of the great ship, and pleaded with them to help him build it; and it was many a weary day before he gathered a few round him who understood his great idea. And yet a change began to come over the island. Seeing his daily acts of kindness, and his earnestness to help and to ease all suffering, they learnt to help one another, and the island began to be covered with clusters of houses and little farmsteads and happy homes, which replaced the rude hovels each man used to build for himself. And now the old man, as he had grown to be, found, wherever he went, something that filled his heart with peace and light—a man helping to reap his neighbour's corn, children helping a mother at home, animals tamed and cared for, lightening the labour of man. But there was no ship built, and the old man's days were drawing to their close. Must he now lose all hope of ever reaching the land of eternal light?

High up in the midst of the island was a rocky hill. The green fields at its base gave way to a belt of dark pine trees, and above these the rock was bare or covered only with low bush and moss. The summit of this hill was always first to be bathed in the light of the rising sun, and last to lose the light as it set. Now on his last day the old man asked to be carried up by his friends through the woodlands and over the rocky broken ground up to the sunlit height above all. And here he sat in the warm summer air, and watched the evening light fade away, until the glow of dawn began to appear before the Western sky was dark. He gazed far out over the sea, and the island seemed a tiny spot of familiar earth rising out of the great unknown ocean. Then, one by one, the stars appeared and the lights of the cottages began to gleam far below, while scarce a sound was heard save the gentle distant roar of the breakers on the beach. Then, in the silence, he spoke: "Life is a voyage from deep to deep. Out of the unknown we came, and into the unknown we return; and we can tell nothing of our journey's bourne, save what we learn in the short day of our lives. Many years did I toil to separate myself from my brother men, thinking to escape from their sorrows and to reach alone that land of light which they could never win. But the further I journeyed towards the light, the more my heart within ached for those I had left behind, until it seemed to me that my solitary way led only to deeper darkness and despair; and ever as life seemed more full of pain, the thought of death became more terrible. Then, in pity, I returned, yearning to bring day into my fellow-creatures' lives, both men and beasts, and so the light broke first in my own heart. But ever as I saw the eyes of others round me shining clearer, I felt more sure that I had found the true way towards the light of Eternity itself. And now in my soul there is no fear nor loneliness, for as those little lights gleaming through the night in your homes below speak to you of all you love on earth, and gladden your hearts as you stand on this solitary peak 'twixt sea and sky, so now as I return into the elements from which I came, my home seems nearly reached; for those unchanging stars that light the universe in every part speak of an eternal power, whom life has taught me to call Love."

"THE UNITARIAN CASE."

THE following interesting communication from Dr. J. M. Whiton appears in Thursday's Christian World:—

"The American Unitarian Association has issued a pamphlet for free distribution, entitled 'The Unitarian Church: Its History and Characteristics. A Statement.' The author is Rev. J. H. Crooker, D.D.; but as having been read and approved by leaders in the Unitarian body, including such men as President Eliot, of Harvard, it has the force of a collective appeal by a very small, but very influential, religious denomination. It is irenic and constructive in its general character, and is one of the ablest presentations of the Unitarian case that has ever appeared. A point that it makes much of is the spread among other denominations of the intellectual views for which Unitarians, notwithstanding obloquy, have perseveringly contended. The extracts which Dr. Crooker quotes from the published works of such men as Principal Caird and Professors Gilbert, Pain, and others among American Congregationalists and Presbyterians, put it beyond all gainsaying that beside the explicit Unitarianism found in the denomination so called, an implicit Unitarianism in theological thought is leavening other denominations. The term 'Unitarianism,' however, now connotes a concrete and practical, rather than a speculative and intellectual attitude in the field of religious interest, and here its specific difference from other forms of Christianity is more marked. For instance, Unitarian mission work is distinctively literary, rather than evangelistic. The most striking point made by this Apologia pro Ecclesia Nostra is in its showing that American Unitarians are very far in the lead of all other American religious bodies in their proportional contribution of names of high rank to the list of leaders in literature, philanthropy, education, statesmanship, &c. Among writers of the best devotional hymns in the last century one-fifth, or forty times their numerical proportion, are Unitarians. In America the appearance of this pamphlet accentuates a question which, in New England at least, has begun to be asked among non-Unitarian Christians: whether existing facts do not condemn persistence in the reproach and proscription of Unitarians that have prevailed in the past; and whether their alleged deficiencies, whatever they are, might not be more effectively and Christianly dealt with in the way of fraternity and Christian fellowship. He who answered the question, 'Who is my neighbour?' by the picture of the Good Samaritan would doubtless give a more inclusive reply than many who pride themselves on orthodoxy give to the question, 'Who is my brother?'"

I WANT to tell you a secret. The way to make yourself pleasing to others is to show that you care for them. The world is like the miller of Mansfield, "who cared for nobody, no, not he, because nobody cared for him." And the whole world will serve you so, if you give them the same cause. Let others, therefore, see that you care for them by showing them what Sterne so happily calls "the small, sweet courtesies."—William Wirt.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE 116th annual meeting of the trustees of Manchester College was held on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 16, in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, the President, Mr. WILLIAM COLFOX, in the chair.

The Treasurer, Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, read his statement of accounts, and said he had never had more pleasure in presenting them. They had got rid of the Lingmore estate, and although the capital account was reduced by £2,000, the result was an increase in the income account of £100 a year. Expenses had increased, but that was owing to an increase in the number of students. The annual subscription list had not fallen off—a satisfactory fact as far as it went—but he thought it ought to be worked up to £1,500 a year at least.

The income and expenditure account, with a total of £3,663 3s. 2d., showed receipts from investments, £2,332 13s. 1d.; annual subscriptions, £1,028 1s. (as against £1,022 2s. in the previous year); benefactions, £72 2s.; and 4s. 5d. from the sale of pamphlets, leaving an adverse balance of £230 2s. 8d., met by a transfer from the New Century Fund. The expenditure included £1,500 for salaries, £450 for exhibition to students, and £475 for external scholarships, as compared with £400 and £425 respectively in the previous year. There was also a corresponding increase in the house account from £495 10s. 9d. to £547 16s. 10d.

On the motion of Mr. J. W. SCOTT (Auditor), seconded by Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON, the accounts were adopted.

The Committee's Report was taken as read, and in moving its adoption, the PRESIDENT reviewed the various points of interest.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG seconded, and the Report was adopted.

The Report opened with a reference to the death of Queen Victoria, recording that at the first meeting of the Committee, on Jan. 28 last year, the Chairman, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, had given fitting expression to the grief shared by the College with the whole people, and its loyalty to King Edward VII. And the Report proceeded:—

A reign which has witnessed such advancement of the cause of civil and religious liberty as that of the late Queen will be for ever memorable in the minds of the Trustees of Manchester College, the home of religious freedom. The passing of that great measure of public justice, the Dissenters' Chapels Act; the admission of Jews and Atheists to Parliament by relaxation of the oath; the Abolition of Church Rates; the Disestablishment of the Irish Church; and the opening of the ancient Universities, paving the way for the removal of Manchester New College to Oxford, with opportunities for the education of its undergraduates at Oxford Colleges, are only some of the events which make the Queen's reign an era never to be forgotten in the annals of religious progress and of the removal of religious disabilities. Her late revered Majesty was the fitting representative of the great movement of her time towards larger religious liberty and equality, and this College cannot bid farewell to her august and noble personality without paying affectionate homage to her memory, and without a prayer that her spirit may live on in the son, to whom its willing loyalty is transferred.

Turning to the work of the College the Report gave a record of the unusual number of students, of whom two, who completed their course last June, had entered the ministry, Mr. E. Gwyllym Evans, B.A., at Elder-yard Chapel, Chesterfield, and Mr. A. R. Andreae, B.A., with the Rev. H. E. Dowson at Gee Cross. The new session opened with nineteen students in the College, of whom fourteen were taking the full three years' course, while there were nine external exhibitioners preparing for graduation prior to the theological course. Among the regular students for the ministry is Miss G. von Petzold, M.A., who has graduated at Edinburgh with classical honours in the second class.

The Indian student at present at the College is Mr. V. R. Shinde, B.A., of Poona, and a Japanese student has also been for the first time welcomed, in the person of Mr. Zennosuki Toyosaki. These two gentlemen are on the foundation of the B. and F.U.A., the College making a further necessary grant to the Japanese student, to whom the following reference occurs in the Report:—

The Committee are sure that the Trustees will welcome the new link with the great world of kindred thought and life that has thus been forged by opening the College doors to a student from Japan—that Oriental home of advancing intelligence so ready to receive influence from the West, and so able to return the gift. This last year lovers of "truth, liberty and religion," have been encouraged by the International Council of liberal religious thinkers, that has placed the College—which gave to some of the most distinguished of them a welcome within its walls—consciously in the midst of a growing influence proceeding from kindred souls throughout the globe; and it is a great gain to the College, as well as to its students from lands far away, that their thought and life should enter its class-rooms and common room, alike giving and taking. It has been matter for regret that a break has occurred in the happy connection with Transylvania in this matter, but the Committee have been glad to hear that it is likely to be renewed without delay.

Special interest attaches to the Common Residence of the students, as to which the Report gave the following account:—

Mr. Addis reported, in June, 1901, as follows, on the Residence, now recognised by the Hebdomadal Council as a private Hall, under him as Master:—

"The history of the Residence during the past year has been quite uneventful, and, of course, all the more satisfactory on that account. No single case has come to my notice in which any rule has been broken, and it has been very pleasant to see the many and evident signs of that kind and friendly feeling which has bound the members of our little society together. The work during the Session has been, I think, much more vigorous, and students have used the opportunities which the Residence gives for common study and common recreation. Great good has been done by the opening of the tennis ground. A genuine patriotism exists among us. We have a place, however humble, in the University. Because of this, and even more because many of our men are Oxford graduates, the rest have come into real touch with the University, and learned something of the social life which prevails in the Colleges. One thing is now absolutely certain, that the Residence, instead of isolating the men, has delivered them from an isolation inseparable from the former state of things."

The Committee received this report from the Master of the newly-recognised private Hall with eminent satisfaction. It is further evidence of the wisdom of the course adopted by the Trustees in establishing the Residence, and it confirms the hopes entertained that it was a step in the direction of that closer touch with the University, and its intellectual and social life, which was one of its foremost aims. The Committee again convey to Mr. Addis their deep sense of obligation to him for his own part in results that have proved so satisfactory, and especially for the personal interest he has taken in the students, not only collectively, but individually, by tutorial counsel and assistance in their studies.

As to the acceptance by the Master of Balliol of the office of Visitor to the College, and the work done in connection with the summer meeting of University Extension students, and other matters, further references will be found in our leading article.

Mr. William Colfox was re-elected President; Messrs. D. Ainsworth, J. Arlosh, and H. Rawson, Vice-Presidents; Mr. C. W. Jones, Treasurer; Rev. H. E. Dowson and Mr. A. H. Worthington, Secretaries; Messrs. A. E. Steinthal and J. W. Scott, Auditors. The Committee was also re-elected.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman brought the proceedings to a close.

FIELD-MARSHAL SIR NEVILLE CHAMBERLAIN has made a generous gift of £1,000 to the funds of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; he has also given £1,000 towards the support of the ministry at Southampton, and, in addition, he has contributed £250 towards the organ fund.

DON'T say you can't help it. If you think you can't, the chances are that you can't. If you think you can, and act in accordance with this thought, then not only are the chances that you can, but if you act fully in accordance with it, that you can and that you will is an absolute certainty. It was Virgil who, in describing the crew which, in his mind, would win the race, said of them: "They can because they think they can." In other words, this very attitude of mind on their part will infuse a spiritual power into their bodies that will give them the strength and endurance which will enable them to win. Then take the thought that you can; take it merely as a seed thought, if need be, plant it in your consciousness, tend it, cultivate it, and it will gradually reach out and gather strength from all quarters. It will focus and make positive and active the spiritual force within you that is now scattered and of little avail. It will draw to itself force from without. It will draw to your aid the influence of other minds of its own nature, minds that are fearless, strong, courageous. If earnest and faithful, the time will soon come when all fear will lose its hold, and instead of being an embodiment of weakness and a creature of circumstances, you will find yourself a tower of strength and a master of circumstances.—R. W. Trine.

THE easy way is not the way. God demands deliberately, and for our good demands that which costs,—is satisfied only with that. And we ought not for a moment to think of giving anything else, but to press on in the difficult way, reaching for and attaining one virtue after another.—J. F. W. Ware.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

OUR WORK IN SCOTLAND.

THE problem of organisation and corporate vitality presses freshly upon our seven Scottish churches. They seek to realise a practical unity and have the power belonging to members of a thoroughly vital body. But how to accomplish the unification and intercommunion is the standing difficulty. The distance from the most southern church (Kilmarnock) to the most northern (Aberdeen) is more than 170 miles—a five hours railway journey. The other churches are situated from 20 to 60 miles apart. The expense of travel, the time occupied in it, and the want of leisure form almost insuperable hindrances to conference and centralised action.

The meetings of our associations are therefore attended by but a few delegates, along with the local brethren. The majority of our members have neither the money nor the time necessary for the journeys to joint meetings. The most central point of meeting—Dundee—implies a prohibitive outlay of time and money. Our ministers rarely see each other; pulpit exchanges are expensive, and they have to work on year by year in isolation.

It seems that the essential work needful at present is the consolidation of the various existent congregations. To establish them as strongly as possible; to make their working plant effective; to develop and utilise all their potencies, and make each a glowing centre of radiative light and heat is the immediate duty pressing on us. The work is one of tremendous difficulty. It is almost impossible to raise the feeling of comradeship in such isolation as we experience; indeed, the correction and enthusiasm of collective activity are awanting. The separation itself is a perpetual hindrance to denominational zeal.

Each of our churches exists amidst hostilities more or less objectively manifested. The name "Unitarian" still evokes hatred, and has to reckon with prejudices almost impenetrable. We are constantly made aware of crass misconception of our position and principles, and are given to understand that we are here on a sufferance which does not scruple to use means of extermination. Along with this opposition there is the competition of liberalism and æstheticism keenly exercised by all the orthodox bodies. In almost every city there is at least one preacher of advanced views whose utterances seem to satisfy the demand for the new thought. He draws, and is the pulpit lion. And the liberalism which is leavening the orthodox denominational literature is also a powerful element of competition with which Unitarian preachers and churches have to reckon.

There is also a remarkable revival of architectural and æsthetic taste in connection with church buildings. Enormous sums are being spent on new churches (over £50,000 in Aberdeen during the last five years), and the denominations vie with each other in raising structures beautiful without and within. There is a very significant multiplication of church organs proceeding by means of the Carnegie grants. Scotland does not stand where it did in this respect. Magnificent churches, elaborate music, and a highly-coloured formalism are the orders of the day. It seems as if a liturgy, and all the pomp and circumstance of a gorgeous sacerdotalism were coming upon us.

All the while the ecclesiastical situation is being simplified. The sects are being reduced to their lowest denominator. The Presbyterians are now but two: the old-time secessions have ceased to be, and unity is the watchword. Disestablishment is at present out of the question. The absorption of the United Free Church by the Established Church is simply a matter of time.

Doctrinally there is no division in the various Churches in Scotland. Presbyterians, Episcopalians and Congregationalists are virtually one in their promotion of an evangelism, which is neither Calvinistic nor Arminian, but a blend of both with a touch of modernity. All the orthodox churches share the perplexities of Biblical Criticism, and await further results. The Established Church has realised that the alteration of "The Confession of Faith" is a matter for Parliament; but whether it will ask for a relaxation of subscription remains to be seen. Judging by the critical literature emanating from Free Church manses, it seems that there is much exercise of mind on New Testament questions. Liberty of prophesying is not yet fully granted, for a sharp call for prosecution has been raised against Professor G. A. Smith for alleged heresies. But there is not likely to be any acute dogmatic crisis, or extensive doctrinal shedding. The main body of all the churches is on the advance. Even the objectors to the teaching of Professor Smith distinguish between Paul and the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews!

The extent and character of the cleavage in Scottish theology may be gauged by examining recently published books by two eminent Scotchmen — the Rev. Roberston Nicoll and Professor Fairbairn. In "The Church's One Foundation," Nicoll writes mainly in the interest of the Calvinistic conception of God as Judge and Christ as Victim, while in his various works Fairbairn asserts the Fatherhood of God as the real Christian basis of theology. Fairbairn's development as a theologian may be taken as typical of the Scottish evolution generally. He is the most remarkable as he is the most able of Scottish theologians.

The most live tendencies of the Scottish preacher are illustrated in Dr. John Watson's (Ian Maclaren) published sermons. The kind of sermon set before Scotchmen phenomenally twenty years ago in "ScotchSermons" is quite common now. In spite of the standards, it is characteristic of the new man in the Scottish pulpit. But, although Scotland is thus moving on, it is not likely that the new thought will ever call itself by any dogmatic name. It is remarkable that none of the native Churches of Scotland has had a dogmatic title. They have been indicated governmentally, but not doctrinally; or they have taken the name of their founder. This avoidance of a dogmatic title is a strange thing in a country so intensely dogmatic as Scotland. No Scottish sect has labelled itself Calvinistic. The main Church battles have been over forms of government. No great disruption took place over doctrine. There have been purgings of heresy, but withal the heresies were quietly absorbed. This accounts for the prevailing ecclesiastical dislike of the term "Unitarian." The divines who have come up to the Unitarian position so far decline to take the name, and deprecate sectarian labelling. The present temper of the orthodox mind is against dogmatic nomenclature and sectarian baptism in the name of dogma. The development will go on internally till the whole theologic fabric is renewed, and the newness will be silently accepted as a benefit.

But we have to note that the evolution will take place apart from our movement. Neither in this age nor that which is to come shall we be forgiven and absorbed. But there are isolated and sympathetic elements which we might meanwhile make up to. There is a survival of the Universalist movement in Glasgow and in Larbert which we might attach, or at least have working relations with. And there is the Gilfillan Memorial Church in Dundee, which is really an open church doctrinally, and has as its present minister a man as broadminded as he is leal-hearted. There is also a left wing of the Congregational Union holding ideals identical with ours. How far it is possible to get these various elements into a consciousness of affinity and organic connection, I know not; but we should anticipate their union. Could not we have a National Council of these? Perhaps all that can be done at present lies with personal action. But all these have to be reckoned in estimating the actual amount of free liberal thought in Scotland.

This survey brings me back to the point of local upbuilding. In Aberdeen we have set ourselves for total renewal. By the generous help of the McQuaker Trustees we have secured a site for new buildings at the very heart of the city. It is perfect in its centrality, and stands open to several busy thoroughfares. Plans of a striking Gothic structure are being prepared, and we expect to begin building in May next. We have not yet issued our public appeal, but in response to a private solicitation several friends have given generous donations: Sir J. T. Brunner £100, and Mr. F. Nettlefold £100. Our local effort is gathering into shape, and we have already received encouraging help. We are full of hope in our undertaking.

The taking up of ministerial work at Kilmarnock by Mr. A. Innes, of Glasgow, fills one vacant pulpit, and it is to be hoped that Kirkcaldy will soon find a successor to Mr. Parry, and make the ranks of our ministry complete.

The visit to Scotland of the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, M.A., as lecturer on "The Gospels" was stimulating. Not many, apart from the clergy, are interested in or prepared for critical literary questions such as he dealt with. Indeed, the offer of such matter to the public has not been undertaken by any Scottish religious body. In his day, and while under the ban of heresy, Professor Robertson Smith delivered lectures in the chief cities on Old Testament questions, but since then there has been no great public excitement over Biblical subjects. It was well that the McQuaker Trustees broke ground through Mr. Carpenter, and introduced to public notice the questions prophetically demanding solution. Those who heard Mr. Carpenter admired his thoroughness, courage and lucidity. Thus we press on to the mark of the high calling of God!

ALEX. WEBSTER.

Aberdeen, Jan. 13.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Acton.—A series of special Sunday evening services will be held in the Central Auction Room, Market-place, Horne-lane, commencing on Sunday next, the 26th inst., at seven o'clock, when the Rev. W. C. Bowie will deliver an address on "The Message of Unitarianism." These services, organised by the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties, are a continuation of those lately held at Harlesden. It is hoped that all Liberal Religious thinkers residing in the neighbourhood will, by their presence and sympathy, co-operate in the Forward Movement. Acton can be easily reached by electric tram from Shepherd's Bush and Ealing. Those who can assist in the musical part of the service are earnestly invited to ender help.

Bolton.—Mr. Franklin Thomasson, J.P., gave a lecture last week in the Bank-street schools on "Government and its Application to Temperance." In the absence of the Rev. C. J. Street, the chair was taken by Mr. G. G. Armstrong. At the opening of his lecture Mr. Thomasson spoke of experiments carried out by the medical faculty in France, Russia, Germany, and America with a view of discovering the value or otherwise of alcohol as a food or as a poison. The result of these experiments showed that no absolute rule could be laid down in respect to alcohol as it concerned human life, and proved the old saying that what was one man's meat was another man's poison. After referring to the responsibility of the individual in his actions in the matter of drink in relation to unborn generations, he pointed out that the restriction of the number of licenses had created a valuable monopoly. There was a desire in many quarters to reduce the number of licenses, and this was one of the most pressing matters at the present time. The question arose as to how they were going to do this without doing injustice to the individual or to the public; but the real injustice in the matter was done to the public in giving into private hands the monopoly value of licenses. Dealing with the Children's Bill, he said that instead of regarding this as an interference with the right of the parent, he looked upon it as the assertion of the children's right to protection, and he believed that if they could get hold of the children before they became drunkards they might stamp out the evil, but they would never do it afterwards. As to how the question of the excessive indulgence in intoxicants should be dealt with, it seemed to him they ought to ascertain what it was that caused people to indulge to excess. They must develop the individual character and teach the inadvisability of indulgence, for the greatness of a nation depended in the ultimate degree upon the strength of character and self-reliance of the individuals who composed it. They must look further ahead and get at the root of the cause of drunkenness. If that cause was to be found in the conditions under which the people were housed or the extremely low wages which they received, let them devote their attention to endeavouring to increase by natural methods the wages of the poor and the quality of the dwellings they had to inhabit. If they got at the causes of intemperance they would create a far safer basis for eradicating it than if they compelled people against their reason or instinct to be temperate whether they liked it or not. On the motion of the Rev. E. S. Hicks, seconded by Councillor J. W. Scott, a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the lecturer.

Crewe.—The third of a series of monthly musical services was held in the Free Christian Church on Sunday evening, the 19th inst. The Rev. R. S. Redfern gave an excellent address on "Sectarianism and Christianity." Special hymns were sung, and the service, which included also violin and vocal solos, and an anthem by the choir, was fairly well attended.

Dean-row.—A very interesting lecture was given in the schoolroom at Dean-row, by the Rev. P. M. Higginson, M.A., on his recent travels to "Palmyra and Baalbac." The lecture was illustrated by photographs, mostly taken by Mr. Higginson himself. The lantern was most kindly lent and manipulated by its owner, Mr. Baithe. There was an unusually large attendance.

Halstead.—The annual tea and meeting of the congregation took place on Friday evening, the 17th inst. The attendance was exceedingly good. The report of the secretary and treasurer, Mr. J. Taylor, showed progress during the year. The subscribing members now number about eighteen. The financial statement showed a balance in hand of £4 8s. 11½d. The attendance at the services raises from thirty to sixty adults, besides children. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards presided over the meeting, and gave an address on "The Progress of Unitarianism, and the duties of Unitarians in Relation to their various Organisations." Several of the local friends made short speeches. Special thanks were given to the Provincial Assembly for providing preachers, whose services were "valued highly;" also to Mrs. Kemp, who conducts a fortnightly service; and to the orchestral band for their invaluable musical help. The meeting, which was a very successful one, concluded with the singing of "Auld Lang Syne."

Liverpool.—On Hospital Sunday the Ullet-road congregation again headed the list with their collection of £716, while the little Ancient Chapel of Toxteth was fifth, with £108. This (Saturday) evening Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., and Mr. Henry Tait are to present the new Church Hall, their beautiful gift, to the congregation of Ullet-road Church.

London: Stratford.—The Sunday-school annual tea was held on Friday, Jan. 3, 103 children being present. A cantata, entitled Robin's Remedy, was given by the Young People's Guild, which was witnessed by over 200 parents, scholars, and friends. Prizes for regular attendance were distributed by Santa Claus, one of the characters of the cantata. In connection with the Temperance Guild and Band of Hope, Mr. W. J. Noel gave a lantern lecture on "Temperance and Health," on Sunday evening, Jan. 19, to the Working Men's Teetotal Society, which was repeated to the Band of Hope on Monday evening. About fifty were present at each lecture. The slides were kindly lent by the National Unitarian Temperance Association.

Merthyr Tydfil.—The Rev. James Harwood, B.A., delivered a lecture in the chapel on Tuesday, Jan. 21, on his visit to India, the chair being occupied by the Rev. D. J. Williams. The lecturer gave a vivid description of the manners, customs, and conditions of life under which our Indian fellow-subjects live. It was a sad picture which he drew of the terrible poverty which weighs so heavily on a vast multitude of people—a poverty which makes them despair of their future. It is to be hoped that one result of Mr. Harwood's lecture will be that those who had the privilege of listening to him will take a more intelligent interest in the affairs of that great country. The lecture was illustrated by lantern slides, which greatly added to the interest. A hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Harwood, proposed by the Chairman, seconded by Mr. Gomer Thomas, brought the proceedings to a close. There was a good attendance.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The quarterly meeting of the Union was held at Boston Mills Schools, Hyde, on Saturday last. The Committee met prior to tea to transact business, and about ninety persons were present at tea. The President (Mr. E. B. Broadrick) occupied the chair, supported by the Revs. H. E. Dowson and N. Green, and Mr. A. Slater. Mr. Broadrick is the son of the first President of the Union. Mr. A. Slater read a paper on "The Work of, and for, our Union," and a good discussion followed, taken part in by the Revs. W. Harrison, N. Green, A. R. Andreae, and A. C. Fox; and Messrs. F. Ashton, J. Rowcroft, S. Ashworth, and G. Caton. Mr. Slater replied to the discussion, and the usual votes of thanks were responded to by the President and Mr. Rowcroft.

Norwich.—The services were conducted at the Octagon Chapel on Sunday, Jan. 12, by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A. In the morning a very impressive devotional service was held, the subject of the sermon being "The Church on Earth and in Heaven." In the evening Mr. Carpenter delivered a scholarly and lucid address on "Three Recent Lives of Jesus," and was followed with the closest attention by the 400 people who formed the congregation. The three lives dealt with were those written by Dr. Thompson in Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible," Dr. Sanday in "Hastings' Dictionary," and Dr. Bruce in the "Encyclopædia Biblica," and the change of opinion which has taken place during the past few years concerning the personality of Jesus was strikingly set forth. On the following Monday a meeting of the Eastern Union was held in the chapel, under the chairmanship of Mr. James Mottram, to consider the objects and methods of the National Conference Superannuation Fund. Delegates were present from Ipswich, Framlingham, Braintree, and Yarmouth. Mr. Carpenter having explained the purpose of the fund, and questions having been asked, the following resolution was unanimously carried, on the proposition of Mr. Alfred Mottram, of Norwich, seconded by Mr. Scopes, of Ipswich:—"That this meeting having heard the explanation of the Rev. J. E. Carpenter concerning the objects and methods of the Ministers' Superannuation Fund, believes that its establishment will prove of the utmost benefit to both ministers and churches, and heartily commend to the congregations of the Eastern Union of Unitarian and other Free Christian Churches, the scheme adopted by the National Conference at Leicester in April, 1900." The Chairman, in conclusion, thanked Mr. Carpenter, on behalf of the congregation, for his visit to Norwich, and especially for the helpful and inspiring services of the previous day.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The quarterly meetings were held at Highland-place, Aberdare, on Monday, Jan. 20, the President, Mr. H. Woolcott Thompson in the chair. The General Committee met at 3 P.M. for the transaction of business. Delegates were present from Aberdare, Cardiff, Merthyr Tydfil, Nottage, Pontypridd, Pentre, and Clydach Vale. In addition to the officers and other ministers, the Rev. James Harwood was present representing the B. and F.U.A. For some time past the Committee, in conjunction with the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Trustees of the Newcastle Trust, have been engaged in seeking to re-establish the congregation at Bridgend. Arrangements have been made for a series of week-night evening services, to be held in Bridgend Chapel, on Wednesday nights, to continue until April next, when, if the effort prove successful, it is to be hoped a permanent ministry will be arranged for. The Rev. James Harwood, who has been visiting the district, will conduct the first service on Jan. 22. The local ministers have promised their support to the movement by consenting to conduct the services in turn. At five o'clock tea was provided in the schoolroom, when a large company partook of the hospitality of the local congregation. In the evening, at seven o'clock, a public meeting was held, preceded by a devotional service, conducted by the Rev. David Rees. Mr. H. Woolcott Thompson occupied the chair, and the meeting was addressed by the Revs. J. T. Davies, W. J. Phillips, and James Harwood. There was a good attendance, and the speeches were listened to with great appreciation. The church at Aberdare presents a bright and pleasing appearance after undergoing thorough renovation.

Swansea.—The annual meeting of the Unitarian Church was held on Monday evening, under the presidency of Mr. James Holmes. Reports were presented by the secretary (Mr. C. H. Perkins), the treasurer (Mrs. Reid), the superintendent of the Sunday-school and the secretaries of the Postal Mission, all showing good work done. Much satisfaction was expressed at the progress of the congregation, and of the religious views and principles, of which for so many years Unitarians had been the chief advocates. In the congregation were a number of thoughtful young people who had come in from other quarters. The reports having been adopted, the Rev. W. Tudor Jones acknowledged the great kindness and co-operation extended by the members to his wife and himself, which made their work very happy. He looked forward with great hopefulness to the future.

West Bromwich.—On Wednesday week a Christmas-tree was given to the past and present members of the Guild of St. Francis, by the Rev. F. A. Homer. About sixty members sat down to tea, in the course of which Mr. Homer acknowledged the noble work done by Miss E. Greenway in connection with their Guild. After tea the Christmas-tree and gifts were enjoyed in the large schoolroom, and games followed. In an interval Mr. J. J. Bowater proposed a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Homer, and spoke very highly of his work in connection with Lodge-road Church. Mr. Homer was shortly leaving them, and going to a distant part of the Empire seeking to re-establish his health, which had been far from robust. They were grateful for the work he had done, and their warmest wishes would go with him. Mr. Homer acknowledged the vote, and said how great a happiness his work had been to him, and especially among the children.

CAPE TOWN.—The Rev. D. Amos sailed for home on Dec. 18, after fulfilling a four months' engagement during Mr. Balmforth's visit to England. While at Cape Town Mr. Amos made many friends, and the committee and congregation of the Cape Town Church expressed their indebtedness to him for his services during Mr. Balmforth's absence. A pleasing feature of Mr. Amos's visit was the way in which he won the hearts of the Sunday-school children, who, a few days before his departure, presented to him an album of South African views bound in red morocco. The presentation was made by one of the Sunday-school teachers, Mr. Hirschberg, who expressed the thanks of the children to Mr. Amos for his unfailing geniality and kindness, and wished him God-speed on his voyage home. On Sunday, Dec. 22, Mr. Balmforth resumed his ministry, and after the evening service a meeting of the congregation was held, at which a hearty vote of welcome was passed. Mr. Balmforth, in responding, read a letter from the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, conveying the following resolution passed by the London Unitarian ministers' meeting:—"That the members of the London Society of Unitarian Ministers, after hearing the Rev. R. Balmforth's account of his experiences in South Africa, express their interest and sympathy, and desire to convey to their fellow-believers of the Cape Town Free Protestant Church their kind and brotherly greetings, and earnestly hope that the dread shadow which now is over both countries may soon pass away."

DR. WILLIAM SMYTH MEMORIAL FUND.—The Rev. C. J. Street acknowledges with thanks receipt of a further sum of £3 8s. from Warrington friends, per Rev. E. W. Lummis. This makes a total of £99 6s. 6d. forwarded to the Fund, which has now nearly reached £6,000, an adequate provision for the family.

THE Rev. R. and Mrs. DAVIS, wishing COMPANIONSHIP for their only child, a little girl of three and a-half years, would like to take charge, complete or otherwise, of a child of similar age, girl preferred.—For terms, &c., apply to Mrs. RUDOLF DAVIS, Hopefield, Evesham.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AKUREYRI RELIEF FUND.—The following donations have been received towards a Fund to be administered by the Rev. M. Jochumsson, in relief of the sufferers from the disastrous fire at Akureyri on Dec. 19:—W. Colfox, £5 5s.; Edward Chitty, £3 3s.; H. J. Morton, £2 2s.; G. W. Chitty, £2 2s.; the Misses White, £2 2s.; Miss Preston, £2 2s.; E. Clephan, £2 2s.; Miss M. A. Booth, £2; Mrs. and Miss Barnby, £1 10s.; "A Friend," £1 10s.; Rev. R. A. Armstrong, £1 1s.; J. H. Brooks, £1 1s.; Rev. J. E. Carpenter, £1 1s.; Mrs. Greenhow, £1 1s.; John Sale, £1 1s.; T. Chilton, £1 1s.; Hahnemann Epps, £1 1s.; R. W. Wright, £1 1s.; Miss F. Meyer, £1 1s.; the Misses Greg, £1; Alfred Holt, £1; Mrs. Currer Briggs, £1; Rev. C. A. Greaves, 10s.; Mrs. Temple, 10s.; Rev. W. Agar, 10s.; E. H. Skirrow, 10s.; Miss Swaine, 10s; Miss. L. Toulmin Smith, 5s.; Mrs. Brindley, 5s.; Mrs. Boyle, 5s.; S. J. T., 5s.; J. H., 5s.; M. P., 5s.; and Miss S. J. Gregg, 2s. 6d.; total, £40 9s. 6d. When we wrote our note of last week on this subject we were not aware that there is no telegraphic communication with Iceland, and had hoped to send Mr. Jochumsson a message at once that substantial help was on the way. We now learn with great regret that the next mail does not leave until March 4 (the last having been on Jan. 17), so that we cannot send our help until then. Mr. Jochumsson, in the letter which we published on Jan. 18, stated the amount of loss from the fire to be 100,000 crowns, which we take to be about £5,000; and while we may hope that in the first dismay of the catastrophe the actual amount of loss was exaggerated, yet there can be no doubt, as Mr. Armstrong said in his letter of last week, that the need must be very sore, and it would be a great satisfaction if we were able next month to send at least a clear £100 to our friends in that solitary little town in the far North.

MR. JOCHUMSSON was in this country in the spring of 1876, the year in which the late Professor Tiele attended our anniversary meetings in Whit-week. Jochumsson had to return home before the meetings, but it was mentioned in the report of the B. and F.U.A. that he was still maintaining the cause of Liberal Christianity at Akureyri, and through all these years he has been bearing the same faithful witness.

A REGISTERED letter addressed to THE INQUIRER Office and delivered by the first post on Tuesday morning has unfortunately been lost unopened. Inquiries are being made, and we shall be greatly obliged if the sender of the letter will communicate at once with our office.

THE rumours of impending peace negotiations, based on Mr. Balfour's admission in Parliament that a communication had been received from the Dutch Government, are as yet too vague to give much ground for hope. An unusual spectacle was witnessed in the House of Lords on Monday, when the Bishop of Hereford made an earnest plea for conciliation, and protested against the "spectacular" political executions in Cape Colony. We trust that all who have seen the letter of Dr. Pern, of the Bloemfontein Camp, with reference to the death of the little girl Lizzie Van Zyl (referred to also in Dr. Conan Doyle's widely circulated book on the war), will also read Miss Hobhouse's reply, and her plea that the controversy over the concentration camps should be lifted to a higher plane.

CANON HENSLEY HENSON gave an address on Monday in Wesley's Chapel to the London Wesleyan Ministers' Meeting on "Reunion through Intercommunion." Several other clergymen of the Church of England were present. Reunion, Canon Henson said, must come about by one of two methods, by conquest or by conciliation. Conquest had failed, and it must be by conciliation. He thought that the Anglican Church by its historic position was fitted to make overtures. While they might recognise a unity of spirit, he longed for some outward token of union, and the first and most natural seemed to him a common participation in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. They were all weary of religious conflicts, and were turning away with disgust from the dreary wrangling of fanatics. He held that the time was ripe for action. Many Anglicans were broken-hearted at the scandals implied in these unhappy divisions, and he for one was determined in his sphere to try and cultivate that spirit of intercommunion which is the common mark of true discipleship. The Rev. F. W. Macdonald expressed the sympathy of the meeting with the spirit of Canon Henson's address, but pointed to the stumbling-block of the theory of Apostolic succession held by so many Churchmen. He moved a vote of thanks, which was seconded by Professor Agar Beet, and very cordially passed.

THE United Free Church of Scotland has lost a distinguished teacher by the death, last Sunday, of Professor A. B. Davidson, D.D., of Edinburgh, one of the Old Testament revisers, and since 1863 Professor of Hebrew in the Edinburgh Free Church College. Born in 1831, Davidson was a favourite pupil of Professor Blackie's at Aberdeen, and quickly made his mark as a Hebrew scholar. His first book on Job was published in 1862. He was the author of commentaries on other Old Testament books, and of a widely used Hebrew grammar. As a teacher he was greatly beloved.

IN the concluding lecture of the autumn course at University College, Mr. Stopford Brooke said that he must leave the consideration of Rossetti as a translator, and the volume of sonnets, "The House of Life," for the first lecture after Christmas, when he would speak also of Christina Rossetti; but the New Year has brought other counsels, and in beginning the new course on Thursday week Mr. Brooke at once took up William Morris, to whom the first three lectures of the course are to be devoted; Morris and Burne-Jones, he said, in their early manhood took refuge from an ugly and unsatisfying world in the thirteenth century and the Greek stories of antiquity, and thus did what Keats had done before them. They had a great hunger for beauty, and turned from a disenchanted world to the enchanted past. Keats was the favourite poet of Morris, and they were kindred spirits; but Morris's was the stronger nature of the two, healthier in body and in soul. In after life the call of the present drew Morris out of his beloved past, for the stress of social questions seized upon him. If Keats had lived to 1832 it would have humanised his poetry also.

MORRIS wrote pure romantic poetry, with a touch of mysticism, and a passionate love of natural beauty. No tongue could tell how he loved the earth. She was his delight, his refuge, his joy, his home; no one has praised her better. His imaginative work was a thousand miles away from the sordid psychology of modern literature. The ideal temper of his soul was at the heart of all his work, in spite of his outward roughness. He was one of the most productive and creative of men, and he had joy in creation. The roots of his being were full of sap. It was the same in all his later work, as in his poetry; from a lyric to an initial letter, he always delighted in making beautiful things, and his work was always fresh. He was not one of those who create a few beautiful things and then go on repeating themselves. His ideal was that all workmen should be free to have their own work and their own delight in it. The Right Hon. James Bryce, who took the chair, in introducing Mr. Brooke, expressed his pleasure in the establishment of that lectureship, and said that he thought every possible stimulus and guidance should be given to those who desired to study literature, and especially to study poetry, which was the highest and finest expression of the intellectual and moral life of the people. The world was passing through a highly unimaginative and unidealistic period, and, therefore, there was all the more necessity for the cultivation of good literature.

A TOWN'S Meeting was held in Liverpool, on Monday, to consider the proposal for the establishment of a Liverpool University. A resolution, moved by Lord Derby, affirming that in the interests of higher education, and to carry out more effectually the objects of University College, a University should be established in the City, was unanimously adopted. The Lord Mayor, who presided, warmly supported the project, and was glad that the City Council had asked for powers to aid in carrying it out. The Bishop of Liverpool, who seconded the chief resolution, said that in his being asked to do so he felt that honour was done to the Church.

He repeated what he had often said before—that there was no division between true faith and true knowledge, that true faith prevented true knowledge from becoming sordid and material and proud-hearted, and that true knowledge prevented true faith from becoming superstitious and prejudicial. Two of the chief enemies which religion had to fear were ignorance and prejudice, and nothing was more likely to scotch, if not to kill, them both than such a University as they were proposing to establish. For himself, as a theologian, he was sorry that the queen of sciences, through the constitution of their University, could find no place within its walls, yet he knew that in the future, as in the past, the spirit of true religion would be found there—the spirit of reverence and humility and fearless love of truth, and the care for the higher human interests which had characterised the past history of University College and which had found expression in the remarkable Tropical School of Medicine of which they were all so justly proud. Standing as Liverpool did as a gate between the East and West, he believed they would find an increasing number of foreign students of all colours coming over here to study in their University, and Liverpool would add to its commodities that of learning.

Towards the Fund needed for the establishment of the University £80,000 is already subscribed, and it is estimated that the value of the property of University College, including land, buildings, and endowments is not less than half a million.

ON the invitation of the Manchester "Citizens' Committee for the Improvement of the Unwholesome Dwellings and Surroundings of the People," Mr. B. Seebohm Rowntree gave an address on Monday afternoon in the Mayor's parlour at the Town Hall, describing the method and results of the two years inquiry he had made at York, embodied in his book "Poverty: A Study of Town Life," recently noticed in these columns. In the course of his address Mr. Rowntree having referred to the precarious nature of the lives of the poor, as shown by the fact that one-fifth of the poverty was due to the death, illness, or old age of the chief wage-earner, said that more than half the poverty existed in cases where the wage-earner was in regular work, but his wages were too low to supply the necessities of mere physical efficiency. No unskilled labourer in York, with a moderate family, could indulge in any luxury (even a tramfare or the buying of a halfpenny paper) without limiting his diet below the amount required for the barest physical efficiency. Among the causes of preventable poverty were drink, gambling, and ignorant or careless housekeeping. These things were often, however, the direct outcome of the insanitary and joyless surroundings of the people. The overcrowding which was one of the effects of poverty was not merely the habit of the poor; it was their necessity. In conclusion Mr. Rowntree said:—

There is surely need for a greater concentration of thought by the nation upon the well-being of its people, for no civilisation can be sound or stable which has at its base this mass of stunted human life. However difficult the path of social progress may be, a way of advance will open out before patient and penetrating thought, inspired by a true human sympathy. The dark shadow of the Malthusian philosophy has passed away, and no view of the ultimate scheme of things would now be accepted under which multitudes of men and women are doomed by inevitable law to a struggle for existence so severe as necessarily to cripple or destroy the higher parts of their nature.

The Lord Mayor presided, and there was a large attendance of those interested in the social work of the city. Among those who took part in the proceedings were Mr. T. C. Horsfall, Professor Weiss and the Rev. Priestley Prime.

THE Indian Messenger in its New Year's number has the following note:—

We have been for the last few weeks publishing the news of the wide-spread sorrow evoked by the death of the late Rev. S. Fletcher Williams. The question has often naturally presented itself to our mind, what was the secret of his hold on the affection of the people? and we would request the attention of all engaged in mission work to this curious phenomenon. Mr. Williams lived in India only a little over two years and a-half, had no organisation of his own, started no philanthropic work, and was associated with a community which had no influential and interested connection. True, indeed, that he was a man of deep culture. But how many Christian missionaries of culture and scholarship have lived and died and have not been missed at their death. Whereas Mr. Williams after an unorganised ministry of two years and a-half is being mourned in the most distant parts of this vast country. The secret of it is that he not only lived in this country but felt with and for its people. His interest in the people was not merely that of proselytising, but his was a living, loving, throbbing sympathy with the joys and sorrows of the people, with their hopes and aspirations. He never stooped to tickle their vanity. He never hesitated to speak the unpleasant truth; but even when he chid them they knew that he was a sincere friend. He was full of the milk of human kindness; a broad, open-hearted, sympathetic, and respectful teacher. Such men alone can win affectionate confidence. And such men alone will make missions whether Christian or otherwise a success.

THE last of the present course of lectures on "Pioneers of Humanitarianism," arranged by the Humanitarian League, is to be given in the Council Room at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 4, at 8 o'clock. The subject is "Wagner," and the lecturer Mrs. Leighton Cleather. The chair is to be taken by Mr. J. Frederick Green.

POSTAL MISSION RELIGIOUS CONFERENCES.

SIR,—May I be allowed through your columns to remind the Postal Mission correspondents scattered over London, and other religious inquirers, of the Conferences held on the first Sunday of every month, at five o'clock, at College Chapel, Stepney Green, E.

The series of Conferences now going on are of unusual interest; they are being conducted by the Rev. George Critchley, B.A., late minister of Burnt Ash Congregational Church. Their purport will be best described in Mr. Critchley's own words:—

The three Conferences will be occupied with the consideration of the true meaning of the Mission of Jesus Christ, and what is needed to become genuine disciples.

Recent events in this country have shaken the faith of many in the practical and present day value of Christianity. This state of despair arises because of the confusion between the Christianity of Christ himself, and the strange transformations his ideas have undergone at the hands of his professed disciples. We need to come nearer the original to learn what true Christianity is, to note the difference between the Christ of the Gospels and the Christ of the Churches.

College Chapel is easily accessible by tram or omnibus from Aldgate or Whitechapel stations. Tea is provided for those from a distance who desire to remain to evening service, which is now conducted by the Rev. George Critchley.

DR. C. P. TIELE.

READERS of this journal have already learned of the loss which befell all students of the history of religion by the death three weeks ago of the honoured leader of their science. On Saturday, Jan. 11, the sad news ran through Leiden that Dr. Cornelis Petrus Tiele had suddenly passed away. Since the decease of Professor Max Müller, the great Dutch scholar had easily held the foremost place.

Leiden was the city of his birth, and when he came back to it in 1873 to preside over the Remonstrant Seminary, he returned to the scenes of his boyhood. Born in 1830, trained chiefly at Amsterdam, first of all in the Athenæum illustre, and then in the Remonstrant Seminary, the young Tiele early showed gifts of no common order. He vowed himself to the Preacher's office in the little communion to which he was bound by hereditary ties, and which he served untiringly to the last. The Remonstrant congregations were few in number—in the middle of the century there were but a score—but they had great traditions alike of scholarship and liberty. To both of these Tiele was equally faithful. Where Jean Le Clerc and J. J. Wetztein had taught, he learned in their spirit the methods of historical study which he was to carry forward into fields almost wholly unexplored; and the love of freedom which had driven their predecessors out of the State Church only made him the more fearless in inquiry and resolute in prosecuting it to the end. His pupils have noted the influence upon him of the head of the Seminary, Des Amorie van der Hoeven; and he himself has referred sympathetically ("Elements of the Science of Religion," ii. 248) to one who was evidently the friend of his early manhood, "the distinguished Dutch poet-theologian, Abraham des Amorie van der Hoeven, jun."

It was characteristic of his versatility, as well as of his wide interest in literature, that his first publication (in 1852) was a novel. In 1853 he had finished his student's course, though he had only just begun his studies, and settled as pastor at Moordrecht, in South Holland. Two early essays belong to this period—Specimen Theologicum continens annotatiam in locos nonnullos Evang. Joannei (1853), and an investigation of "The Gospel of John considered as a Source for the Life of Jesus" (1855). In 1856 the young preacher was called to the Remonstrant Church at Rotterdam, where M. Albert Réville,* his senior by a few years, was pastor of the French Church. The two men, animated by common aims, though with differing gifts, were soon united by close friendship. Sermons, contributions to the religious journals, and even (in 1863) a volume of poems, came rapidly from Tiele's pen. He was feeling his way, experimenting in various directions, and taking his full share in the religious life of his people.

But he had already found his life-work. An enterprising publisher at Haarlem, who deserves high honour, conceived the idea of issuing a series of treatises on the great religions of the world. In 1862 the religion of Zoroaster was assigned to Tiele: two years later the task was accomplished. The materials for the study were then by no means so abundant as at present. Burnouf had laid the foundations for the interpretation of the Avesta; Westergaard at Copenhagen, Haug in Poona, Spiegel in Erlangen, were pushing the investigation forward, when the young Dutch scholar claimed and secured attention. Once fairly started, he proceeded with an industry that never tired. New languages had no difficulty for him. He could read the hieroglyphics in an Egyptian temple, or the cuneiform tablets from the mounds of Mesopotamia. Between 1869 and 1872 he produced the successive parts of his "Comparative History of the Egyptian and Mesopotamian Religions," the latter group including Babylonia and Assyria, Phœnicia and Israel. The treatment of the Hebrews was only a sketch, compared to the famous "Religion of Israel," in which Kuenen (in the same series as Tiele's "Zarathustra") was working out the historical results of the new criticism of the Pentateuch developed by Graf. But the method and spirit of the two scholars were remarkably akin. Here were the same unflinching devotion to facts, the same caution and sobriety of judgment, the same clearness of exposition. After the obscurities and exaggerations of Ewald, the works of the Dutch writers seemed full of light.

A closer association was to bring the two friends side by side for nearly twenty years. The Remonstrant Seminary was removed from Amsterdam to Leiden in 1873, and Tiele left his church in Rotterdam to become its head. His distinction as an orator was such that in 1874, on the tercentenary of the relief of the city after the famous siege, he was selected to deliver the festival address in St. Peter's Church before the King. Three years later, in 1877, a chair for the history of religions was founded in the University, and Tiele was chosen as its first occupant. His "Outlines of the History of Religion" had appeared a year before; the little volume was quickly translated into English and several other foreign languages (even Russian), and his place as a scholar of the front rank was assured. For yet a quarter of a century he pursued his ordered way. His article on "Religions" in the "Encyclopædia Britannica" (1886) made him better known in this country, while the publication of his Babylonio-Assyrian history, which began in the same year and was throughout founded on direct study of the cuneiform texts, showed that the wide range of his general knowledge, and the philosophical character of his thought, coexisted with laborious devotion to a highly specialised study, and an infinite capacity for taking pains. A decade later came the Gifford lectures at Edinburgh on the "Elements of the Science of Religion" in 1896 and 1898. His last years were occupied with a new edition of his "History of Religion," limited, however, to Egypt and the countries of Western Asia. The concluding portion, completed only last year, involved an entire reconstruction of his early treatise on Zoroastrianism, and terminated with the fall of the Persian power before Alexander the Great.

At the age of seventy, laden with honours alike by courts and by learned societies—Edinburgh and Dublin had followed the example of Bologna and conferred on him their honorary doctorate—he resigned his chair at the University (which he had thrice served as Rector), in obedience to State regulations which could not be set aside. Of the three men whose names were in every one's mouth at the Paris Congress of the History of Religions in September, 1900—Max Müller, Tiele, and Professor E. B. Tylor—the first had passed away before Tiele received the homage of a multitude of European scholars on Dec. 16, 1900. Now he, too, departs, happy in the possession of unabated powers, still full of interest in the work of religion. When I visited him in the summer of 1887, there was but one student in the Seminary, whose place was at a desk in his Principal's study. A few years after, a considerable movement took place among the Remonstrants. New congregations rapidly began to form, and the number of students increased to match. In December, 1896, Tiele and his accomplished wife paid us a memorable visit at Oxford; he looked with a certain envy at the stately building of Manchester College; some day, perhaps he hoped, the Remonstrants might be strong enough to rear their own home of learning at Leiden.

With the English Unitarians Tiele had a strong sympathy. He, too, belonged to a small communion, detached from the State Church, which had played no inconsiderable part in the history and theology of his people. He, too, was nurtured on traditions of freedom, and in our midst he felt himself at home. When he attended the Whitsuntide anniversaries in London in 1876, he dwelt on the similarity in his position and ours. "Both bodies," he said, "had suffered persecution and had been excluded from all offices in the State, but they had manfully stood to their posts, and now enjoyed religious liberty, and were spreading their principles more and more throughout their different countries. There were but few Remonstrants in name, but there were a great many in reality. They had no church, but churches; no test, no subscription. It was an inspiring thought," he added, "to know that the same work which was being done in Holland was being so manfully carried out in England—the work of spreading the religion of the Kingdom of God, which belonged to no nation or sect, but embraced all mankind." He greatly regretted that his duties at Leiden last summer prevented him from being present at the meeting of the International Council in which he took the liveliest interest. His admirable command of English had been partly gained by a careful study of our best orators. At one time it was his duty to lecture on rhetoric, and he steeped himself in the speeches of Burke. He was familiar with our literature, could quote our poets, and even perpetrate a pun. About all his work there was a delicate finish which indicated alike the thoroughness of the scholar and the fastidious taste of the artist. These qualities to some extent limited his production; his last book (in two small volumes) cost nine years of toil. He made no popular appeal on behalf of his science; he was content to trust to the slower process of laboriously digging out the facts. But the readers of the second volume of his "Elements of Religion" will soon discover that behind the somewhat austere methods of his scholarship lay a rich inner life of faith. He loved his studies, but he knew that there was a higher region than science, where the spirit lives in communion with its everlasting source. To this the lofty close of his Gifford lectures bore impressive witness:—

The more we study religion, the further we penetrate into its history, the better we understand the nature of its doctrines, so much the more clearly we shall see that it is entitled to precedence in our spiritual life, because the religious need is the mightiest, profoundest, and most overmastering of all. Let no dread of ecclesiastical ambition and social tyranny prevent us from recognising this, for they are powerless except when true religion languishes or slumbers. Once reawaken religion to full life and activity and their influence is gone. Will it now reawake?

Our brilliant nineteenth century has achieved wonders, but it has been disappointed in its expectation of such a reawakening. The waning century seems weary, and almost despairing. It sometimes speaks of the bankruptcy of science and the illusions of philosophy. There are even persons who, in their despair, are willing to be fettered anew with the shackles from which the courage and perseverance, the toil and strife, of saints and heroes have freed them. Others, however, are reluctant to throw away a single precious conquest of the century, or to give up the smallest fragment of their dearly-bought liberty; and they therefore decline to surrender to those who would deprive them of all these blessings. And others, again, are convinced by their study of religious life and of the laws which govern it that the substance of these conquests and the maintenance of that liberty can only be guaranteed provided they lead to a new manifestation of religious life. Our science cannot call forth such a manifestation, but we may pave the way for it by tracing the evolution of religion, explaining its essentials, and showing where its origin is to be sought for. Let it do its own duty in throwing light upon the part that religion has ever played in the history of mankind, and still plays in every human soul. And then, without preaching or special pleading, or apologetic argument, but solely by means of the actual facts it reveals, our beloved science will help to bring home to the restless spirits of our time the truth that there is no rest for them unless "they arise and go to their Father."

And now he, too, has heard the august summons at the voice of death. He, too, has arisen, and gone to his Father.

HARNACK'S "MONASTICISM AND CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE."*

THE most remarkable characteristic of Dr. Harnack as a historian is his command of two intellectual virtues which are not often united, accuracy of detail and breadth of view. His mastery of fact is like that of Cuvier, his power of generalisation like that of Lamarck. In his History of Dogma the texture of fact is woven very close, and it is only by dint of sustained study, with the help of his lucid introductory and recapitulatory chapters, that his great inductions can be worthily understood. But in his lectures it is otherwise. The lecturer does all the work, and asks of his auditor no more than a delighted attention. This method of progress, in which the conclusion looms visible from the outset, and facts have never to be sought, but always drop into place with punctilious Prussian discipline, is well suited to the indolent English reader. It is, therefore, rather strange that the first of these two lectures should have remained for twenty years untranslated. During that time some new light has been thrown upon the personality of St. Francis, and the origins of his order. If he were lecturing on this subject to-day, Dr. Harnack would doubtless modify one or two brief sentences in his eighth chapter. But they do not materially affect his conclusions. The idea of St. Francis as an Ultramontanist may provoke a smile, but what could better express the result of our new knowledge than this? (p. 96)—

We may say without exaggeration that he wished not to found a new order of monks but to revolutionise the world—to make the world a fair garden, colonised by men who follow Christ, who need nothing, in whose hearts is God.

After a few sections on pre-monastic tendencies towards monasticism, Dr. Harnack waives the question whether its actual forms were derived, in any degree, from the old Egyptian religion, and discovers its real genesis in the secularisation of the Church in the third century. In gaining the power of a state within a state, she inevitably compromised her moral and religious ideal. The ideal, nevertheless, lived on, and must needs attempt to realise itself. Such an attempt might be made in various ways: that form of effort which, despairing of the Church in the world, sought to live an ideal life outside the world, is the origin of monasticism. In the nature of things it was doomed to failure. Its logical extreme is individual asceticism, which is rather the negation than the perfection of life. An ideal of morality is necessarily a social ideal; society begets organisation; and the organisation of a religious society must either follow the normal development of its own ideas in its own environment—in other words, must approximate to that church against which it is logically a protest—or else must find some artificial means of stunting itself, and take refuge in stagnation. The former of these two modes of failure has befallen monasticism in the Western Church, the latter in the East. "Monasticism in the East maintained its independence at the cost of stagnation; monasticism in the West remained effectual at the cost of losing its essential principle." The true aim of the spiritual man in the presence of a degenerate church should be to refresh that church by a revival within it of the grand ideas and emotions which it has lost or obscured; and, failing that, his only course is to establish a new and purer church by its side.

The stagnation of Eastern asceticism has deprived it of history, in any effective sense of the word. It reached the point of being recognised by the Church as a higher ideal. To be a faithful servant of the secular church is good: to renounce the world, and live "in silent contemplation and blissful ignorance," is better. There it has remained. Its very success has made it barren. "To-day . . . . it remains essentially what it was in the days of the first Byzantine Emperors." This section ends with an interesting allusion to Tolstoy as one of the modern representatives of the spirit of Greek monasticism.

How utterly different has been the evolution of monasticism in the West! . . . . Monasticism there made history, secular and religious alike. . . . The foundation of the Benedictine Order in the sixth century, the Clunian Reform of the eleventh, the appearance of the Mendicant Orders in the thirteenth, the foundation of the Society of Jesus in the sixteenth, are the four great landmarks in the history of Western monasticism; but they are at the same time landmarks in the history of Western Catholicism.

The remainder of the lecture (pp. 64-116) is a vivid exposition of how monasticism, arising again and again to vindicate the spiritual ideal, was again and again itself secularised, and became the chief tool of Roman aggression. The Romanising of the Frankish Church was the effect of a bargain between Rome and the Benedictine Order. All other orders were suppressed, on condition that this order remained obedient to Rome. The Clunian ideal—"Christian life for the whole of Christendom"—was so interpreted by Hildebrand that the subjection of the world to the Church became a necessary pre-condition, and literally, therefore, a foremost aim. It becomes, in Dr. Harnack's pages, a clearly logical event that asceticism should beget Crusades. Then appears the lovely figure of St. Francis of Assisi, and we follow the terribly sad story of the degradation of the mendicant orders.

They became secularised as speedily as any other Order before them. The connection with the secular Church proved once again fatal to monasticism. That connection had been from the first extraordinarily close—Francis had been compelled to yield as if to a decree of Fate—and the ruin was all the more rapid (pp. 101, 102). . . .It was the Franciscans who, in the fourteenth century, discovered a scientific foundation for the Hohenstaufen theory of politics (p. 105). . . . In the fifteenth century a deathly stillness reigns in the Order, which is now in entire subjection to the Church (p. 106).

What new form of monasticism remained possible, the lecturer asks, after all these attempts? "It remained possible to find, instead of an ascetic union with ecclesiastical tendencies, a society that should pursue no other aim than to strengthen and extend the dominion of the Church. The glory of recognising this possibility, and of understanding the lessons of history, belongs to the Spaniard, Ignatius Loyola." But, as man conquers Nature by obeying her, so the Jesuit Order by serving the Church has obtained control of the Church. "While it has not seldom corrected the policy of the Popes in accordance with the programme of the Papacy, it to-day rules the Church by its peculiar Christianity, its fantastic and sensuous mode of worship, and its political morality." The last effect, then, of monasticism in the West, which began in a protest of the spirit against the secularisation of the Church, is to bind her more firmly in secular chains.

Throughout this sketch of the long tragedy of monastic history, Dr. Harnack dwells with loving reverence on the beauty of those ideals which monasticism is a false attempt to realise. But he ends by pointing to the message of Luther, which, though "soon falsified and tainted by the world," may even yet, when well interpreted, amid "the strife of the creeds" be "a signal of peace."

The lecture on "The Confessions of St. Augustine" is shorter. It is delightful to read, but hardly lends itself to analysis or summary. Against a background of his times, rapidly sketched in, Dr. Harnack sets the picture which Augustine himself drew, "the portrait of a soul . . . the most exact portraiture of a distinct human personality, in his development from childhood to full age, with all his propensities, feelings, aims, mistakes." Those to whom the Confessions are unknown will do well to read this lecture, not as a substitute for Augustine, but as a pedagogue to lead them to him.

Our gratitude to the translators would be greater if the translation were better. This sentence on the first page, "The diversity of creeds among us is, in the last analysis, as much due to the difference of beliefs as to that of the ideals of life engendered by the belief," gives us the converse of what the original intends to say. And similar slips occur too often in the first essay. The second is much better done.

CHANNING ON FREE SPEECH IN WAR-TIME.

MANY writers and speakers have pointed out the parallels between the war in South Africa and the American War of Independence. But the later war between Great Britain and the United States in 1812-1814 is seldom referred to, and has, perhaps, been forgotten by "the man in the street." It arose at the time of the great struggle with Napoleon, during which England tried to prevent all trade with France, and Napoleon tried to prevent all trade with England. America at this time secured most of the carrying trade of Europe: England claimed the right of stopping American vessels to search for seamen of English birth Misunderstandings and jealousies increased, and the United States declared war against England. In this measure the majority of the American people supported their Government, but an earnest minority, especially among the people of New England, was steadfastly opposed. Dr. Channing, whose memory none will be likely to recall as that of a political parson or partisan, preached several times on the subject after the declaration of war; and in those sermons there are passages on Free Speech, to which it may be worth while now to call renewed attention. The reference to the Birmingham riot at the beginning of our "Provincial Letter" from the Midlands this week may be taken as the occasion for the following quotations. The passages will be found in Channing's Works in the first extract, under the heading, "Duties of Citizens in Times of Trial or Danger":—

"At the present time, it is particularly your duty to guard, with jealousy, the right of expressing with freedom your honest convictions respecting the measures of your rulers. Without this, the right of election is not worth possessing. If public abuses may not be exposed, their authors will never be driven from power. Freedom of opinion, of speech, and of the Press, is our most valuable privilege, the very soul of republican institutions, the safeguard of all other rights. We may learn its value if we reflect that there is nothing which tyrants so much dread. They anxiously fetter the Press; they scatter spies through society, that the murmurs, anguish, and indignation of their oppressed subjects may be smothered in their own breasts; that no generous sentiment may be nourished and sympathy and mutual confidence. Nothing awakens and improves men so much as free communication of thought and feelings. Nothing can give to public sentiment that correctness, which is essential to the prosperity of a commonwealth, but the free circulation of truth from the lips and pens of the wise and good. If such men abandon the right of free discussion; if, awed by threats, they suppress their convictions; if rulers succeed in silencing every voice but that which approves them; if nothing reaches the people but what will lend support to men in power—farewell to liberty. The form of a free government may remain, but the life, the soul, and substance is fled.

"If these remarks be just, nothing ought to excite greater indignation and alarm than the attempts that have lately been made to destroy the freedom of the Press. We have lived to hear the strange doctrine that to expose the measures of rulers is treason; and we have lived to see this doctrine carried into practice. We have seen a savage populace excited and let loose on men, whose crime consisted in bearing testimony against the present war; and let loose, not merely to waste their property, but to tear them from the refuge which the magistrates had afforded, and to shed their blood. In this and in other events there have been symptoms of a purpose to terrify into silence those who disapprove the calamitous war under which we suffer; to deprive us of the only method which is left of obtaining a wiser and better Government. The cry has been that war is declared and all opposition should therefore be hushed. A sentiment more unworthy of a free country can hardly be propagated. If this doctrine be admitted, rulers have only to declare war and they are screened at once from scrutiny. At the very time when they have armies at command, when their patronage is most extended and their power most formidable, not a word of warning, of censure, of alarm must be heard. The Press, which is to expose inferior abuses, must not utter one rebuke, one indignant complaint, although our best interests and most valued rights are put to hazard by an unnecessary war. Admit this doctrine, let rulers once know that by placing the country in a state of war they place themselves beyond the only power they dread—the power of free discussion—and we may expect war without end. Our peace and all our interests require that a different sentiment should prevail. We should teach our present and all future rulers that there is no measure for which they must render so solemn an account to their constituents as for a declaration of war; that no measure will be so freely, so fully discussed; and that no Administration can succeed in persuading this people to exhaust their treasure and blood in supporting war, unless it be palpably necessary and just. In war then, as in peace, assert the freedom of speech and of the Press. Cling to this as the bulwark of all your rights and privileges."

"But, my friends, I should not be faithful were I only to call you to hold fast this freedom. I would still more earnestly exhort you not to abuse it. Its abuse may be as fatal to our country as its relinquishment. If undirected, unrestrained by principle, the Press, instead of enlightening, depraves the public mind; and, by its licentiousness, forges chains for itself and for the community. The right of free discussion is not the right of uttering what we please. Let nothing be spoken or written but truth. The influence of the Press is exceedingly diminished by its gross and frequent misrepresentations. Each party listens with distrust to the statements of the other; and the consequence is, that the progress of truth is slow, and sometimes wholly obstructed. Whilst we encourage the free expression of opinion, let us unite in fixing the brand of infamy on falsehood and slander, wherever they originate, whatever be the cause they are designed to maintain."

"The sum of my remarks is this. It is your duty to hold fast and to assert with firmness those truths and principles on which the welfare of your country seems to depend; but do this with calmness, with a love of peace, without ill-will and revenge. Use every opportunity of allaying animosities. Discourage, in decided and open language, that rancour, malignity and unfeeling abuse which so often find their way into our public prints. Remember that in proportion as a people become enslaved to their passions they fall into the hands of the aspiring and unprincipled; and that a corrupt Government which has an interest in deceiving the people can desire nothing more favourable to their purpose than a frenzied state of the public mind."

FROM DENMARK.

SHORTLY after the opening of the Danish Parliament in October, 1901, the Church Minister (the Minister of State, who has the oversight of ecclesiastical affairs) brought in a Bill which, if passed into law, will form, as it would seem, the foundation of a church organisation independent of the State. The Bill proposes, amongst other changes, to pass some of the power and responsibilities in church affairs, which now rest solely with the Government and the Bishops appointed by it, on to the congregations, especially securing for them a certain influence on the calling of their ministers. The seven bishops, and more than 800 of the clergy of the Established Church (of whom there are about 1,200), sent in addresses to the Minister, requesting that a committee of clergy and laymen should be formed, thoroughly to examine and consider the question before the Bill should be passed through the Rigsdag. To this the Minister replied, that as the question had been open to discussion for more than fifty years, and had during that time been thoroughly examined and discussed by two great Committees, and as the present Bill, with a few alterations, was identical with a Bill which he himself, as a member of the Rigsdag, had brought in only a year ago, he thought that sufficient opportunity had been afforded for any one interested in the matter to express his views, and he therefore saw no reason for retarding the passing of the Bill by the forming of a new Committee, unless the Rigsdag should so decide.

This is how the matter stands at present, the second reading of the Bill rapidly drawing near, and all proceedings in connection with it are being followed with intense interest by the whole nation, excepting perhaps that little fraction which is commonly termed "the upper ten thousand." Crowded meetings are held all over the country, many clergymen and the great majority of the laity expressing great sympathy with the proposed law—the Committee question being of only secondary interest.

How far the passing of the Bill may influence the position of the Danish Unitarians cannot be foretold, but that it would be a great step towards a broader and more liberal church organisation is a point upon which opponents, as well as adherents, agree.

It may, perhaps, be of interest to those who have shown a kind and generous sympathy for the Unitarian movement in Denmark to know that on several occasions, when Pastor Birkedal, the minister of the Free Church Association, has spoken at these meetings, advocating the right of all Christians, and amongst them the Unitarians, to form congregations within the National Church, he has been cordially cheered and applauded; and when, shortly before Christmas, he spoke at some public meetings, arranged by the most bigoted section in the Church to discuss religious questions with the labourers, the sympathy expressed by them—the labourers—with the religious views upheld by him was so warm that the Free Church Association decided to make arrangements for Mr. Birkedal to deliver some lectures at different labourers' association halls. Two lectures have now been given—(1) "The Christ of the Church and the real Christ," and (2) "Is Death the End?"—and, though the audience had to stand, about a thousand men and women listened silently and with great interest for one hour and a-half, and cheered the lecturer when he left the platform.

The lesson that may be drawn from these modest attempts is that there is in the great masses of the people a craving for religion, a longing for spiritual enlightenment, and that a great and blessed work is waiting for men who, like Mr. Birkedal, have the gift and the will to explain in simple words the teaching of the great prophets of humanity.

FROM HUNGARY.

"A Kolozsvari Unitárius Kollegium irásban és képekben. Az uj Kollegium megnyitásának emlékére szerkesztette és kiadja: Dr. Boros György. ára 1 korona." Such is the title of a small quarto of eighty-four pages with a decorated paper cover, which bears, as will be seen, the name of our friend, Dr. George Boros of Kolozsvár, as author. It contains a brief history of the Unitarian College of that ancient town, and biographical notes concerning sixteen former leaders of the Unitarian Church of Transylvania, ranging from the first martyr bishop Francis Dávid (1510-1579) and his prince John Sigismund (1540-1571) to the late venerable Samuel Brassai (1800-1897). There are medallion portraits, including one of the present Bishop Ferencz, showing a great variety of faces, and some very noble ones, also pictures of the College and the adjoining church, showing both the former and the present College buildings, and of the banner presented to the College at the opening of the new buildings, Sept. 22, 1901.

With his book Dr. Boros sends us a letter in which he refers again to the great pleasure which the visit of Miss Tagart's English party gave to his people last year, and adds that its effect was not merely that of a private pleasure excursion, but touched deeper chords of sympathy in those who have passionate memories of the Hungarian struggle for freedom and the help and encouragement which England gave at that time. Dr. Boros expresses special gratitude to Mr. W. H. Shrubsole for what he has done since the return of the party, by public lectures and through the Press, to spread a knowledge of Hungary and the Hungarian people in this country, and to correct misrepresentations.

Thus in the Echo of Nov. 26 there was an article from Mr. Shrubsole's pen, controverting the mischievous statements of the Quarterly Review article of last October, to which Dr. Boros had already referred with indignation, and defending the loyalty of the Hungarian people to their "Apostolic King," from such unworthy attacks. Dr. Boros has reproduced Mr. Shrubsole's articles in Kolozsvár and Budapest papers, where they have been most heartily received; he also refers with pleasure to the resolutions of sympathy with Hungary passed at public meetings, and the response of their statesmen, as to which we have already published more than one note.

The South African war has naturally put a great strain on the sympathy of the Hungarian people for this country, and Dr. Boros refers to the recent reply of the Prime Minister to an interpellation on the subject of the purchase of horses in Hungary for the British Army, reminding his people of what they had owed to England in the past. He also quotes a leading article which appeared in the Magyar News, a Budapest daily paper, referring to Széll's reply, pointing out how they must still look to England as the friend of freedom, and how disastrous it would be to humanity if the power of England were broken.

In conclusion Dr. Boros speaks of the decided movement towards Liberalism in the Protestant churches of Hungary, so that a Budapest Protestant paper has recently asked what is to happen if all their best writers become Unitarians? And our correspondent adds: "The answer is not very difficult. We are going back to the original foundations, and let all dogmatic superstructures fall to the ground, and become one in love and sympathy and good works. We shall not trouble ourselves very much over the question whether there is any longer a true Calvinism, or whether perhaps all are indeed become Unitarians."

Life can never become a burden to those who, in all the freshness and enthusiasm of healthy thought, awaken each morning to look out upon another day, eager to know what new mystery it holds.—Horatio W. Dresser.

TEMPERANCE REFORM.

Sir,—Mr. Weeks, evidently not a Temperance reformer himself, appears as the champion of the old-fashioned medical practitioner who advises us to take a little wine for our stomach's sake. I am not sure, indeed, that he is not even the defender of the mysterious medicine-man, whose word is to be taken for law, and whose prescriptions are to be followed in blind faith. Let me tell him that the times are changed, and with them the ideal of the physician. The patient expects now to be made acquainted with the principals upon which he is being treated, and very properly declines to be kept in the dark and have no opinion of his own. The tyranny of a medical priesthood has prevailed too long, though its dangers are still imminent.

Surely such an advocate for freedom as Mr. Weeks will grant the right to choose or change one's medical man. A doctor is called in as a skilled expert to perform a certain service. If, in the course of his treatment, he shows himself and his remedies to be behind the times, the patient does well to let him see that the fact is noted and give a timely hint. If the doctor still persists in prescribing alcohol, e.g., when the patient disbelieves in it and knows that the chief men in the faculty condemn its administration as unscientific, it would be the height of folly to continue a relationship which, above all things, demands mutual confidence. It is not asking a doctor "to sacrifice his liberty of thought and self-respect," when the patient expresses his determination to have a medical adviser whose counsel he can trust. It may be a suggestion to him to go back to his studies and bring himself up to date—as many medical men never do; or, if he has already weighed the arguments of his professional leaders and found them wanting, it is a friendly intimation of irreconcilable difference of opinion, in which case parting is best for both sides.

The patient may be quite wrong in his views, and Mr. Victor Horsley may be quite wrong too when he wholly excludes alcohol as a food and maintains that even in small doses it has an injurious effect on the brain; but, at any rate, the patient has a right to select his own medical adviser, and to dismiss him if he is dissatisfied, without being charged on the doctor's side with exercising "immoral pressure." Really, the man who pays the piper is entitled to call the tune. Is the medical man going to compel us to continue his services, whether we will or not; and if so, will he, for a pleasant change, refrain from sending in a portentous bill? The doctor who has got his congé from a Temperance reformer because he persists in prescribing alcohol will still find plenty of patients glad to take his whisky and wine remedies, whatever the élite of the faculty may say on their merits.

As for the Children's Act, I should have thought that anyone who loved the little ones and realised the enormity of causing one of them to offend, would have felt that his duty was to keep a sharp look-out on the administration of the new Act and report flagrant breaches of the law at once to the proper quarter. The necessity for even doubtful cases being reported is evident when we find that there is as yet no clear definition of a "sealed vessel," and ingenious devices are being tried to evade the intention of the Legislature, as, e.g., by lightly gumming a label across the cork. The sooner a test case is sent up to the High Courts the better, so that we may have an authoritative decision on this point.

But Mr. Weeks thinks "a gigantic evil" is involved in my suggestion that Temperance reformers should constitute themselves into members of "an informal Vigilance Committee" for the protection of the interests of the little ones. Let me tell him that every citizen is a trustee for the children of the community, and owes them protection and care. I did not suggest anything more than that we should all keep our eyes open, and have the courage to check illegality when we see it. This is scarcely to descend to "the tactics of the spy and the methods of the common informer."

But, as Mr. Weeks seems to dread the very name of a Vigilance Committee, I will tell him something more—that every citizen has a duty to his fellow-citizens in seeing that the laws made in the interests of the community are duly observed and properly administered. Here is the need for a real Vigilance Committee—not an informal one at all. We have no right to leave the work of civic guardianship entirely to the police. Without a strong body of public sentiment behind them, the police will lack the necessary stimulus to persevere in a duty often irksome and difficult. Nothing is more valuable in any large centre of population than a combination of the most public-spirited inhabitants as a Citizens' or Vigilance Committee, representing an organised expression of right sentiment. I have had the privilege of serving on several of such committees, and know from practical experience how much good has been done for the public interest which otherwise would have been impossible. It is not always an easy task to persevere in such civic duty, for there are usually plenty of people like Mr. Weeks to carp and cavil and cry out that the liberty of the subject is being interfered with. But "license they mean when they cry liberty," as old John Milton shrewdly said. Sobriety and freedom have their best chance when laws are wisely made and honestly administered; and he who tries to check disorder and excess is helping to preserve the boon of personal liberty for those good citizens who understand that they must give as well as take.

A PARALLEL.

SIR,—Is the parallel suggested by your correspondent between Matt. xxvii. 52, 53 and Hamlet I. i. 113 et seq. more than Shakespeare's free treatment of the "strange and wonderful signs" recorded in North's "Plutarch" as preceding Cæsar's death? Turning to the tragedy of Julius Cæsar, produced the year before the appearance of Hamlet (vide Lee's "Life," pp. 211-221), we find among the warnings reported by Calphurnia:

> And graves have yawned, and yielded up their dead.—(II. ii. 18.)

This is the rumour echoed by "the immortal Dane" in the later play. But there is no mention of this in "Plutarch." The nearest approach to it seems to be that of "spirits running up and down in the night," which, however, Calphurnia expresses in the line:

> And ghosts did shriek and squeal about the streets.—(Ibid. I. 24.)

which, again, is echoed by the Dane. But for any closer parallel with the occurrence of Matt. xxvii. 52, 53 there is no authority in "Plutarch."

The idea of that occurrence, however, seems to have been a favourite theme with Shakespeare, and his use of it is by no means confined to portents. Thus, again, Hamlet:

> 'Tis now the very witching time of night
> When churchyards yawn. . .—(III. ii. 354.)

Again, Prospero:

> . . . graves at my command
> Have waked their sleepers, oped, and let them forth.—(Tempest V. i. 48.)

Again, Puck:

> Now it is the time of night
> That the graves all gaping wide,
> Every one lets forth his sprite,
> In the church-way paths to glide.—(M. N. D. V. i. 363.)

And—

> Yonder shines Aurora's harbinger;
> At whose appeal, ghosts, wandering here and there,
> Troop home to churchyards.—(Ibid. III. ii. 380.)

These are a few passages that occur to one at random, and several others might be quoted. Sir Walter Scott, in his essay on "The Supernatural in Fiction," notes some interesting parallels. But the question is how did this idea, which had such a hold on Shakespeare's fancy, take its rise? Was it widely prevalent in his time? Can it be traced in the Italian or other sources of our literature? Or, again, how far is Matt. xxvii. 52, 53 the localisation of a more general myth? The natural history of a superstition is always a fascinating subject, and some of your readers who are better informed will, doubtless, be able to throw light on these questions.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Legend.

THERE is a little verse in the Bible that says "this commandment have we, that he who loveth God, love his brother also." This means that if we really love God, who is our Father in Heaven, we must show our love to Him by loving and serving those with whom we live. The word "brother" that is used in the verse means not only our own brothers and sisters, but all our fellow-creatures. If we love people very much, we want to serve, that is, to help them; and if ever there should be, amongst our acquaintance or school-fellows, some that we do not love, and we try to help them, we find that before long we are beginning to love them too, so that loving and helping seem to go hand in hand.

Children, even quite little ones, often have a chance of serving someone. Perhaps it is only running with a message for father or mother, or minding baby for a few minutes; and if they try to serve in this way and are not cross and put out by being called from their play, it makes them feel happy and loving. They may not think very much about it, but they are really learning to love and serve God.

There is an old story told that explains very clearly what this verse means about loving one's brother as well as loving God. There were two men who lived long, long ago, so long ago that the tale told about them is called a legend—that means a story that is partly true and partly made up.

It is said that both were good and holy men, and that they both wished to spend their lives in loving and honouring God and in praising Him with all their hearts. They were called St. Cassian and St. Nicholas. Now St. Cassian thought he could best show his love to God by living alone, or with other holy men, and by spending all his days in praying and in singing hymns of praise. One day it seemed to him that God called him, and he went at once and stood before God in beautiful, spotless white garments. Then God said to him, "I have heard thy prayers and hymns that are offered to Me, but what doest thou for thy fellow-creatures?" And St. Cassian made no answer, because he did not know what to say. "Didst thou see nothing by the way?" asked the voice of God again. And St. Cassian answered that he had seen a peasant labouring with his cart, which had sunk in the mud of a deep lane. "And didst thou help him?" "No," said St. Cassian, "for I feared to soil my garments, and so to appear before Thee stained with mud."

St. Nicholas thought that he could serve God best by going about amongst his fellow-creatures, and by helping all he could wherever help was wanted. He, too, was called, and appeared before God in garments that were stained and splashed all over with mud. "And what didst thou see by the way?" he, too, was asked. He replied, "I saw a poor peasant in trouble, because his cart had stuck fast in deep mud." "What didst thou do?" said the voice of God. "What did I do," answered St. Nicholas, "I put my shoulder to the wheel and helped him out." "Blessed art thou, Nicholas, a thousand times blessed," said the voice of God, "for serving thy brother and so for serving Me."

So you see from this quaint old story that it is more pleasing to God when His children try to serve one another, than when they worship Him with prayers and hymns, and pass by one who needs their help, for fear that they may "soil their garments."

WE would call attention to the special service now being held in the Central Auction Room, Market-place, Horn-lane, Acton. The attendance last Sunday evening was most encouraging, and if our friends in the district will only rally round this movement, something permanent may be the result. Electric tram-cars from Shepherd's Bush and Ealing stop at Church-road, which is close to the Auction Room.

CHURCH EXTENSION.

THE article on Church Extension by the President of the American Unitarian Association, passages of which we reprinted last week from the Christian Register, contains so much practical wisdom, which we should all be the better for considering and applying to the conditions of our work in this country, that we make no apology for returning to the subject here.

The resources of our Free Churches, both in men and in money, are not so great that we can afford to squander them in ill-advised and ill-directed efforts; but, on the other hand, the principles of our religious fellowship, the spiritual freedom of our churches, their openness to truth, the broad charity of their communion, our liberating, clear and searching interpretation of the Christian Gospel are, we are convinced, of such moment for the development of a true religious life in this country, that we cannot be indifferent to the spread of those principles and the wider extension of the influence of such churches as ours. We must desire to see more churches springing up, and gathering in the people, ministering to their deepest needs, and especially in the great centres of population, where no word of ours has yet been spoken, and where the forces which make for spiritual freedom, and a religious life, humane and practical, as it is understood by Unitarians, are either absent or sorely lacking the direction and the fresh inspiration, which the presence of a vigorous and earnest Free Church would give.

But those who are responsible for the direction of our Missionary Associations in different parts of the country know how easy it is, even with plenty of enthusiasm of a kind, to make a poor beginning in efforts of church extension, and how even after some years of prosperity in a new undertaking, one sometimes sees it collapse in some catastrophe or slowly die away for want of proper guidance and support. To all such we most earnestly commend Dr. ELIOT's advice, and the lessons of experience which he records.

The first essential for the work of healthy church building in any district is that there should be the right nucleus for the gathering of a religious society, and that those who are directing the effort should be quite clear as to what they mean in thus endeavouring to found a church.

The nucleus out of which a church can grow, with good prospect of vigorous life, must be at least a few reliable people, who have felt the need of such religious union, and are determined to devote themselves to its accomplishment.

Unless the nucleus is composed of persons who really desire to help bring in the Kingdom of God all our effort is in vain. Music and sensational oratory may attract a crowd, but nothing but religion will do the work of religion. To build a church we must begin with people who are interested in religion. Opposition to Orthodoxy will not make a church; intellectual curiosity will not make a church; the deep root must always be faith and hope and love.

But when in any district such a nucleus has been found, either as the result of the lectures of a Missionary Agent, or a group of neighbouring ministers, or through the silent influence of the Postal Mission, or the spontaneous appeal of a group of friends in some unshepherded place, there are two points to be specially borne in mind.

In undertaking anywhere to establish a church, poor or intermittent efforts are worse than useless. The first steps must be vigorously taken, and with the best strength of the churches of that district brought to bear upon the new point of departure, so that those whom it is sought to influence may feel that it is a body with sufficient resource and with clear and steadfast purpose that is undertaking this work, and may realise that it is a movement of genuine power into which they are to be drawn. So Dr. ELIOT says :—

> It is insufficient to place a minister in charge of a new movement, and leave him to his own devices. It is always best to enlist in behalf of the new organisation the sympathy and goodwill and eloquent message of the leaders of our body.

At the same time it is of great importance that as soon as possible a thoroughly capable and reliable minister should be devoted to the care of the new church, and we are convinced that it is a wise policy for any Association of limited resources to concentrate its efforts on the establishment of one new church at a time, if it cannot secure abundant means and thoroughly efficient ministerial service for more than one. It is a wrong done to those who are invited into the new fellowship, if, in the desire to cover more ground and multiply numbers, only a spasmodic effort is made, and with insufficient means, and then the beginnings of a church are left to the chance ministrations of incapable men.

The second point to be noted is, that even when a new church seems thoroughly established, and is in charge of a capable minister, the duties towards it of the District Association and the neighbouring churches are by no means at an end. Too many disasters in the past have been due to the idea that such was the case, and that the new church was best left to go its own way. Frequent intercourse with members of the older churches of the district, to strengthen the feeling of a larger life shared with others, the frequent presence of trusted leaders, both laymen and ministers, in the intimate counsels of the church and at the time of its important festivals, would often help to overcome difficulties or prevent their occurrence, where neglect of such efforts of sympathy and helpfulness has led in the past to bitter disappointments and failure.

These are matters of the utmost consequence to all who have the welfare of our churches at heart, and we are grateful to Dr. ELIOT for having made so clear and forcible a statement of the principles that should direct our work

DRIFTING AND NATIONAL EFFICIENCY.

IT is possible for a whole community of men to lose its alertness, to grow content with its inherited prosperity, to be over-confident in its traditional security, and to trust too implicitly in the "long-suffering star" of its good fortune. While it is drifting the face of the world has changed, and it awakens to find itself face to face with problems it only dimly understands, and dangers it ought to have foreseen. To judge from many signs, the tone of our daily Press, the speeches of many prominent public men, and the slackening hold of the democracy upon many of its familiar habits of thought, a consciousness of this kind is filling the national mind just now. We have been drifting in Education. We have allowed a great drift of population to take place into the industrial centres without any serious effort to understand the new problems, physical, intellectual, and spiritual of city life. There is a growing suspicion that some of the departments of State are bound by ancient tradition, and have become ineffective for the purposes of modern democratic government. And so the cry on every side is for greater efficiency—efficiency of hand, and brain, and organisation. We are looking for this efficiency chiefly in two directions. We expect to work out our democratic salvation, firstly, by the wider diffusion of scientific knowledge and technical skill, and, secondly, by the adoption of sounder and smarter business methods. We have much lee-way to make up in both these directions; but there is a more essential kind of efficiency about which our modern prophets speak very little. They appeal to the prudence of our people; they do not appeal to their faith. They fail to remind us, perhaps because they hardly perceive it themselves, that there is a moral and spiritual drift which needs to be arrested. The character and soul of the people must also be made more efficient for the tasks which are already at our doors.

It is true that a great industrial democracy needs to cultivate alertness of mind and smartness of method. Its success depends in large measure upon its eagerness to go on learning and to apply its knowledge in the best and most practical way. It may also require some reorganisation of its machinery of government. An effective check upon the slow wastefulness of officialdom, a War Office and an army run upon business lines are necessary elements in a policy of national efficiency. But in these things alone there is neither safety nor happiness nor progress. To trust in them would show a very imperfect idea of the meaning of national life and the scope of national duty. Long ago at a time of political drifting and overweening confidence in human cleverness a great prophet of antiquity had the courage to remind his people that they must seek for efficiency first of all in deeper trust in the righteousness of GOD and the spiritual powers of the human soul. Is there no clear-eyed prophet to speak the same word to us to-day? For lack of vision the people perish. "In quietness and confidence shall be your strength."

There are many teachers not without influence who omit all reference to religion as unpractical in political discussion. They try to regulate national life by physical and economic laws alone. It is perhaps worth while to ask ourselves what would be the result if such an attempt were to succeed, if the great ideals and religious enthusiasms of the past were to be quietly dropped as unsuited for this age of scientific knowledge and technical skill? We should have a people alert, irritable, nervous, keen to outwit its neighbours, with a mind as hard and bright as steel, but a heart like lead, with all the wonder and mystery gone from its life, a mass of atoms held together by the accident of locality and the necessities of the struggle, to whom social service and sacrifice and all "the mighty hopes that make us men" have become the dream-fancies of a dead world. We need not fear that any such arctic night of the soul will ever really overtake us. It is beyond the wit or power of man either to argue or to organise us out of religion. But there are times when its glow grows chill in the heart, and men hear almost unmoved the light scoff and the idle jest at the expense of ideals of life and duty, which once would have stirred the deepest feelings of their souls. If we can listen without any sense of outraged reverence to the fashionable sneer at magnanimity, or humanitarian feeling, or the duty of the strong to the weak, at pity, and sacrifice for ideal causes of liberty and justice, and the certainty of judgment to come, it does not show that, like sensible people, we have recovered from our delusions, and should calmly acquiesce in life becoming more commercial and prosaic in its standards. It is a symptom of spiritual degeneration. We are being carried along in a fatal moral drift. And this drift can only be arrested by one thing, not by our own commonsense and cleverness, but by renewed efficiency of character and soul. To command efficiency of this kind is indeed beyond our power; but we may do something more than wait with folded hands for the pentecostal outpouring of the Spirit. We may watch with a keen eye against any coldness of heart or slackness of conscience or the stealthy growth of cynical habits of thought and speech in ourselves. In quietness and confidence we can sink deeper into the divine laws of personal and social life. Then as the fire burns inwardly we shall learn to speak with our tongue, with the spiritual conviction which passes like the leaping of flame from heart to heart. Men will be thrilled anew by the divine mystery of a nation's life. They will know, and the knowledge possessing and filling their souls with its gladness will be like the advent of spring with its miracle of sunshine and flowers, that apart from worship and reverence and self-control and the quenchless desire of truth and justice and freedom, there is no enduring national strength, there can be no efficiency for us as a people.

By the soul
Only, the Nations shall be great and free.

THE BRAHMO SOMAJ.

SEVENTY-SECOND ANNIVERSARY.

THE custom has been established among our Indian brethren of the Brahmo Somaj, to celebrate the foundation of their Society on Jan. 23, which is the day on which the first building devoted to Theistic worship in Calcutta was opened, in the year 1830, although, on the initiative of Rammohun Roy, regular meetings for worship had been held since August, 1828. The building dedicated in 1830 to the uses of the Brahmo Somaj was held on a Trust, the terms of which very clearly express the spirit of Rammohun Roy's teaching, and the religious principles of that reform movement of which he is rightly honoured as the founder. Thus it is declared that the building is to be held,

For the worship and adoration of the Eternal, Unsearchable, and Immutable Being, who is the Author and Preserver of the Universe, but not under, or by any other name, designation, or title, peculiarly used for, and applied to, any particular Being or Beings, by any man, or set of men, whatsoever;

And in a further clause it is declared,

That, in conducting the said worship or adoration, no object, animate or inanimate, that has been, or is, or shall hereafter become, or be recognised, as an object of worship, by any man, or set of men, shall be reviled, or slightingly or contemptuously spoken of, or alluded to, either in preaching, praying, or in the hymns, or other mode of worship that may be delivered, or used in the said messuage or building;

And that no sermon, preaching, discourse, prayer, or hymn be delivered, made or used in such worship, but such as have a tendency to the promotion of the contemplation of the Author and Preserver of the Universe, to the promotion of charity, morality, piety, benevolence, virtue, and the strengthening the bonds of union between men of all religious persuasions and creeds.

While, therefore, the old idolatries are finally abandoned, and the fundamental truth of a pure Theism clearly stated, the principle of charity, and sympathy for all holders of other forms of faith, is no less clearly laid down.

The Rajah did not enjoy the worship in the new building for many months, for it was in November of the same year that he left home for England, never to return, and in September, 1833, he died at Bristol.

Thus it is the seventy-second anniversary of the Brahmo Somaj that was celebrated this year. The programme of celebrations arranged by the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj in Calcutta extends from Jan. 14 to 27, the anniversary of the Calcutta congregation being specially commemorated on Thursday, the 23rd.

For some years this anniversary has been observed by the little group of Brahmo students at Cambridge, but this year advantage was taken of the presence in this country of Professor J. C. Bose, M.A., D.Sc., of the Presidency College, Calcutta, to hold the celebration in London. Dr. Bose, who came over at the time of the Paris Exhibition, commissioned by the Indian Government, and is now carrying out some abstruse scientific investigations at the Royal Institution, is residing with Mrs. Bose at Ealing, and at their house the anniversary celebration took place on Friday, Jan. 24. Nearly twenty Brahmos, who are studying in London or at Cambridge, and a few English guests were present.

At the request of Dr. Bose the Rev. V. D. Davis first offered prayer, and an address was then given by the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, who dwelt on the close sympathies which unite the members of the Brahmo Somaj and the Unitarians of England, which had been strengthened by the visits to India of the Revs. J. T. Sunderland and J. Harwood, and especially of the late S. Fletcher Williams. Messrs. B. C. Ghose, B. C. Chatterjea, A. Dutt, and Dr. Bose himself also spoke, and Mr. Ion Pritchard, who referred to Mr. Fletcher Williams as having consecrated the goodwill, which unites our two communities, by his life and by his death. Mr. Ghose began by thanking Mr. Bowie for his beautiful and brotherly address, and declared that in the Brahmo Somaj there was the potentiality of India's deliverance. It maintained the ideal of human brotherhood, entirely separate from the system of caste. The doctrines of the Somaj commanded the respect of all enlightened Indians, but intellectual conviction was too often sacrificed to custom, and the Somaj had a hard up-hill fight.

On the motion of Mr. GHOSE a resolution was subsequently passed expressing deep regret for the loss India has sustained in the death of Mr. Fletcher Williams, and of sympathy with the B. and F.U.A., whose representative he was.

A cordial vote of thanks to Dr. and Mrs. Bose for their hospitable entertainment was also passed, and at the conclusion of the meeting the company adjourned for tea.

ULLET-ROAD CHURCH, LIVERPOOL.

THE church hall and cloisters which have been added to the Ullet-road Church, in Sefton Park, Liverpool, and are erected as a memorial to the Rev. John Brunner and Sir Henry Tate, Bart., were formally presented to the congregation last Saturday evening by the donors, Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., and Mr. Henry Tate. Ullet-road Church was opened on June 18, 1899, and now the whole group of buildings is complete. They form three sides of a quadrangle, open on the south to Ullet-road and the Park, and the space enclosed is to be laid out with grass and gravelled walks, with a raised terrace round the sides and a sundial in the centre.

The church itself and the new church hall form two sides of the quadrangle, which are united by the cloisters, from which access is also gained to the council-room or library and the vestries. In the cloisters have been placed the monuments from Renshaw-street Chapel of former members of the congregation, including those to William Roscoe, Blanco White, Christopher Rawdon, William Rathbone, George Holt, Henry Arthur Bright, Charles Booth, and Charles Holland.

The interior of the church hall, which is of stone, is panelled in oak up to a height of about eight feet, and has an open roof of massive oak. The library has been furnished and decorated as a further special gift by Sir John Brunner. The oak book-cases and panellings are surmounted by a decorated frieze, above which the curved ceiling, divided into three bays by oak principals, has been painted in fresco by Mr. Gerald Moira, of the South Kensington School of Art. For the following description of this beautiful piece of allegorical painting, as for other particulars of the work, we are indebted to the Liverpool Daily Post. The painting on the library ceiling represents an allegory. The Earth in various characteristic features of its purpose is broadly treated. Rising above the Earth a grand figure of Time is seen (above the fireplace) raising into the air a woman, Truth, and rescuing her from the attacks of Ignorance, Envy, Superstition, and Jealousy, represented by four figures occupying four corners of the fresco. All round (right and left of Time, and the whole side opposite) are seen the figures of the greatest representatives of humanity, in all departments of human activity, irrespective of creed and country, who stand, looking in wonder upon the triumph of Truth by the action of Time, a triumph for which, in their own days, they have laboured, but which they had not lived to see—David, Aristotle, Plato, Homer, Dante, Faraday, Milton, Shakespeare, and many others all exultant and united in the triumph of Truth. A fresco, to occupy the end of the room, will also be of an allegorical character, but it is not yet begun. Mr. Moira has also decorated the ceiling of the vestry, which is of peculiar shape, and is divided into four triangular spaces occupied by four pictures, representing Justice, Temperance, Prudence, and Charity. Underneath, above the fireplace, is a picture of the Sun rising above the horizon, the sea and clouds being treated conventionally but with striking effect. Over the first-mentioned picture is the text:—"Then shall Thy light break forth as the morning."

At the presentation ceremony on Saturday evening the chair was taken by Mr. HENRY JEVONS, and among those on the platform were Sir John and Lady Brunner, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Tate, Alderman W. B. Bowring, Mr. Robert D. Holt, Mr. Richard D. Holt, and the Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein. Letters regretting absence were received from Mr. William Rathbone and the Rev. R. A. Armstrong.

Sir JOHN BRUNNER, in making the presentation, said that they were met to celebrate the completion of that beautiful hall, which they had looked forward to for nearly three years. Two and a-half years ago the congregation occupied their beautiful church, and it was since then that his old friend, Mr. Henry Tate, agreed with him that they should share together the making of Mr. Worthington's plans complete. It had been a labour of love from the beginning, and he hoped the congregation's pleasure in receiving the buildings was as great as the donors' pleasure in giving them. What the good people who were old when he was young would say if they could see that congregation in its new home he dared not venture to think, but the time had gone by when Unitarians should always be housed in barns. He felt a reverence for the old chapels, but he was pleased to think that the Ullet-road congregation would be surrounded with beauty in exact sympathy and consonance with the teaching of their minister, Dr. Klein. Sir John then recalled the memory of his father and of Sir Henry Tate, who had always been to him an extremely kind friend over a period of nearly half a century. In conclusion, he said that with a heart full of kindness and good-will he presented those buildings to the congregation, which his friend and himself had endeavoured to make as beautiful as skill and care could make them.

Mr. HENRY TATE expressed his great pleasure in being associated with Sir John Brunner in that gift. With such buildings Ullet-road Church had a great future, and by their use they would be able to retain more of the young members, and would not, as in the past, see them slipping away. He trusted that the congregation's prospects would be brighter, and that Unitarianism would more than hold its own in Liverpool. The building of the Church Hall had given him the opportunity of erecting his share to the memory of his father, whose life and work, especially among Unitarians, was still fresh. This seemed to him the most fitting memorial he could have erected of his father.

The CHAIRMAN moved that the warmest thanks of the congregation be tendered to the donors for the generous gifts, which would be of most valuable assistance to the congregation in the accomplishment of its work. He spoke of the generosity and very kind feelings which had prompted the gifts. The new buildings brought new responsibilities, and he trusted use would be made of them by increased attendance and increased diligence in the Sunday-school. The donors had set a great example in the beautiful buildings they had erected. He hoped it would elevate the taste of the city and neighbourhood.

The Rev. Dr. KLEIN seconded the resolution, and the Revs. W. J. Jupp, T. Lloyd Jones, and H. Enfield Dowson, added their congratulations.

On the motion of Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, seconded by Mr. R. D. HOLT, thanks were accorded to the architects, Messrs. Thomas Worthington and Son, and to the artist, Mr. Gerald Moira, for his work of decoration.

HIGHGATE UNITARIAN CHURCH.

WELCOME TO THE REV. R. H. GREAVES.

FOR nearly three years, since the death of the Rev. Robert Spears, the Highgate Church, of which he was founder, has been without a settled minister; for the hope that the Rev. J. T. Sunderland might have remained in this country was disappointed, and other efforts of the congregation to secure what they wanted also failed. But throughout this long unsettled period they have held together, and the work of the church and school has been faithfully carried on, and that wider public work, which they do through their Free Library and as a centre for University Extension lectures.

Last Saturday their new minister, the Rev. R. H. Greaves, at one time a Methodist minister—an Englishman who had been for some years in the States, and latterly as Unitarian minister at Troy, N.Y.—received a very cordial welcome from the congregation and a large gathering of friends belonging to other London churches.

In the afternoon a service of Induction was held, the first part of which was conducted by the Rev. V. D. Davis, after which a charge to the congregation was given by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, and a charge to the minister by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter. Mr. F. Withall then extended a welcome to Mr. Greaves on behalf of the congregation, to which he responded, and after the last hymn pronounced the benediction.

Mr. TARRANT, in his charge, referred to the steadfastness of the congregation in their period of unsettlement, as testimony to the devoted love with which the personal influence of their late minister had inspired them, his best memorial as preacher and pastor. He then spoke of the life of the church, in which all must have a part, and of the deep significance and great opportunity of united worship, in which the life of the people must kindle power in the preacher's word.

Mr. CARPENTER'S charge was based on the words, "I am come that men may have life, and may have it abundantly," words to which, since the time of Jesus, the Church had borne unceasing witness, and to which the disciple must always aspire. The great joy of this new life, he said, they must seek to kindle in other hearts—the great joy of life in God, called to eternal fellowship with His goodness and love, and, even through our poor efforts, to be fellow-workers with Him. Towards that great end the minister's efforts must be directed, and as life cannot exist without forms he must be a servant of truth, and see that the forms it takes are noble and fitting. As the preacher had life in himself, he would be able to impart it to others and give it clear expression.

In response to Mr. Withall's words of welcome, Mr. GREAVES said that it was nearly fifteen years since, with fear and trembling, he had begun in Yorkshire to preach what he then felt to be the Gospel; and since then he had preached in many places in the North of England, in Canada, and the United States, but nowhere had he felt that depth of help and strength and inspiration from the people as he felt when he first came within those walls. That was what drew him to them—and the knowledge of their many beneficent activities and their desire for work. His prayer was that they might be knit together in the love of God, and might work together in the same spirit as fired the heart of Jesus Christ.

The church was well filled at the service, the choir was largely augmented, and Mr. John Harrison presided at the organ. At the conclusion of the service tea was served in the schoolroom, and a public meeting was subsequently held in the church.

Mr. F. WITHALL presided, and Mr. H. J. S. Cooper, the secretary, announced a large number of letters of regret for absence from a number of ministers of other churches in the neighbourhood and other friends, including the Rev. Alexander Gordon, who had hoped to be present, Miss Marian Pritchard, and the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards.

The speakers who joined in offering a most cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Greaves included Sir E. Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P.; Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., President of the B. and F.U.A.; Mr. John Harrison, President of the Provincial Assembly; Mr. Hahnemann Epps, representing the L.D.U.S.; Mr. Ion Pritchard, Hon. Sec. of the S.S.A.; Mr. Anthony Mundella, a representative of the London School Board for that district; the Revs. F. K. Freeston and W. Copeland-Bowie, and Mr. H. G. Chancellor, who spoke on behalf of the congregation.

The Rev. R. H. GREAVES, in responding to the many words of welcome, said he was glad to be back in Old England again, the country of his boyhood; after eight years' absence he returned to England, which he felt to be the true home of freedom and democracy. In coming to London he felt that he was closely surrounded by brother ministers, for at Troy his nearest ministerial neighbour was eight miles away in Albany, and the next 15 or 16 miles away, and the next 60 miles, so that it had been a very isolated life, from which it was necessary to go up to the annual gatherings at Boston to get warm. Many reasons made him glad to be back in England, and one was that he thought they were more truly democratic in their church work than in America, and it would not be thought unseemly for him as minister of that church to throw himself into work in the slums. Then he thought English Unitarians wanted more men, and more men who had come out from other churches, who knew the need for more of the missionary spirit, to help others to the new light. In all churches now they were laying stress on life as the chief thing, but in the orthodox churches they added "The life is Jesus Christ." They, for their part, said the life was the indwelling Spirit of God. Orthodoxy was the Kindergarten school in which men were trained for the better light of Unitarianism, and there might well be a broader and a brighter light beyond, for they did not claim to know all the truth. Truth was living and increasingly manifested in the hearts of men. Unitarianism meant Unsectarianism; that was the stand they would take. He should tell them what he believed to be true, and they must test the truth, and be true to their own convictions. He told how last October, at the Saratoga Conference, he had met the Revs. J. T. Sunderland and William Lloyd, who, when they heard he was coming to Highgate, congratulated him and sent affectionate messages to the congregation. As to the work of the church, in that he should be with them with all his heart, and if, as one of the speakers had suggested, they were going to join together and push him on, they must be sure to push up-hill and not down, for he was ready for an arduous ascent; and he prayed that the Divine blessing might be with them in all they undertook together.

SHIBBOLETHS.

BY THE REV. ROBERT COLLYER.

[MR. COLLYER'S many friends in this country will be glad to see the following passages, of special personal interest, taken from a sermon on "Shibboleths," which appeared in the Messiah Pulpit of New York (Vol. VI., No. 2, Oct. 11). The text is from Judges xii. 6: "They said unto him, Say now Shibboleth; and he said Sibboleth, for he could not pronounce it right. Then they took him, and slew him," and after telling the grim old story, Mr. Collyer speaks of the happier temper which has come over the religious life of the different churches in his own life-time, in which a Shibboleth is no longer allowed to make separations and enmity as of old.]

I have thought the story may point toward the truth we may well lay to our hearts—the truth of the worth for us all of the essence as it may stand in contrast to the accent; and the need there is, instant and imperious, that we shall stand free, so far as we may, toward the bondage of the letter which killeth, and cleave to the spirit which giveth life, and so make good in both the words of the Master, that we shall worship the Father in the spirit and in truth, for he seeketh such to worship him.

For we may well be glad for the greater heart and wider vision in so many who differ from us in doctrine or dogma, so wonderful to me and so welcome, as I look backward through the fifty-two years, all told, since I began to say some word from a pulpit, and forty-two since I was taken into this brotherhood, a man then without a church or fellowship.

And I do not remember when this thought—no, I will say this conviction—has come home to me quite so sweetly as when our dear Father Furness touched some memories of what he had lived to witness, as we sat together in the week before he was translated so that he should not see death. It was just a song of thanksgiving that he should have lived to see so great a change in the spirit of the brotherhood toward himself in the seventy-two years of his ministry.

He told me, among many things, of a Sunday morning not long after he was installed, when, on his way to his small chapel, he met the most eminent doctor in the town of the old divinity, who was also on his way to his own church. They were both in their official gowns and bands, as was the custom then; and the young heretic, as they met, made his best bow, and said, "Good morning, Sir." But there was no answer. The old gentleman glared at him in silence, and marched right on in a vast disdain; while I may say, what my dear father in the faith did not say, that there was no minister in the great sister city who would not have been glad to clasp his hand and greet him as we went home from the church on the Sunday morning, and no man more surely than the Bishop of the old Catholic Church.

May I mention also my own welcome three years ago in the summer in my mother land, and in the church, which could find no room for me over forty years ago because I could not say her Shibboleth?

I have always loved the old mother, and have never seen the day when I wanted to follow the example of the woman in Brighton, over the sea, who, after hearing a sermon against the Quakers, broke the windows of their meeting-house with her Bible as she went home. I love the old mother, and suspect I should not be here this morning but for her nursing. Yet in all the years when I have visited my old home, seven times all told, until that summer, her doors were closed against me, or, rather, the entrance to her pulpits, because I could not say her Shibboleth.

Well, there were three Methodist churches in which I would have loved best of all to be heard—the church where I tried to preach the first time, that in which I preached for the last time before I came away, and the small chapel in the hamlet where I was raised, where my folk are still held in remembrance. I told no soul over there of my longing, and I could not beg such a boon; but you may imagine my delight when they invited me most warmly to preach in each of those churches, and would not hear me when, like a maiden when her lover proposes, I fought a little shy, while I meant of course to accept, and raised the objection that I was a Unitarian. They whistled my objections down the wind. In so far as I was concerned, they had buried Shibboleth and Sibboleth together in a level grave So I said, "All right," and preached for them. Nor could I have found a warmer welcome in Boston or Chicago, and that exhausts my comparisons.

I was also the guest of the minister who had the charge of the district—a very noble preacher. I heard him twice, and told him I could only object to one word he said. It was God behind humanity, but I would have said God within humanity; and he answered, "Yours is the better statement, and I will adopt it for mine." We communed together on those three days like own brothers; and I remembered what Eliot, the apostle to the Indians, said when the priest from Canada was his guest through one winter, that it was delightful to find how much truth of God they held in common.

2. And these are instances of the truth I would touch—that Shibboleth and Sibboleth are by no means what they were, within my memory, as within the memory also of my dear old father in this faith. The cleavage is closing slowly, but surely, as this great century opens. Yet I know, as you know, that Shibboleth and Sibboleth still have the power to work a great deal of mischief, while I love to believe that the spirit is slowly winning its way against the letter, and the essence against the accent.

A wise man says, "The division between the sects in religion would never be so wide, were it not for the mistake that God is better pleased with our opinions than our practices"; and, when some one told Wesley that his nephew and namesake had changed his religion and become a Romanist, he answered, "No, he has only changed his opinions, because religion lies in the heart and life devoted to the service of God, and the mind that was in Christ Jesus, enabling us to walk as he walked."

May I say again that, when I bring Shibboleth and Sibboleth home to my own heart and life, I find no way open to me if I would be a man, let alone a Christian man, but just to say with the great apostle, "By one spirit we are all baptised into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free"? For I have to remember that my dear old mother was a Baptist. She could not belong anywhere else, to save her soul alive; and the church she loved was not a prison to her fine sunny heart, but a home. I was baptised into the Episcopal Church, and so she has a lien on me I cannot and will not deny. I was standing by the old fane on my last visit, and saw my father and mother come with me to the font, through the mists of the seventy-four years; and I am not going back on my baptism. I tell our good Bishop Potter I am a birthright member there, and he cannot help himself; and he says he would not if he could.

I was taught in an old-fashioned orthodox Sunday-school through some ten years: it was the only divinity school I ever had the opportunity to attend; and I cannot measure the worth of that teaching in the ministry you know of. I was a Methodist through eleven years; and she was my nursing mother, as I have said, and nursed we well. She took to spanking me when I would not say her Shibboleth, and small blame to her, as the question stood then; but she was my nursing mother all the same, and in those things I must steer by the heart, not by the head.

Some of my kith and kin are in the Episcopal Church, my brother's family in France go to the old Huguenot church, while dear friends in our Greater New York and in this land far and wide are in all the communions you can easily name; and so I cannot say I am all right, while they are all wrong, or walk into any kingdom of heaven here or hereafter, and claim a front seat, while they must take a back seat somewhere near the door. I love to remember what my dear old mother said when she heard me preach the first time in our great Unitarian church in Leeds, thirty-seven years ago. She sat there, very proud of her son; but, as we walked home arm-in-arm, she said, "My lad, I am not sure that I understood thy sermon, and, if I had understood thee, maybe I could not believe the doctrine." But then she gave my arm a sweet pressure, and said, "Be sure, all the same, I believe in thee, my lad." And I said, "Mother, that is enough for me to know that you believe in me."

All those years ago I believed very much as they do now in the old fellowship. I believed then in the Trinity. I believe now in the unity of God. I believed then in the equality of Jesus with the Father. I believe now in his identity with the Father, so far as our human nature can be one with the divine. I think I always believed that more would find their way into the blessed life than they were quite ready to admit by the standards, and I never had the heart to preach to any purpose about the everlasting burning in hell; while I believe now, that every soul God has sent or will send into this world will find its way home at last, and be at rest.

Now I did not try to believe these heresies, as some call them, any more than I tried to grow to my stature and my manhood. The trying, indeed, for some years was all the other way. I would fain have stayed in the old nest, for that seemed the safest; and I could not imagine what would befall me if I should push out and leave it. It was all of no use. These ideas would haunt me and master me, so that I found I must accept them or have no peace; and, being already a preacher in some sort, I must make a clean breast of it to those who would hear me, or I could have no honour and no self-respect.

So, I think, our beliefs are far less a matter of what we call free will than we usually imagine; while, if we are sincere n regard to the truth we hold, there is no room for Shibboleth and Sibboleth. And as oaks grow best alone, while vines need a standard, and some flowers like a day three-quarters shadow, while others want all the sunshine heaven can pour on them; and as all the fruits are better than any on of them, and all the herbs in the garden are each good in their way; and some love the Rembrandts best, with their strong lights and deep shadows, and some the Raphaels, with their floods of glory and their hosts of angels, while no great gallery can be complete if you leave out these diverse schools—so I have thought that any church which can include these diversities of belief must be the more God-like and Christ-like than those who would leave them out by the standard of the Shibboleth or Sibboleth, and then breed in and in, like those fowls in Hawthorne's "House of the Seven Gables" that were so careful of their Shibboleth and the pureness of their breed that at length there were only two of them left, and these could do nothing but croak.

Does my brother believe, then, that only the elect shall be saved, and say with Davie Deans in the story that there are only two who hold the pure doctrine, Johnny Dods of Gooseacre and anither he will not name, and does he want me to fellowship with him on these terms, I will give him the right hand, and try to enlarge and readjust all the terms of his faith both in God and man. Does he say, "I am atheist: now will you fellowship with me?" I will answer: "That must be at your own option. I will give you my hand and my heart, and will try to make you believe as I do, that by one spirit we are all baptised into one body, who are sincere seekers after the truth, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free. And then if, after all, you live and die an atheist, if you have been helpful and sincere and true to your own self, your own soul, then I will touch your cold dust tenderly, if you are taken while I am left, and say: 'This man was true to himself, to me and mine, and to the truth, so far as he could find it. Let us thank God for such a man.'"

I know of no limits to the fellowship of such a church as I hold in my heart for the ideal church of the living God; and I well remember, when I said some such word as this, and some one said, "Would you have taken Jim Fisk, then, into your church? who had been shot not long before. "Yes," I answered, "I would, only he must steal no more railroads; and, If you stay in here, I would say, you must make good what you have stolen. You are a frank and strong sinner: we will help you to be a frank and strong saint, please God. It is a straight gate: I cannot help that, and so you must unload; and, then, we will not be overtroubled because you are a saint in the rough, for the Most High needs rough saints to do his work in this world as well as fine ones." Such are the terms of fellowship in the Church of the living God; and we have to say again with the apostle, "We are debtors both to the Greeks and the Barbarians, both to the wise and the unwise," while I venture to emphasise these terms, as they stand clear of our Shibboleths between faith and the doctrine, or the dogma. Because I say the one is of the letter, while the other is of the spirit, the one is the coal, while the other is the fire, the one is the fountain, and the other is but the cistern, one is the garden into which I gather all I love best, and the other what is best in all the gardens of God's world. Doctrines, dogmas, usages, ordinances—these are of the seen and temporal, while faith is forever of the unseen and eternal. While we hold this by faith to be true, and teach to all who will hear us that the revelations of His truth from God to man are perpetual and perennial, and are not confined to one book, one nation, or one time, any more than the sunlight of heaven is so confined; that God is one and perfect, never doing and then undoing, resolving and then taking back, or investing and then losing. We say, with the greatest German since Luther, that the best word faith can teach us is this: There is one God and Father of us all, who is not to be worshipped primarily through any symbol or sacrament or saint, but in the spirit and in truth; and this is the truth we are set to maintain against all the Shibboleths, including our own. Evelyn says, "Being in Amsterdam in 1643, I went into the great steeple to hear the bells, but, being so close to the hammers, I could hear nothing save a babel of sound; but on a day thereafter I went into the country on a still morning, when the bells in the great steeple began to ring again, falling into fine sequences and harmonies."

So we have been in the heart of the clash and clamor; but, when I remember the old time and the new, the signs and tokens of peace and goodwill growing ever sweeter and more generous, I cannot but believe that the time draws near when there may be a conference, a convention of the churches, where they will compel us to come in, that the house may be filled, and we shall say or sing some noble psalm, of which this will be the burden :—

The accent is nothing,
The essence is all ;
By the spirit we rise,
By the letter we fall ;
And no room can be found
In life or death
For Shibboleth and Sibboleth.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

THE MIDLANDS.

IN my Midland Letter of a year ago I referred to the Priestley riot of 1791, and hinted that another riot was needed to draw us together and rouse us to greater activity. I little dreamt that only eleven months afterwards Birmingham would again be the scene of a riot which recalled in many of its aspects that of 1791. After the autumn of 1900, a lull took place in the general excitement in this country, caused by the South African War. But this was only for a time, and for some months past it has been difficult, if not impossible, for speakers to get a hearing at a public meeting, if they were known to be in favour of the unpopular side, that is of conciliation and negotiation as opposed to "fight to a finish" and unconditional surrender. A meeting had been called in Birmingham by the Liberal Association to hear an M.P. who had been prominent on the unpopular side, and the upholders of the popular view, encouraged by articles in the local Press, were determined he should not be heard. A wild tumult of unearthly sounds and an organised attempt to take possession of the platform inside the hall, and a disgraceful riot outside the hall, had the desired effect. The speakers and those who had seats on the platform had to wait some time before it was considered safe to leave the building, most of the windows of which had been broken.

The opposite views taken by members of the same political party, of the same political association, of the same club, of the same church, of the same family, and even of the same household on this war have been the cause of much bitterness of feeling, which has increased the difficulty of anything like calm discussion of the matter. It was a courageous act, therefore, on the part of the minister of the Church of the Messiah, alone among all the ministers of the city, to preach to his congregation in defence of the freedom of speech, with special reference to the riot of eleven days before, and seeing that he strongly disagreed with the views held by the promoters of the meeting on the war question he was free from any possible bias in their favour. (See INQUIRER of Jan. 4, p. 2.) The riot of last month was political in its origin and, unlike that of 1791, was not aimed at any religious sect.

Turning now to the Midland district generally, a considerable number of our chapels are without ministers, and the cry is for good and true men to take up the work laid down by those who have gone to other places or retired from work. The vacant pulpits are at Banbury, Stourbridge, and Walsall. West Bromwich and Dudley will also be shortly vacant. For the pulpits at Atherstone and Tamworth, which are held together, a minister has now been chosen; and Small Heath, which was vacant for some months, has now a temporary minister. It is hoped that before the year closes all the vacancies will be supplied. The old meeting house at Alcester was sold by auction last summer. It was stripped of its old oak pulpit, pews, and other fittings, and these were sold separately at good prices. The income from the endowments now goes to the congregation at Evesham. This is the final chapter in the history of one of our oldest places of worship in this district.

Some excellent photographs of the interior of the building were made before the old oak was removed, showing the old galleries and pews, &c., with the quaint device for folding the backs of the seats near the Communion-table so as to form long narrow tables. The marble tablet to the Rev. Joseph Porter, with a long Latin inscription, was removed to the vestry behind the meeting-house at Evesham, where it now is.

I understand that the sale was protested against some months before it took place, on the ground that it is not right to part with any property in land or buildings unless it is for the benefit of the trust connected with the place in which such property is situated. In the case of Alcester every effort had been made to keep the congregation together for a period of several years, but the interest gradually died out, hardly anyone was left at the end, and the Charity Commissioners gave their consent to the steps that were taken. In cases of this kind it seems to me that the money may be used to much greater advantage in supplementing the needs of an active and useful religious community already well established, or in breaking new ground in a populous place, than in the vain hope of keeping aglow the last dying embers of a cause where no fresh life is to be looked for.

Since my last letter Wolverhampton has elected the Rev. J. B. Higham as its minister, and his congregation are now busy settling plans for a new church to be built close to the iron schoolroom which at present answers the purposes of church and school. The new building is to be a temporary structure, light in appearance, and capable of seating two or three hundred persons. Part of the money will be lent by the Midland Christian Union, and part will come from the sale of the old chapel in Snow Hill.

The autumnal meeting of the Union was held in the iron schoolroom last autumn under the presidency of Mr. Herbert New. As only a brief report appeared at the time in THE INQUIRER, I may add that the meeting was full of interest, though the attendance was small. We were reminded that it was exactly 200 years since services were first held in the Meeting House in John-street, the origin of the Unitarian movement in Wolverhampton. The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor (Hackney) read a carefully prepared paper on "The Higher Obligations of the Pulpit to the Pew," which formed the subject of some interesting speeches. The company were entertained to tea in the Co-operative Hall, after which a service was held in the same hall, and a sermon delivered by the Rev. Dr. Klein to a small congregation. At present it is a day of small things at Wolverhampton, but with the building of the new church and bringing it into use for worship, it is hoped that the congregation may gather strength.

After being vacant for several months, the office of President of the Union is, I hear, shortly to be filled. A new treasurer has already been selected. With new blood thus instilled into the executive, fresh energy and life should be thrown into the work of the Union which has considerable responsibilities on its shoulders, waiting to be discharged, to say nothing of the necessity, the never-ending necessity, for more money. I am hoping for great things from the new appointments, and that the Union may practically make a fresh start from the date of the annual meeting which falls due in March.

Turning over some old letters a few weeks ago, I came upon one written from Boston, U.S.A. (or New England as the writer called it), in July, 1852, by a former inhabitant of a Midland town, a layman, inclined to Unitarianism. He writes :—

We are having morning prayer-meetings in Unitarian vestries in Boston daily at 8 A.M. All denominations free to join. At the last, one rose declaring his position to be that of a Trinitarian clergyman, a visitor to Boston, who hearing of these meetings came in, learning too that they were open to all as hearers or as leaders. He candidly admitted the debt due from him to Unitarians and especially to Dr. Channing in his earlier days. Mem. all are "clergy" here, and all places of worship "churches," having no supreme sect as you have.

These meetings have been continued since early in May when Boston May meetings occur. We join in brief prayers from those who feel "the unction of the Spirit" urging them to this, while others of us speak to one another upon the wide basis of unsectional and catholic truth. . . . My utterances here have induced strangers to take me by the hand there and then. Thus, on Sunday next, I am to supply a Baptist Trinitarian (Arminian) pulpit at request of the pastor, whose acquaintance was made as above. Last Sunday evening I addressed his pupils and teachers at his Sunday-school under his church at the North end of the city. I believe that during his vacation of some weeks I shall be his locum tenens there. Dr. Gannett has spoken very christianly and judiciously in our "Daily Service" this morning. He's a fine specimen of Christian warmth and humility, always extemporaneous, and much looked up to by all.

This letter is interesting, as showing that fifty years ago in America there was greater friendliness among the religious sects than there is now in this country in the enlightened twentieth century.

Among religious agencies in this district I should think our three Birmingham Domestic Missions are doing as much good as any. Especially at Christmas-time are the lives of the less fortunate of our brethren made bright and happy by social gatherings of all kinds. I hear that the attendances at these festivities at Hurst-street have been larger this Christmas than before, also that the chapel is filled with people at the three services held there every Sunday. The other two missions, guided by thoroughly earnest and competent ministers, are doing an inestimable amount of good in the city. In Fazeley-street Chapel a marble tablet has recently been placed on the wall in memory of Miss Sarah Russell, a member of a family who have always taken the deepest interest in the welfare of this mission and who still continue to do so. Miss Russell was superintendent of the girls' school for many years, when the mission was in Lawrence-street, and, in the words of the tablet, "with a rare devotion gave herself to the benevolent work of the mission." What nobler work can any of us do? H.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Acton.—A very encouraging start was made here on Sunday last, when the first of the series of services, arranged by the London and South-Eastern Provincial Assembly, was held in the Central Auction Room. The Rev. W. C. Bowie gave an interesting address on "The Message of Unitarianism." About fifty persons were present, some being friends residing in Acton and Ealing, but mostly strangers. The room where the services are being held is in the centre of the town, only a few doors off the High-street. Electric trams from Shepherd's Bush, Ealing, Hanwell, and Southall, stop at Church-road, which is only a minute's walk from the room, and it is only five minutes' walk to the Acton Station, North London Railway. Any persons willing to assist in the musical part of the services will be heartily welcomed.

Blackpool: Banks-street.—The annual congregational meeting was held on Thursday evening. It was well attended, and was one of the most successful and encouraging in the history of the church. The reports from the various departments were, without exception, highly satisfactory. The balance-sheet showed that not only had the deficit of the preceding year been paid, but there was now a larger balance in hand than the church has ever had. The Secretary reported an increase in the membership from forty-two in the previous year to eighty-four, and stated the probability of a yet further increase in the present year. The Committee, under the improved condition of things, had been able to effect many changes and improvements, and had also been able to largely increase the salary of the minister, the Rev. D. Davis, whose labours, with those of his family, in connection with the various institutions of the church, were highly appreciated, and had met with encouraging response. The report of the Ladies' Sewing Society, presented by Mrs. Davis, showed that a sewing-machine had been purchased, and from the proceeds of Sales of Work sums had been granted to the Sunday-school, the Dramatic Society, and £58 to the church funds, whilst cash and goods equal to about £20 remained in hand. The congregation now have convenient schools for their various meetings, and the graceful little church has been beautifully painted and decorated, and is in a most attractive condition. They look forward to a large number of visitors in the coming season, and hope by their aid to make yet further progress.

Birmingham: Small Heath.—The fifth annual meeting of the Waverley Social and Literary Circle was held on Tuesday last. The retiring President, Mr. W. Grainger, in moving the adoption of the annual report, congratulated the members on the Society's flourishing condition. In his valedictory address, Mr. Grainger touchingly referred to the loss the Circle had sustained in the removal to better positions across the seas of two of its most valued members—Mr. Joseph Kertland, who has gone to Philadelphia, and Mr. Ernest Glover, who has accepted a Government post at Cape Town. He also reviewed at length the good work performed by the Society during the five years of its existence, and spoke hopefully of the future.

Bridgwater.—The first meeting of the second half of the Winter Session of the Christ Church Congregational and Social Union was held on Friday evening, Jan. 24, in the Friends' Meeting House (by the kindness of the Society of Friends), when a very interesting lecture, illustrated by lantern views, was given by the Rev. J. Harwood, B.A., of London, on "A Visit to India." The chair was taken by the Mayor (Mr. T. W. Manchif), who spoke of the present-day demand for the extension of the Empire, and of the necessity that we should all become acquainted with those distant parts of our dominions.

Burton-on-Trent.—A New Year's tea and concert, in connection with the Free Christian Church, took place on the 15th inst., and were both very successful, the usual meeting-room at the Town Hall being completely filled. The minister-in-charge, the Rev. Dr. Griffiths, of Ilkeston, and the Rev. J. Birks, of Derby, were present. The thanks of the committee are especially given to the band, under Mr. E. R. Ives, and to the Rev. J. Birks and friends from Derby, for generous help at both tea and concert. As the members gave and lent everything possible, a substantial profit has been made, which will considerably lighten the debt on the church.

Chester.—The annual Sunday-school tea and prize giving at Matthew Henry's Chapel took place on Wednesday week. After tea and a miscellaneous entertainment by the children, teachers, and a few friends, the chair was taken by Mr. F. H. Illingworth, and the report having been read by Mr. A. Orrett, the prizes were distributed by Mrs. Illingworth.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The third meeting of the session was held at Stratford on Jan. 25. About twenty-five were present. A very helpful paper was given by the Rev. F. Allen on "The Place of Amusement in the Sunday School," and was followed by a discussion, in which the Rev. W. G. Cadman and others took part. During the evening songs were given by Mrs. S. H. Clements, and a violin solo by Mr. W. Waddington, which were much appreciated.

Exeter.—Last Saturday the children of the George's Meeting Sunday-school had a tea-party, which was greatly enjoyed. In the course of the evening a presentation of two handsome volumes was made to Miss Stewart, who has recently removed from Exeter to Crediton, in acknowledgment of her services to the school, and with good wishes. The presentation was made on behalf of the school by the Rev. J. M. Connell.

Gateshead.—On Sunday evening there was a crowded congregation at Unity Church, when there was an interesting departure from the regular form of service; indeed, it was practically a lantern service. Hymns and portraits of their authors were thrown upon the screen, and the Scripture reading was also illustrated. In place of the usual sermon, the Rev. Arthur Harvie gave an illustrated address, entitled "Jesus: as Hoffman knew Him."

Hale.—On Monday, Jan. 27, the annual congregational meeting was held in the schoolrooms. A large gathering, consisting of adult members of the congregation and parents of Sunday scholars, sat down to tea, kindly provided by Mr. and Mrs. Frank Dunkerley. After the tea the annual business meeting was held, when encouraging reports were given, and officers and committee elected for the ensuing year. Miss Valentine was re-elected treasurer, and Mr. A. Nicholson was appointed hon. secretary in the room of Mr. R. H. Wolff, who, to the sincere regret of his Hale friends, is removing for a time to London. The business meeting closed with a vote of thanks to the Rev. T. Robinson, the minister, for presiding. The members and parents of scholars then assembled in the large schoolroom to enjoy a dramatic performance, entitled Bubbles, given by a party of friends from Bowdon. Altogether these meetings were of a very cheerful and encouraging nature. During the winter the meetings in connection with the Band of Hope (junior and senior) have been held weekly, and the attendances have frequently exceeded any before. The classes meeting on week evenings have also flourished, Mr. Wolff's drawing class and Miss Simpson's sewing class having met regularly. The Sunday-school register shows an increase in the number of scholars in the school, and the minister's men's class has been very regularly and well attended. During the past year some great improvements have been made in the chapel by removing a stained-glass window to a better position, and by the reglazing of the whole chapel with tinted-leaded glass. The expenses involved in this have been largely met by special subscriptions and by very large collections made at the Harvest Thanksgivings. The choir, which meets for practice very regularly, has done good work under the training of the organist, Mr. J. Mossop.

Huddersfield.—On Wednesday, Jan. 22, Mr. John Harwood gave his recital of Dickens's "Christmas Carol" to the members of the Fitzwilliam-street Church and School Guild and their friends. There was a very good audience, and, needless to say, the recital was greatly enjoyed.

Kilmarnock.—After a period of nearly four years, during which the congregation of Clerk's-lane Free Christian Church has been without the services of a regular minister, a unanimous call has been given to Mr. A. Irvine Innes, of Glasgow, and has been accepted. "I accept it," Mr. Innes writes to the congregation, "with the most earnest desire to do all that I can for the welfare of the church and the strengthening of the cause of pure and rational religion. The work attracts and stirs me; and I shall give my whole time to it. I undertake it humbly and prayerfully, feeling that on my part there are sure to be shortcomings, but hoping steadily to diminish them, and resolving to aim at the highest in all that I have to do." An induction service is to be held on Monday evening, Feb. 17. Mr. Innes has hitherto occupied a prominent position as journalist in Glasgow, being a leader writer on the North British Daily Mail, the leading Liberal daily paper of the North. For many years he has been connected with St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church, and a few years ago occupied the position of President of the Scottish Unitarian Association. With his proved ability as a preacher and writer, his wide culture, and the enthusiasm for the cause which he brings to the work, Mr. Innes should prove a distinct acquisition to the Unitarian ministry.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—A meeting was held on Thursday evening, Jan. 23, in the Hope-street Church Hall, the President, the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst in the chair, and there were about forty members and teachers present. The Rev. E. W. Lummis (Warrington) gave an admirable address on "Sunday School Pedagogy," in the course of which he said that Sunday-schools were originally started to meet the need of information and instruction of the lower classes, which are now met by the Board Schools; &c. Their purpose now is different, they exist in association with the church, a part of the church for the children, and ought to be in the closest relationship with the church. Each ought to feel an interest in the other, and so they ought to be brought together as much as possible. The discipline ought to be such that the children should feel the influence of the school, and not only of their individual teacher or class, the school always coming first, the class only being a necessary item in that school. Mr. Lummis thought that one of the great difficulties in Sunday-schools was that the scholars were classed according to their age, and not intellectually; the teacher must always bear this in mind, and endeavour to treat his subject accordingly, by giving plenty of illustrative matter to keep the bright scholars' attention, and yet to go slowly for the benefit of the dull ones. A useful discussion followed, in which Mr. Birchall (Warrington), Miss O. M. Rawlins, Mrs. Pearson (Liscard), Mr. F. Robinson, Mr. Thomas, the Rev. H. D. Roberts, the Rev. A. L. Smith, Mr. Zeper, and Mr. Knowles (Warrington) took part. The President proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Lummis for his valuable address, and said that the difficulty in discussing Sunday-schools was the great variety amongst them, both as regards size and organisation. He also spoke of the value of the teachers' personal influence, and said that if as teachers they felt inefficient, they might as friends be invaluable.

London: Kentish Town.—The Rev. A. Farquharson concluded his ministry at Clarence-road Church last Sunday. At the annual meeting of the congregation on the following day, a resolution was passed making warm acknowledgment of the value of Mr. Farquharson's services in the pulpit, his wisdom in council, and genial kindness in social intercourse. Grateful acknowledgment was also made of Mrs. Farquharson's work for the church, and the best wishes of the congregation were added.

Nantwich.—On Jan. 21 and 22 the school children gave their annual entertainment, the room being crowded on both evenings. On Monday last the annual tea and distribution of prizes took place. There are about sixty-five names on the registers: forty-seven of these received prizes for regular attendance (morning and afternoon), ten had not missed once during the year, four had missed once, and two had failed to attend on one Sunday only.

DURING the present term a course of six public lectures is being given in Manchester College, Oxford, by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, M.A., Hibbert Lecturer in Ecclesiastical History, on "The Later Paganism, in relation to Judaism and Christianity." The lectures are to be given on consecutive Thursday afternoons at 5 P.M. The subject of the first lecture on Jan. 30 was "The Foreign Cults in relation to the Old Roman Religion and the Augustan Establishment." During the course the Cults of Mithras, Isis, and Serapis are to be dealt with. Then follows a lecture on "The Higher Gnosis in Paganism," and the concluding lecture on March 6 is on "The Lower Gnosis: Degeneration of Syncretism into Magic."

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AKUREYRI RELIEF FUND.—The following donations have been received towards a Fund to be administered by the Rev. M. Jochumsson, in relief of the sufferers from the disastrous fire at Akureyri on Dec. 19 :—Amount acknowledged last week, £40 9s. 6d.; William Rathbone, £10; the Misses M. C. and C. A. Martineau, £2 2s.; John Harrison, £2 2s.; the Rev. and Mrs. G. Vance Smith, £1 1s.; Dr. Cameron, £1 1s.; Mrs. J. D. Eames, £1; Mrs. Tolmé, £1; the Misses F. and L. Jones, £1; J. Penson, £1; J. Laycock, £1; Mrs. Ashworth, 10s. 6d.; Miss O. M. Rawlins, 10s.; M., 10s.; E. S., 5s.; and L. T. 5s.; total, £63 16s. As we stated last week, there is no mail to Iceland before March 4, and we are anxious then to be able to send at least a clear £100 to Mr. Jochumsson. Further donations will, therefore, be thankfully received, and may be sent to THE INQUIRER Office, or to the Rev. V. D. Davis, 9, Nightingale-square, Balham, S.W.

MINISTERS' SUPERANNUATION FUND.—The acting treasurer (Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, 63, Bishopsgate - street Within, London, E.C.) will be much obliged if all donors who have not already sent their donations would forward them to him at the above address. Receipts shall be sent with as little delay as possible.

AFTER completing the three lectures on William Morris in his Thursday evening course at University College, Mr. Stopford Brooke has announced that he will revert to Robert Browning, and will deal next Thursday with "The Ring and the Book," devoting the concluding lecture on Thursday week to Browning's later poems. Speaking of Morris's narrative poems, Mr. Brooke said that no one since Chaucer, who was his avowed master, had equalled him. In the "Earthly Paradise," it was not Morris's intention to write purely classical poems. The book was a collection of Greek stories mediævalised. That "Jason" was a success, and a good poem of its kind, was proved by the fact that in the long narrative interest did not flag, and people actually read the whole book through. Another course of lectures to be given by Mr. Brooke in Kensington Town Hall is advertised this week.

THE Jowett Lectures at the Passmore Edwards' Settlement, Tavistock-place, W.C., are being given this year by the Rev. W. Addis, M.A., of Manchester College, Oxford, the subject being "The Hebrew Scriptures in the New Testament and in the Christian Church." The course of seven lectures is being given on Friday evening at 8.30, admission free. The first lecture on Jan. 24 was on "Philo as Interpreter of the Old Testament," the second on Jan. 31, on "Christ and the Old Testament." The course is to conclude on March 7 with a lecture on "The Old Testament in the Patristic and Mediæval Church; the Value of the Old Testament To-day." The following note is added to the announcement of the Lectures, which we regret not to have seen earlier, that we might have called attention to the Lectures before the course began :—

There is small need to dwell on the fact that Christianity cannot be understood apart from its relations to the Old Testament, from which, indeed, it claims to be in a great measure derived. It is the object of the above Lectures to exhibit that relation as apprehended at various epochs of the history of the Church. The first lecture will deal with Philo, who, though a Jew, is the great master of an evangelical method which was for many centuries accepted almost without question throughout Christendom. The second lecture is concerned with the attitude of Christ himself to the ancient religion of his people; the third, fourth and fifth with the views on this question held by the New Testament writers. The New Testament era was followed by a time in which the essential difference between Judaism and Christianity was felt so acutely that an attempt, vigorous but unsuccessful, was made to sever Christianity from any connection with the Law or Prophecy. This struggle, far-reaching in its effects, is the subject of the sixth lecture, and the course will conclude with a sketch of Old Testament study in the Patristic and Mediæval Church, and some thoughts on its value for Christians of the present day.

THE February number of the new series of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's Sermons for the Day (Liverpool Booksellers' Company, 70, Lord-street, Liverpool, 1*d.*) consists of a sermon on "The Historic Jesus," preached in Hope-street Church, and an appendix on the article "Gospels" in the "Encyclopædia Biblica." The sermon, referring at the outset to an impression left on some hearers of a recent discussion of Schmiedel's article on the Gospels in the Encyclopædia that there was hardly any authentic history left, presented the subject from a different point of view, and asked what would be the result supposing the whole Gospel record were actually lost to us. And the answer began as follows :—

Availing ourselves of the secular histories which have come down to us and the general researches of scholars, we should find that some seventeen or eighteen hundred years ago there was a break-up of the old classic religions of Greece and Rome, that men had ceased to believe in the Homeric gods, that some were flinging themselves into wild and licentious forms of worship which came to them from the far East, while others were adopting agnostic and atheistic philosophies which had no message for the heart and little appeal for the conscience. And we should find a terrible upheaval of immorality, all classes given over to reckless dissipation in the ruin and destruction of religion. And then, looking a little more closely, we should see appearing above the evil in the midst of this weltering chaos, a religion of quite a new fashion, a religion of meekness and humility and service and love, a religion with a profoundly earnest worship pure as the driven snow, a religion that slowly propagated itself, in spite of scorn and persecution, and slowly pushed up from among slaves and Jews and outcasts to women of noble households, men of weight and substance, even to some in the Cæsar's court; a religion which seemed to change the very souls of men, filling them with unselfishness and love such as none of the nations knew; working its miracles of grace even there in the hot and crimsoned atmosphere of strife and lust and hate, and spreading the name of one, Jesus, from lip to lip and from heart to heart, till it set going the greatest spiritual revolution and reconstruction which the world has ever known.

And then, glancing down the centuries that followed, we should see this religion absorbing all that was progressive in the community of man, setting its seal on all the most civilised nations, becoming interwoven with all human hope and advance and progress; till the very name of it came to stand on the lips and in the hearts of men for all that is good and holy.

And if it is asked, What was the origin of this great movement of new life, the testimony of Paul comes in with overwhelming force, to show that it was in the life of one man, even of Christ. To this, other writers in the New Testament bear witness, and Mr. Armstrong insists that even if we had no Gospel record there would still be for us "a very real and living Jesus, the source and fountain of the brightest and purest spiritual influence that has ever flowed forth in the human race."

His figure would stand forth dominating history, and though we might not be able to trace the detail of his features or to catch his words of life and light as they fell from his lips, we should know him as a mighty Master of men inspired and informed by the very Spirit of God.

At the same time, the Gospels are there, with their priceless treasures, and Mr. Armstrong maintains that they preserve for us far more of the teaching of Jesus, which we may confidently hold to be authentic, that Schmiedel is inclined to admit; and this is the more surely ours, because a reasonable criticism has separated it from much else in the record which cannot be accepted as historical by any sane and reverent understanding.

THE February number of the Mill Hill Pulpit contains a sermon by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, entitled "A Hundred Years Ago. A Lesson of Caution and of Good Cheer," in which we find a good deal more of caution than of good cheer. The caution is a picturesque and very interesting elaboration of the lesson contained in the following record:—

Read this brief summary of events, full of a bitter irony which long histories are apt to conceal.

1792. Assurance from the highest authority of permanent peace.
1793. Outbreak of nine years' war.
1802. Enthusiastic rejoicings for the restoration of peace, both in England and France.
1803. The great war of twelve years commences.

The good cheer begins with a quotation from Ecclesiastes: "In the day of prosperity be of good cheer, and in the day of adversity bethink thee that God has made the one side by side with the other";—and, it is added, that the way is dark only by reason of our defective sight. And the sermon concludes:—

This our only rational assurance—not that this or that will be as we would have it to be, but that all will be as God hath made it; that we too and our tiny lives are parts of the Divine plan, and that that plan is good and for the good of all.

See above us, as we crawl our few days on earth, less by far than the mites on a great cheese, making much ado about nothing and fancying that the clamour of our sighs and shouts resounds afar—see above us the starry heavens, silent, unchanged, looking down on generation after generation, witness unmoved of their sins and sufferings, undisturbed by their theories and prayers. Do they not "declare the glory of God" infinitely exalted above our thoughts? As in heaven so on earth, as with stars so with men does He execute His purpose, in us and by us, and whether we will or no, and the Eternal Law never fails by reason of the infinite failings of men. We plan and purpose and prophecy; and our forecast and contrivances come to nought. His Will is and was and shall be, and all that befalls us is of His ordering. He will not have us know what shall be, lest we be proud or be desperate. He would have us trust that what shall be is His Will: and in the higher order, to the illuminated mind, all is and was and will be well, for that "God is all and in all."

Copies of the monthly issue of the Mill Hill Pulpit are to be had (1d. monthly, or annual subscription 1s. 6d.), from Mr. C. Stainer, 82, Ravenswood-terrace, Hyde Park, Leeds.

A LETTER FROM TRANSYLVANIA.

SIR,—I have just received the accompanying letter from five young Transylvanian Unitarians who met our party at the village of Brev, on our way to Toroczkó last September, and acted as our mounted escort for the remainder of the journey, which lay through most romantic scenery. They were dressed in their beautiful national costumes, and looked the very personification of courage, dignity, and goodness. We all felt that our Transylvanian brethren were much to be congratulated upon having among them young men of such fine spirit and rare promise.

The translator of the letter is Dr. Boros, of whom the members of the party will ever retain grateful reminiscences for his innumerable kindnesses to us during our most delightful tour,—Yours faithfully,

E. CEREDIG JONES.

Bradford, Jan. 22, 1902.

TO THE REV. E. CEREDIG JONES, AND THROUGH HIM TO THE ENGLISH VISITORS OF TOROCZKO.

Kolozsvar, Jan. 12, 1902.

Dearly beloved English Friends,—

The memory of a festive day lives young and fresh in our heart. It was not so long ago, nay, we think it was but yesterday, when the holy pilgrims of a distant land, men and women, zealous for Christian love and charity, came to us as visitors, and left us as beloved friends.

It was but a short moment, and became a long lasting holy day, born of love and blessed by love.

We knew of your Christian charity, because we learnt it early as little children in the arms of our mothers, when as fugitives from the destructive flames of our own homes we had to be taken out under the shelter of the mighty rock of Toroczkó, which history names Székely-kö.

Then homeless and desolate, hardly any bread to eat, we first felt the blessings of your love. Your name lived in our hearts as the name of the figures of a sacred myth, but on that day this love realised tied us to you as if for ever. This day we felt as if we were children of the same mother, bound together with you all.

An inspiration, resistless, moved the daughters of Toroczkó to throw flowers on your way, because thus they could express in the most intelligible manner the inner feeling of the heart which you call Love, and we call Szeretet.

Thanks for the smiles with which you acknowledged your appreciation. Thanks for the silent prayer with which you joined us in our own sacred Temple, for the words which your ministers, man and woman, uttered there. Thanks for the footprints you have left behind in the holy of holies of our hidden small place.

Oh, we pray ye, pardon the frailty of these letters. We fear that instead of the fragrance of flowers and the beauty of the fields, you will find thorns and thistles between them,

Oh, if we could but paint you would see here reproduced a second Palm Sunday, for, indeed, that day for Toroczkó was nothing less than the entrance of the Lord into Jerusalem.*

Thanks for your several greetings; thanks for the "glad affection" of which you kindly assure us, and let us repeat the noble utterance of your poet and servant of God:—

In divers lands we all join hands—
Dear friends are friends for ever.

Let us remain and live in the blessed hope that memory will keep the past in the present, and friendship will urge us to constant work for progress and for good deeds, and thus our friendship, made in the quiet valley of Toroczkó, will join us together wherever we go.

God's blessing be upon you all now and ever.—Yours affectionately,

ALEXIS BUZOGANY,

LONDON AND S.E. COUNTIES PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

SIR,—Will you allow me to make an urgent and earnest appeal on behalf of the church at Stratford. Those who are acquainted with its history know how vigorously and successfully the friends have maintained the various organisations of the church without a settled minister during the last ten years, relying entirely upon their own resources to carry on the work of the Sunday-school and other institutions. Through removals and losses over which they had no control they have been deprived of several of their best workers. The most serious loss is that of the Sunday-school Superintendent, and there is no one to fill the vacant position. The school has about 100 children and is in good order, but, unless help can be obtained at once, I fear the consequences will be disastrous. If some gentleman would volunteer to take the superintendency on Sunday afternoon the difficulty would be overcome. This is an urgent case, which, when known, I feel sure will call forth a quick response.

22, Knollys-road, Streatham,
Feb. 4.

A CONCERT is to be given in Little Portland-street Chapel next Thursday evening by the Penrhyn Choir. Sympathisers with the Penrhyn quarrymen and their suffering wives and children should help to secure a good audience and a good collection. Admission is free, but seats are to be had at prices ranging from 6d. to. 2s. The concert begins at eight. Little Portland-street Chapel, we may say for those who do not know, is three minutes' walk from Oxford-circus Station on the Electric Railway, and eight minutes from the Metropolitan Portland-road Station.

THE registered letter, which we reported last week as lost, was brought back to the office at the end of the week with the whole of its contents.

A MYSTIC SAYING.

BY THE REV. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.

"But the Comforter, even the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I said unto you."—John xiv. 26.

BISHOP BUTLER somewhere remarks that "Religion is nothing if it is not true." Such a statement commends itself, I suppose, to every mind as just and right. But how, one naturally asks, are we to know that it is true? I believe everyone instinctively would be inclined to answer that only by immediate relationship with the divine in the world, the divine truth and love, can we know the truth of religion. However necessary religion at all times has seemed to men, yet so long as it seemed a traditional thing, it never could have a vital reality for them. The thought of God as a cause was necessary as an explanation of the world, and of God as a Father was necessary as an explanation of our existence and providence for it—but somehow God never or rarely became a near, vital presence. He was always strangely a distant Being. Through Christ that sense of distance was greatly lessened, and then, strangely enough, men could only grasp the idea of nearness by supposing that God was incarnate in Christ. But again He became a distant Being even so, though brought a little nearer in the strangely tender humanity of Christ. Christ himself seemed to have a premonition that men would experience a difficulty in realising the presence of the Holy Spirit of God in their very hearts, waiting for them to discover Him, and spoke those great words that he must needs go that the true Comforter might come, that they might have real, immediate knowledge of the Holy Spirit, which would guide them into all truth—much as if a master should say at last to a pupil, "Relying on me you cannot grow to full strength, you will not draw from the same unfailing Fount." But the doctrine of the Incarnation intervened, and the sense of the eternal nearness of the Holy Spirit of God was again largely lost. It seemed as if men could not dispense with supports and props and intermediaries and mediators. It was only here and there amongst people called mystics, that a vivid sense of the truth was felt. Now, it was no doubt while reflecting on what constitutes the essence of true religion that Mr. Richard Legalienne, in his interesting book "The Religion of a Literary Man," was led to write as follows: "Soon may be, we shall need no churches and no service-books; not in Jerusalem, nor in this mountain, shall we worship the Father, but uncere-moniously in spirit and in truth. 'The kingdom of the Father has passed,' said an old mystic (Joachim de Lyra), 'the kingdom of the Son is passing, the kingdom of the Spirit is to come.' As we look around us and see side by side a growing disregard of the old externals of religion with an increasingly passionate care for its informing essence, may we not hope that the era of the spirit is at hand?"

The thought and the mystic saying seem worth pondering over. The very audacity of its expression seems quite warranted by the language of Jesus himself. If he could but lead men to the immediate sense of the presence of God as a Father, his mission, his object was accomplished. They would never be saved, they would never be truly strengthened and comforted, till they stood free of all props, substitutes, mediatorships, and realising the relationship of spiritual children to a Holy Spirit, no longer offer ceremony as the means of access and communion with that Spirit: as true children they would no longer—if we may use the expression reverently—stand on ceremony. When these words are genuinely uttered, does it not mean that we are to feel ourselves at home? Think, then, how long ceremony has stood in the way of our feeling at home, how it has in some sense brought us, it is true, to God as our Dwelling Place in all generations, our House so to speak, but not to God as our Home.

Mutual love and truth, the assured sense of mutual sincerity, is the true ceremony of home. Where there is spiritual worth, moral grace, even with little intellectual power and ability, there needs not overmuch ceremony and etiquette. Worship, it is true, traditionally, seems naturally to imply almost that some kind of ceremony is needed before you can let your sense of some one's worth be expressed. And so long as God was thought of as King and Judge worship tended to be a magnified and magnificent copy of human ceremony as performed in the presence of kings and judges. But as the thought of God as a Father absorbed all else in the mind of Christ, so, too, all former type of worship as gorgeous ceremony was absorbed in that true worship manifested in a closer fellowship in spirit and in truth, in that heartfelt reverence and love that makes of the human soul a resplendent temple, in aspiration lofty, in conscience clear as crystal, radiant with the light of all filial graces, as of spiritual jewels and gems. Stand no longer on ceremony, the Father seems to be saying to the children, and at once the kinship in spirit and in truth is revealed as the true worship involving that reality of service which forms a sweet, new kind of ever-living ceremony; no longer is it so much a matter of set times and set forms, it is not a matter of in this mountain nor yet in Jerusalem, no, it is now a momentary thoughtfulness and momentary desire to do service that springs from love and love alone, that ceremony therefore that is begotten of a sense of divine nearness as the older kind was begotten of a sense of divine distance as became, so to speak, those who had to keep their distance.

Religion is nothing if it is not true: and Religion is the soul's home life among divine things, scenes, thoughts, beings. Our mundane home is only sweet when it is true, so it is with Religion. Its truth is dependent on the closer and closer approach to that harmony which only reveals itself, reveals of what nature it is, when we have reached it, even as we only know the note on a stringed instrument as right and pure when we have reached it. There is something very like a parable of our immediate relation to the Holy Spirit in this process of tuning a stringed instrument. Even a poor string on a poor instrument may be raised to the right tone (rightly attuned), but who shall say how sweet and lovely that tone is in the nature of things when even the best of strings and best of wood is far from being a perfect medium to convey it to our ears. How strange is that inaudible note, that divine silent music of the spheres unto which we must attune our rude strings, that note which we only know when we have found it, after straining and trying for it. So is it with us in the spiritual life. "Horribly imperfect" as we are (as John Addington Symonds expresses it), we may yet raise the tone of our mind and heart to that still small voice, so curiously inaudible, and waiting till we are rightly tuned, and then rings out clear and mellow, and ever the clearer, sweeter, mellower as the instrument becomes more perfected to reveal it. Is there a single thing we can think of that jars and irritates or bewilders us that could have failed to have been set right if we had avoided the excess and defect, and waited and listened to catch the sweetness of the "still small voice," that would have thrilled us like a fine vibration through a violin, and thence have suffused the whole air and atmosphere about us with music? "Horribly imperfect" as we are, we are yet instruments sensitive enough, quickly run down, and feeling everything at times jarring and out of tune; and even after a season of pure joyfulness, like a violin that has played through some glorious movement, standing even then, when nearest to the right tone, in need of a delicate yet severe strain to keep us still in touch with the perfect note of harmony. If we would live free from jar and fret we must each moment keep our ear intent on that criterion of the Holy Spirit, on that music of the spheres, on that one (perfect) "accent," as Emerson calls it, of the Holy Ghost, which a heedless world is so apt to lose. Yet our very discords and harshnesses reveal at once the great truth that there is a Holy Spirit, a perfect spirit of concord and sweetness, and are themselves (these discords and harshnesses) our best guides to find the source of harmony; and when we have made ready the instrument, there flows through the soul the Holy Spirit like a fertilising stream.

That is a quaint story in the "Gesta Romanorum," attributed to Pliny, "which tells of a land in which neither dew nor rain falls. Consequently there is a general aridness; but in this country there is a single fountain, from which, when people would draw water, they are accustomed to approach with all kinds of musical instruments, and so march around it for a length of time. The melody which they thus produce causes the water to rise to the mouth of the spring, and makes it flow in great abundance, so that all men are able to obtain as much as they will." "My beloved," said the old monks, "the arid land is man; the fountain, God; the musical instruments, devotional exercises." It is surely a pretty true image of most of our lives. If we feel not the Holy Spirit as dew and rain, we are apt to go about saying, like those disciples mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, that we did not so much as know that there is a Holy Spirit. But so soon as we tune—or life helps us through strain and struggle to tune—our minds, hearts and wills to the Divine music that is for ever present, then to the sound of that music flows forth the water of life, and our soul like a wilderness and solitary place is glad, and that desert rejoices, and blossoms as the rose.

So much, then, in regard to our individual attitude and relationship to the ever-present Holy Spirit. What is our attitude as a church or a community to this coming era of the kingdom of the Spirit? If there is a growing disregard for the externals of religion, is there an increasingly passionate care for the informing essence of religion? How do we stand? Wherein are we different from other religious bodies? Have we not said that there is only one true standard of worship, in spirit and in truth, and that each one for himself must strive to come into real communion with the Holy Spirit, otherwise religion is not true? It is as if we had said, if we are to beat our music out, if we are to get to the heart of things, and know the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God, we must learn how to tune our instruments ourselves, right from the beginning, we must endure all the discord and irritation of such a resolve and such a process, rather than have the instrument tuned by another hand, however willing and skilled. Nay, we have doubted whether the Great Master would ever commend such a substitution, such a vicarious service. By all means let us watch how the Great Master does it; let us be grateful and reverent, but let us take our own lives (as it were) in our own hands and learn to attune them. "Let us search and try our ways and turn again to the Lord" alone, "Let us lift up our heart with our hands unto God" alone "in the Heavens." Is this disrespect for the Master? There are people foolish enough to say so. On the other hand it is sometimes said, if our ideals were true we ought to be the leading Church in Christendom in numbers and in character. It is really a strange argument. If we are true to our principles, we are likely to find our progress very slow indeed. If we are really trying conscientiously the great experiment of having no mediator between God and man, if we are struggling to find the right note, and to hear for ourselves that one (perfect) "accent" of the Holy Ghost, we shall be like all people learning anything from the beginning, considerably tried, discouraged and irritated by our unavailing attempts to tune our instruments aright. There is such a thing as divine discontent caused by a keen perception of the distance between our achievement and the goal to be achieved. I think you will oftener hear amongst Unitarians than elsewhere the remark that it is impossible to love your enemies. Is it because they do not believe it spiritually possible, or because of its practical difficulty? Surely only because of its practical difficulty. It is not your schoolboy who despairs of being a Newton, but it is some one who has struggled severely after him in vain. He may say it is impossible to achieve what he achieved, and at the very time be very near him indeed. The nearer the second in a race is to the first the more hopeless does the goal seem. One thing we stand for, and it is this (and it indicates an approach to that one pure "accent" of the Holy Ghost) that you cannot be saved by words, by mediatorships, but only by deeds. The very harshness and dissonance (coldness as some call it) which people discover in our community, may separate us by a mere hair's breadth from the true harmony towards which as a community we are striving. It is the note nearest to the true note that jars the most, as it is the darkest hour before the dawn. It is said sometimes we stand for character, yet for all that, they say, we are not a religiously pleasant people. Yes, and a phrase once got about that we were a people who had no God (or one God) and no devil, but paid twenty shillings to the pound. Well, how can anyone be faithful even in money matters, if he has not strained his chords nearly up to the right pitch. Yet there is something jarring about that phrase, as if such a character lacked the mellowing touch. Just a little more, a turn a two more (and who shall say how near he is to it), and might he not find that he was in perfect tune at last with the music of the multitude of the Heavenly Host praising God, and saying, "Peace on earth, goodwill amongst men." And paying debts honestly—which, after all, means ethical clearness and exactness, if not religious depth—is a vast stride towards peace on earth and goodwill amongst men.

The truest word ever spoken, surely, was that which said that we must work out our own salvation with fear and trembling: which is exactly the kind of thing you do, the nearer you approach to any salvation worthy the name. You fear and you tremble, like Sir Isaac Newton when he saw the goal, and was too disturbed (partly with joy and partly with fear) to be able to do even a schoolboy's calculation. So much depends upon doing things right that for a long time one hesitates to do anything at all. For mistakes in religion grow more harmful with the ages. We, for example, as a community, have no organisation: no, we are biding our time, resolved that it is infinitely wiser to have none than to have any that shall repeat even in a thousandth part the mischief of Church organisations in the past. We are individually a little cold and reserved. Well, better a thousand times warm slowly into friendship and into love that holds and helps, than boil over in a revivalist fever in haste, only to repent at leisure, and acquire the character of vacillation and instability. No, religion is nothing if it is not true. Think, then, what a course that people and that Church has to steer, who, while for ever remembering that between children and father there can be no ceremony, but loving service, at the same time can never forget how arduous is the effort needed that must raise the finite mind ever more clearly and harmoniously into the mind of the Holy Spirit with its deeps upon deeps of Grace and Truth—think how difficult that course is to steer: to let religion, and not theology guide; to let the spirit of brotherhood and not the domination of power and ambition and riches rule in our midst, as in all organisations hitherto; to avoid the bigotry of a correct theology, and the self-righteousness of a ceremonious piety; to wait each moment of our lives upon the Holy Spirit to teach us all things—the nobler modes of life, with sweeter manners, purer laws; to avoid the faithlessness to the great principle of Christ that even he must not intervene between us and our real teacher, the Holy Spirit, and yet avoid the dread that when all props and go-betweens have gone, we may fail to be strong, and fail to go straight to the Fountain Head, or fail to learn worthily what we there shall hear. Yes, that is the difficult course the coming Church has to steer; that is the momentous Reformation that we have set our hands to. The Kingdom of the Father has passed, the Kingdom of the Son is passing, the Kingdom of the Spirit is to come. We are like fledglings that stretch and wave their wings in their true element, yet dread to launch away. Yet we shall only teach men to know the Father, and save Jesus from the misunderstandings of his avowed friends, by taking wing and living in the Kingdom of the Holy Spirit.

OWEN GLYNDWR.*

Such is the Welsh spelling of the name of the last and most celebrated of the soldier-patriots of Wales, whom as Glendower we know in Shakespeare. Glyndwr is the traditional hero of the majority of Welshmen, though somewhat of a mythical hero. Still enough is known of his great struggle with Henry IV. and the Earls of the Marches, to make him a very interesting character. There appears hitherto to have been no attempt to collect in a book form all that is known of this renowned Welshman and the constant conflicts in which he was engaged, and all who are interested in the Principality, its beautiful scenery, and its sturdy race, with its special characteristics so strongly marked, have reason to be greatly indebted to Mr. Bradley, already well known by his "Highways and Byways of North Wales," for undertaking a work which, strange to say, has been left to a Sassenach. A valuable Introductory Sketch of Welsh history, from the Saxon conquest of England, leads up to Glyndwr's rising, and a concluding chapter continues the sketch to the present time, so that in the absence of larger works this little book gives a tolerably complete outline of the history of the Principality.

The story is a very interesting one, and has many romantic and poetic features. One is inclined almost to wonder that Sir Walter Scott, whose reading was omnivorous, did not select this epoch for one of his romances, with Glyndwr for its hero, instead of the less striking Welsh theme of his "Betrothed." It is interesting to note that Owen Glyndwr was not a mere hero of the battlefield, or avenging patriot, but had many of the gifts of an accomplished statesman. "The educational zeal that does so much honour to modern Wales is fond of pointing to Glyndwr as the original mover in the matter of a Welsh national university which has so recently been brought to a successful issue." Glyndwr's real greatness was his attempt to create out of chaotic disorder a nation with settled institutions and high ideals. In English traditions the prejudices against him soon disappeared, and some of his best qualities as a ruler and national hero are described in Shakespeare's well-known lines in Henry IV.:—

> In faith he is a worthy gentleman,
> Exceedingly well read, and profited
> In strange concealments, valiant as a lion,
> And wondrous affable, and as bountiful
> As mines in India.

The story of Wales, as our author remarks, is one long tale of continuous attempts by Norman barons on the territory of the Welsh princes, varied by the serious invasions of English kings, which were undertaken either directly or indirectly on behalf of their Norman-Welsh vassals. It is a popular error to regard the great Welsh chieftains as in any way inferior to their Norman and English opponents. Glyndwr, at least, was "the equal in breeding and knowledge of the world of the great barons around him—the Greys, Talbots and Charltons, and of sufficient estate to be himself a grand seigneur." We have seen that he desired to establish a national university, and there is no doubt about the esteem and admiration in which he was held by the Welsh, particularly by the Bards, the most cultivated men of their time. We cannot enter into details of the successive battles in which the Welsh hero so long maintained the national independence against all the resources of the valiant Henry V., but there are few readers who will not agree with the author that the failure of Glyndwr's heroic effort was for the advantage in the long run of the Welsh themselves. "The geographical absurdity of complete independence was frankly recognised by almost every Welsh patriot from earliest times. The notion of a suzerain or chief king in London was quite in harmony with the most passionate of Welsh demands."

One passage from this interesting and valuable book we must give in full for the gratification of Welsh, even more than English, readers of THE INQUIRER:—

> Few countries in the world contain within the same area more elements of prosperity and happiness than modern Wales, and fewer still are so fortunately situated for making the most of them. Coal, iron, slate, and other minerals in great abundance are vigorously exported, and give work and good wages to a large portion of the population. In the rural districts a thrifty peasantry are more widely distributed over the soil, to which they are peculiarly attached, than in almost any part of Britain, and occupied for the most part in the more hopeful and less toilsome of the two branches of agriculture—namely, that of stock-breeding. Surrounded on three sides by the sea, there are ready facilities for the trader, the sailer, or the fisherman. The romantic scenery of the country is another valuable asset to its people, and brings an annual and certain income that only one small corner of England can show any parallel to. Education is in an advanced state, while the humbler classes of society have resources due to their taste for music, and their sentiment for their native language, which have no equivalent in English village life.
> It may be added that the Cymri of to-day retain the finest characteristics of their warlike ancestors, under the modified conditions of modern civilisation, and those who have had the good fortune to hear Welsh choral societies with their strains, now weirdly pathetic and now exulting and passionate, can bear witness that the inspiration of the old Bards still lives in their less noted successors.
> It need only be added that the book is adorned with several illustrations of the scenery connected with the history of Glyndwr and of the old castles and manor-houses that abound in Wales from Carnarvon and Conway, Harlech and Ruthin in the north, to Carew and Pembroke, Manorbier and Caerphilly in the south, some of them taken from rare and interesting old prints. THE GUILDS' UNION YEAR BOOK.*

THIS is the "Year Book" promised in Mr. Ellis's article on "The Guild Movement" in our New Year's number, and it should be in the hands of all who are interested in that Movement. It contains the constitution of the Guilds' Union, the object of which is to promote the formation of Guilds, which shall aim at uniting the Young People, together with the various workers of our congregations and schools, into a League of Fellowship to (a) Foster the Religious Life, and (b) Inspire Personal Service. And further, "to promote the efficiency of Guilds as factors in religious work and worship by means of a common manual, literature, meetings, conferences, and other methods which from time to time may be adopted." Then follows a list of twenty-three Guilds and Young People's Societies, which have joined the Union, with particulars as to officers, times of meeting, procedure, &c., and a further list of twelve Guilds and societies, which have not yet joined.

After this come short chapters on "The Guild Idea," "How to Form and Carry on a Guild"—this latter by the Rev. Joseph Wood, who is President of the Union—and "Topics for Guild Meetings," by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, which contains so many helpful suggestions for others beside Guild members, that we take the liberty of reprinting it at the end of this notice. A further list is added of "Topics and References for Devotional Meetings," as issued by the American Young People's Religious Union, and then the second half of the "Year Book" is devoted to thirty-one pages of Devotional Readings, one for each day of the month. There are a few short extracts on each page, chiefly prose, but some verse, and concluding with a Collect. These readings will be found helpful, but we trust that they will lead those who use them, not to a monthly repetition throughout the year, but to the use of Mrs. Tileston's "Daily Strength for Daily Needs," or some other "Daily Strength" book, which contains selections for each day in the year.

TOPICS FOR GUILD MEETINGS.

BY REV. W. H. DRUMMOND, B.A.

THE question is often asked, especially by those who have had little experience in Guild work, what subjects should be discussed at our meetings? The following short paper is meant to contain some hints and suggestions of a practical kind in answer to this question. It will leave one aspect of Guild work entirely out of account. It will say nothing of philanthropy and corporate Christian service. Those are of great importance, but they do not enter into the scope of this paper. The first step is to have a real belief in the mutual advantage of common Bible study, and the frank interchange of thought on religious subjects; the next is to decide that the aim of this common thought shall be always positive and constructive. This latter point is one of great importance. Religious sympathy is quickened among the members of a Guild not by the criticism of our neighbour's opinions or the smart repartee of theological controversy. The mind should be encouraged to come into fresh contact with the divine facts of history and life, and to express itself with frank sincerity in terms of its own experience.

I.

A very useful series of conversations on these lines may be held on the Lord's Prayer. It is a good subject to begin upon, because the ground is familiar. On the first evening the minister may give a short address on prayer and the scope of the Lord's Prayer. This would then be followed on successive evenings by short papers by different members dealing with the prayer clause by clause.

a. The Father in heaven: meaning of the New Testament teaching about the Fatherhood of God.
b. The hallowing of God's name: in thought and desire, in speech, and in action.
c. The coming of the kingdom and the doing of the Divine Will: these two petitions belong together. The personal and social duties involved in all sincere use of this prayer will suggest themselves for special treatment.
d. The prayer for daily bread: our dependence upon God for life and breath and all things.
e. The forgiveness of sins, and the special condition attached that we ourselves must have the forgiving temper.
f. Deliverance from evil: the natural cry of the human heart beset by weakness and temptation.

II.

Another series of topics of great interest may be found in the Church and its Worship.

a. The individual value of public worship.
b. The social value of public worship.
c. Some modern objections to public worship and reasons for its neglect.
d. What can we do to make our worship more hopeful and attractive? This will give opportunity for practical suggestions if there is any slovenliness of management, or want of hearty fellowship and co-operation in the church, or the congregational singing is poor, without volume and warmth. Emphasise the right use of the word attractive. The way to give attraction to a Christian church is not by advertisement and the copying of worldly methods; it must come through the depth and power of its worship and message. It is real life, and not its clever imitation, that draws.

If the interest is still maintained, this topic may be continued for a few evenings longer, in order to consider the special services of the Church.

a. The seasons of the Christian year, their meaning for us, and why we should observe them.
b. Baptism: dwell specially on what it may mean for us as the recognition and dedication of the newly-born, a symbolic incorporation into the spiritual fellowship of all Christian believers.

c. The Communion: here, too, the aim should be to bring out the richness of its meaning, not merely as a venerable Christian tradition, but as a living means of grace for all who in the fellowship of Jesus Christ wish to lead a "dedicated life." Among young people it is well to be careful not to surround the Communion Service with an over-strained solemnity. It is a Eucharist—an act of thanksgiving. It has as much meaning for those who look forward as for those who look backward. It is the symbol not merely of a great memory, but of the strength and life and joy which are ours in Christ to-day.

d. Confirmation: would such a service be helpful in our church life, and if so, what form should it take?

III.

Consecutive Bible study will be found interesting and helpful when Guild meetings are held fairly often. For the time being the Guild may regard itself as a Reading Circle. Some book should be adopted, a certain portion read carefully at home, and then at the meeting questions may be asked about difficulties, and an exposition given by one of the members of the spiritual thought and teaching of the passage. Let it, however, be reading of the Bible itself. There is a good deal of superficial acquaintance with critical theories at the present time, and considerable ignorance of the real text of the sacred writings. The Guild may help its members by cultivating habits of reverent study to recover the religious use of the Bible, which, in many of them, has been probably weakened, if not entirely lost. In this connection the attractive and well-equipped volumes of the Century Bible (price, 2s. each) will be found very useful. St. Matthew, or Dr. Horton's admirable volume on the Pastoral Epistles, may be cordially recommended. Probably every opinion expressed in those books may not win our assent, while some important questions are looked at from a point of view slightly different from that to which some who read this paper are accustomed; but, on the whole, it is a great advantage to have a book which challenges some of our opinions and forces us to think. Attention may be called to the volumes of the Temple Bible which Messrs. Dent have just begun to issue. They have some attractive pictures, and the introductions have been entrusted to competent scholars; but the absence of a commentary makes them less suitable for the purpose in view. The Biblical volumes published by the Sunday School Association must not be forgotten. Many Guild members will know them already in connection with Sunday-school teaching. The present writer is inclined, however, to recommend some volumes of the Century Bible as on the whole the best for the devotional study of Scripture without the undue intrusion of the critical element, which may form such a valuable element in developing the religious life of the Guild.

OBITUARY.

MISS MARY ELLEN MARTINEAU.

MANY friends will hear with sorrow of the death of Miss Mary Ellen Martineau, the eldest surviving daughter of the late Dr. James Martineau, which occurred at midnight on Jan. 31, of pneumonia. Miss Martineau, who with her sisters had been living at 5, Eldon-road, Hampstead, which became their home after Dr. Martineau's death, had been in her accustomed health until a few days ago. On Sunday week she was present as usual at the morning service at Unity Church, Islington, and in the afternoon took her class at the Bell-street Mission. On Monday she was out for a long time busy with some act of friendly helpfulness, but that evening it became evident she was suffering from a severe chill, and the fatal attack of pneumonia quickly supervened. Thus swiftly the summons came to her, as she would have wished, in the midst of her work, with no long disablement or failure of her powers. Her life of sixty-eight years had been faithfully lived, and it is not for her, but for her sisters and brother, and her many friends, that we must mourn.

As we think now of Miss Martineau, it brings back vivid memories of the closing years of her father's life, with the close companionship which was so beautiful to see, the tender care of the daughters for the aged life in that quiet evening time—and the faces of father and daughter appear to us together, so alike, and we remember how his strenuous spirit, his scrupulous fidelity to duty, lived again in her.

Mary Ellen Martineau was born in 1833, the year after her parents settled in Liverpool, her elder brother, Russell, and her sister, the late Mrs. Leyson Lewis, having been born in Dublin. Herbert, the boy who died when he was only eleven, and whose grave is in the burial-ground of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, was born in 1835. The children had lessons at home with their father, and Mary Ellen was ten when the first volume of the "Endeavours After the Christian Life" was published. Five years later came the great experience of the winter in Berlin, and in the following summer a delightful time at Dresden and among the Bavarian Alps. On their return to Liverpool in October, 1849, Hope-street Church was opened, and for eight years more Liverpool was their home. When in 1853 Mrs. Leyson Lewis was married, Miss Martineau became the eldest daughter in the house—that charming house, Park Nook, in Princes Park, which was the centre of so much happiness and of so much eager, strenuous life. Throughout those years Miss Martineau was a devoted teacher in the Hope-street Sunday-school, and afterwards in London it was the same. In the Portland Schools there was no more faithful teacher, and her activity was not confined to the Sunday-school, for in the day-school she conducted a singing-class for some years, and took other part in the work. Indeed, it may be said that teaching was the ruling interest of her life, and she had a strong desire to devote herself to it as a profession. Soon after the removal to London in 1857, when she was twenty-four, she spent about a year in France, at a school at Fontainebleau, to perfect her knowledge of the language, and then joined Miss Buob in her school in Belsize Park. When circumstances led, before many months were out, to the severance of that connection, it was a great disappointment to Miss Martineau; but, henceforth, living at home, she devoted herself to private teaching, and many old pupils, with whom she was always glad in after years to keep in touch, will have grateful memories of her assiduous care and her great kindness, which no strictness of discipline could long conceal.

For more than twenty years she was the head of her father's household, for it was in 1877 that Mrs. Martineau died; and in the summer home at Aviemore in Scotland, no less than in London, the memory of her kindly activities will long remain. To many of the humble folk in the neighbourhood of the Polchar the news of her death will have brought a genuine sorrow, for every summer it was her constant pleasure to visit in the cottages, and especially where there was any trouble or sickness. Of the library in the school-house at Inverdruie she was the founder, giving to its arrangement at the outset unstinted care, and to the last taking a warm interest in it and its readers. There also she had a singing-class.

Music was her constant delight, and this was an added bond to that close affection which from their early years united her to her brother Russell. His death in December, 1898, was a great blow to her, followed little more than a year later by her eldest sister's death; and then only a week after, their father passed away. With quiet faith and a brave and cheerful spirit she pursued her way, diligent in duty to the last; and now she also has been received into that world of light to which the others had gone before her. For those who still remain it is a happy thought, with many tender memories and steadfast hope.

The funeral was on Wednesday, when relatives and a few close friends gathered at 5, Eldon-road for the service, conducted by the Rev. G. Dawes Hicks, of Unity Church, and concluded at the grave in Highgate Cemetery.

MR. G. C. KINGDON.

WE regret to announce the death, on the 31st ult., of Mr. George Canning Kingdon, of Taddyforde, Exeter, in the 74th year of his age. Mr. Kingdon was the last survivor in his generation of an old and highly-respected Exeter family, which had been connected with Liberal Nonconformity for a century or more. Although Mr. Kingdon had ceased to be a member of George's Meeting for many years, he retained to the last strong faith in the essential principles of Liberal Christianity, and was an earnest advocate of Church reform and comprehension. Notwithstanding his delicacy of health, he took an active interest in the benevolent institutions of his native city; was Treasurer for some time of the Royal Devon and Exeter Hospital, and on the Board of Management of the West of England Eye Infirmary, West of England Institution for the Blind, the Deaf and Dumb Institution, Exeter Dispensary, Model Lodging Houses and other useful charities. In politics an hereditary Liberal, of late years he was identified with the Unionist party. A prominent and highly respected citizen of Exeter, he was no less valued for his private worth and kindly disposition. The closing years of his life were cheered by acquiring and residing in the beautiful family place Taddyforde, so well known to a former generation as the hospitable resort of many of our ministers when visiting Exeter. The present writer has lost a life-long friend, always staunch and true. T. L. M.

DR. C. P. TIELE.

THE excellent article by Professor Carpenter in last week's INQUIRER dealt chiefly with Dr. Tiele as scholar. I should like to add a few lines on the man.

It struck me in those days of mourning how great a number of people felt affection and respect for Tiele. His death means to very many, besides the loss to science, the loss of a much valued friend of high and noble character, full of kindness and humanity. Everyone that met him felt the charm of his personality. He was a man of the highest culture, who made you listen to his words, unconsciously raising you to a higher level of thoughts. His refined taste was apparent in everything. His speech, his style, his handwriting, his rooms, all bore testimony to it. He did not care for trivial and ordinary thoughts and things.

He was averse to sharp controversies, and as a Remonstrant it was his happiness to be able to avoid religious strife. His lovely character always thought the best of others. He enjoyed humour, and was a fascinating narrator. At the age of 70 his heart was as youthful and fresh as ever, and younger men in converse with him hardly felt the difference in age. He was fond of children. His little friends always had access to him; even when he was absorbed in his studies they were allowed to interrupt him.

It is now a long time since he was a minister in Rotterdam, but still a great many members of the community remember him as the minister they were dearly attached to. He was a splendid orator and preacher, but in all the pastoral duties fulfilled by him people felt the influence of his high religious spirit.

His lectures at the University were eagerly attended. In all he said the master was heard. Perhaps it seems strange that he did not found a school. This is owing to the extensive literary knowledge that is demanded by the study of the history of religions. All that he gave in his lectures was work of the highest quality, and, I suppose, it was just this that made his students feel the impossibilty of following his steps. In the latter years his health compelled him to give up attending meetings, but to no one did he become a stranger, and his interest in the theological problems of his time was unabated to the end. He was great in science, but he was also great in love, goodwill, and religious feeling. We thank God for giving us this noble man.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A WEEK or two ago, we told in our "column" that everyone, however young and small, has his own place in the world, and his own work to do, which no one else can do for him.

Have you thought about those words? I did the other day, and first of all I will tell you what I saw that brought them to my mind.

I went to a flower-show in one of the big halls in our town, but it was not like any other flower-show I had ever seen.

For generally there is a greaty variety of one sort of flower, or perhaps a few different kinds. In the summer it is chiefly roses, all shades and sizes, and in the autumn it is chrysanthemums.

But at this show there were numbers of different flowers—all the lovely spring flowers, violets, primroses, and snowdrops; there were buttercups and daises, poppies, cornflowers, lilies of the valley, roses, carnations, jessamine and endless varieties of chrysanthemums, and many others besides.

A goodly number, you will think; and I only wish you could all have seen that beautiful large hall, with all the stalls most daintily arranged with these lovely flowers—such a quantity of them, and all looking so bright and fresh.

But as I entered the hall and first saw all those beautiful flowers, I felt that there was something lacking. There was no sweet scent of flowers, such as one fully expected from such an array. And that was not wonderful, for, lovely as they were, after all they were not real flowers. And now that I have told you what I saw which brought those words to my mind, I must tell you why: Because all those flowers had been hand-made by poor little cripple girls, each one of whom might very well think she had no place in the world and there was no work she could do. And there in the centre of the hall, inside one of the stalls, sat six or seven of these cripple girls, all looking so bright and happy in their clean pinafores. They were working away, making roses and chrysanthemums, laughing and talking with each other, doing their work so cheerfully and as if they were really interested in it and loved it.

One child had such short arms that she could only just make her fingers meet across her chest, and another had no power in her thumbs, but could only use her fingers; and yet even these children seemed to work just as easily and deftly as the others.

There is a Home in London in connection with the Watercress and Flower Girls' Mission, where they take in little orphaned cripple girls for two years, and teach them the art of flower-making. At the end of this time they are boarded out in country homes and provided with materials for their work, and then any money that they make in the week over five shillings (which is the cost of their board) they keep for themselves.

This is also the case in the Home, so that the children feel at once that they may become workers and help themselves. Cripple children may also come to the Home each day to be taught; and when once they have learned the art of flower-making, cannot you imagine how happy the little girls must be, to feel that they can really help their parents instead of being a burden to them?

The six little girls that I saw had been brought from London to show how this work was done, and it was very pleasant to feel that these poor children, who are cut off from so much that adds enjoyment to life in the way of happy games and healthy exercise, are, by the generosity and kindness of friends, enabled to do this beautiful work.

For each child is taught the whole process, so that there is no monotony in the work, and they are able to see the lovely flowers growing in their hands, until they have the perfect whole; and thus they are able to find great pleasure in their work, and in doing it cheerfully forget their infirmities.

So you see they, like all the rest of us, have their work to do, and it is a great happiness to them. But, perhaps, you do not always find happiness in your work. God does not give all His children the same work to do, and it is not always what we most like doing. But if we make up our mind to do it cheerfully and patiently, because it is our duty, we soon come to take a real interest in it, and in time find that it is after all the happiest and best for us. That is how our heavenly Father's blessing comes to us in our duty and our work, and we are quite sure that His will for us is the best. ALISON HALL.

SOME further correspondence on the subject of Temperance Reform, in reply to the Rev. C. J. Street's letter of last week, reached us too late for insertion in our present issue.

MANY of the late Dr. Crosskey's friends and admirers were anxious that his portrait should find a place among the other Unitarian Leaders and Worthies at Essex Hall, and it is therefore pleasant to record that an excellent full-size crayon drawing, taken from a photograph, has been presented to the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association by Mr. J. Arthur Kenrick, of Berrow-court, Edgbaston. Visitors from the country, at future Whitsuntide meetings, will be interested in this addition to the Essex Hall Portrait Gallery.

THE interest aroused by the marriage of Miss E. M. Lawrence to the Rev. W. J. Davies, on Wednesday last, was seen in the large attendance of people at Essex Church, Kensington, who crowded to witness the ceremony. The Rev. F. K. Freeston performed the service, and the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter delivered the address, in which reference was made to the helpful work done by Miss Lawrence in connection with several societies. The Central Postal Mission, the B. and F.U.A., and the Essex Church and Sunday-school will lose an earnest and devoted worker, but there will be a gain to the Unitarian cause in Belfast and the north of Ireland. The reception in the afternoon by Mrs. Alfred Lawrence was largely attended, so also was the evening reception given by Sir Edward and Lady Durning-Lawrence. Mr. and Mrs. Davies have gone to Italy for their honeymoon.

IT is only by fidelity in little things that a true and constant love to God can be distinguished from a passing fervour of spirit.—Fénelon.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 8, 1902.

THE TRAINING OF MINISTERS.

AT the recent annual meeting of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, of which a report appears in our present issue, Mr. J. R. BEARD, who has been President for the past two years, gave an address in which he noted with just pride the more assured position of the College, and the higher standard of its scholarship, as compared with a former period in its history, but then went on to repel with much vigour what he took to be an attack upon the College, for which THE INQUIRER is responsible.

We quote the opening passage of this part of Mr. BEARD'S address, from what we take to be his own copy, as printed verbatim in the Christian Life :—

> Under these circumstances it was with surprise that I read in October last a suggestion made in a leading article in THE INQUIRER to the effect that the Unitarian Home Missionary College should abandon its position as an independent Theological College, and in consideration for handing over in full to Manchester College its invested funds, its subscription list, and its moral support, should be allowed to act as a recruiting sergeant to that institution, and administer some little preliminary drill to its students.

This is Mr. BEARD'S version of what he calls "an extraordinary proposition." It is not ours. What we actually wrote on this subject in THE INQUIRER of Oct. 19 last year we will here repeat, and in view of the dire threatenings of disruption and disaster, which found a place in Mr. BEARD'S address, would beg to assure him that, whatever he may have told "them" sixteen years ago, there is here no sinister attack, no "scheme" to "destroy" the Home Missionary College, and no shadow of ill-will towards its trusted managers. We hold no brief for Manchester College as against the Home Missionary College; any thought of rivalry or invidious comparison would be extremely distasteful to us. What we are concerned with is the welfare of our religious community as a whole, and the men who are to be trained for its ministry.

In the article in question we had referred to Mr. JACKS'S address at the opening of the new session at Manchester College, Oxford, and his dream of a great Preaching Order, which should appeal with new power to the people of this country and bring home to them the true significance of modern thought in a spiritual interpretation of life. And then we wrote :—

"The College, Mr. JACKS says, cannot give to its students all the training required to make them such preachers as the world needs. The training given at Oxford is indispensable, but there is an education not to be given in the class-room, but in direct contact with the world and the needs of men. Such training through actual experience and under friendly direction students already seek in great cities and among the churches during vacation, but this is work which needs to be more thoroughly organised and developed, and it may prove that the way would thereby open at the same time for the supply of other needs.

"And now we will make a suggestion, not by way of urging any immediate revolution, but to sow another seed of thought, which in time may germinate and lead to most salutary growth. To an outside observer it must appear one of those absurdities to which our extreme individualism is too prone, that our Body should continue to maintain two colleges, out of all proportion to the number of the men to be trained and the churches to be supplied with ministers; and there are, we believe, many members of our own community, among those most devoted to its welfare, who, considering the needs and opportunities of our churches and the resources available for the maintenance and development of our religious work, strongly share that feeling. Manchester College is now established and nobly equipped at Oxford, and could be yet further equipped, to furnish the best available education that a college can give. Better surely that the whole force of our learning and spiritual culture should be concentrated there, and not divided as at present.

"But something more is needed, for the oversight and training of men preparing for the ministry of religion; and our suggestion is that the Home Missionary College, reverting to its old title as a Board, might perform an inestimable service to our community, by devoting itself to the care of young men before they are ready for the Theological School at Oxford, and, further, using all available funds for bringing college students during vacation into direct contact with the people, in active service as missionaries among the poor or through participation in the work of some strong church. This, as we have said, is already done to some extent, but we believe could be more systematically and effectively done by a representative body devoted to such work. And that same Board might continue its direction of students for the first years after college, independent of any settled ministry, giving them such training, up to the measure of our present capacity, as in Mr. JACKS'S dream, the young preachers of the new Order would receive. And if one heaven-born leader should arise to take direction of the new forces of our Church Militant, so much the better. But meanwhile, let the thought of concentration, and the longing for more effective strength and service, grow."

It will thus be seen that our suggestion is in complete accord with the spirit of the eloquent close of Mr. BEARD'S address. We have not asked that a single guinea of the funds of the Home Missionary College should be transferred to any other institution, and the very point of our suggestion is that in our common endeavour to give to students for the ministry the most complete training possible, the Home Missionary College, reverting to its original title as a Board, should do even more effectively than hitherto the work of keeping students in close touch with the life of the people, with church work and the social needs of the day.

If such a readjustment of operations as we have in mind should in time be effected, there is no reason why, if it seems best, a group of undergraduates should not be gathered in Manchester, students in Manchester University, and at the same time under the direction of a responsible Head, who should superintend the other special studies of his men, including that of elocution, and their activity in Sunday-school, mission, and other social work; at the same time, there is something to be said for variety of training and experience, and it should be open to students to take their undergraduate course at the Birmingham University, in Liverpool or Glasgow, or even in London, and in each case under the direction and personal influence of trusted ministers and in close touch with the work of vigorous churches.

But the great need, as it appears to us, is of a Board, representative of the best life of our churches, and with ample means at its disposal, to which should be entrusted the oversight of young men destined for the ministry, to see that their training is rightly directed (even perhaps in their last school years), so that their years before graduation may be fruitful of the best possible results. Then if all graduate students for the ministry took their theological course in Manchester College, it would only be carrying a step further the practice which in the past has had such admirable results, by which Home Missionary men, as TATE scholars, have proceeded to Oxford.

That is the first stage of our ideal course of training for the ministry. But the functions of the Board should by no means end when the students nurtured under its care enter the Theological School. It should also have the means of giving its men the best opportunities of religious and social work during the vacations, and as we should hope, for a year or two after the completion of the College course, for some added training in practical mission and social work, before entering on a settled ministry. Thus as the Hibbert Trust affords to students of exceptional ability opportunity for additional University training, our Board would secure to the young minister an added course of training in the great university of city life, in quarters where the stress of social need is the greatest. This, it will be remembered, Mr. WILLIAM RATHBONE has already done, out of his private generosity, in more instances than one, and it is an example which, as a Body, we should be wise systematically to follow.

We have not attempted here the elaboration of any complete scheme, but, as we have said, to sow some seeds of thought, in the interest of fuller and more effective religious life and work in our churches. We are quite aware of the strong forces of personal attachment, which make against any suggestion of change, even in the direction of salutary reform; but Mr. BEARD has himself warned us against making a fetish of any institution, and we ask again for the earnest and dispassionate consideration of the means by which our available forces can be put to the best possible use.

UNITY OF RELIGIOUS AND POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

BY THE REV. HENRY GOW, B.A.*

OUR ancestors in the faith, whose memory we revere and whose robust faith and determined character we admire, had one bond of union which is too little felt to-day. Their watchword was "Civil and Religious Liberty." They desired to worship God in freedom, and they stood for freedom, not only in the Church, but in the world. They were united as members of this congregation quite as much because they held in common certain great political principles, as because they held Unitarian views. Gathering here, I imagine them not merely seeking to save their souls by worship of the sober, puritanic style they loved. They came together as men of the world, with a certain sense of the gravity and responsibility of civic and national life. They had a common work to do in the world as well as here. They had principles which united them on the platform as well as in the pew. Their distinctive form of religion was not merely an affair of the Sunday; it produced common action and effort during the week. They were conscious of being citizens and Englishmen as they met together here, lovers of their town and of their land, and they were united in their high purpose to increase the limits of freedom and to remove the bonds of the oppressed. I do not mean that so-called political sermons were more common then than now; perhaps they were less common. But I mean that there was a certain unity of religious, social, and political principle among the worshippers in our churches which is far less general to-day. It was not merely theological sympathy which united them. Their worship was touched with a sense of large national issues and great social responsibilities, even though these things were rarely mentioned here.

This unity of principle did not imply agreement on many important occasions. I do not suppose that this congregation was entirely of one mind during the Napoleonic wars. There were patriotic citizens like Dr. Priestley, who during the early years of the war with France at the end of the eighteenth century, were thoroughly opposed to that policy, and probably some representatives of that view were to be found in our chapel. Still earlier there were great differences of opinion as to the rights and wrongs of the war that resulted in the separation of the American colonies. I do not suppose that the congregation thought as one man upon that subject. Coming down to much later times, the question of Chartism, of the Crimean war, of the war between the Northern and Southern States of America, were the cause of much division of opinion, and no doubt that division of opinion was represented in our church. But I believe that throughout this period there was an underlying unity of political principle. This was a congregation of Liberals as well as of Unitarians; men and women were united here in much more than assent to theological doctrines. They agreed on more than a belief in the unity of God and the wisdom of open trusts for church buildings. They believed in the people, they believed in freedom, they believed in education, and they believed in righteousness as the guide of nations as of individuals.

There is, one may hope, more unity among us than we imagine, but it is often dormant and unrecognised. We who gather here now are inclined to think ourselves hopelessly divided from each other in everything except theological opinions and belief in an undogmatic foundation for our church membership. We agree in believing that character is more important than creed; we agree in worshipping together without asking our members to subscribe any articles of faith, because we believe in the free worship of unbound minds. We believe that the life and teaching of Jesus are far more important than theories about his person, and we believe in the personal responsibility and the direct relationship of every soul to God. No act of Jesus, no death upon the cross, no faith in him can be necessary in order that God should love us, forgive us, and lead us into larger, fuller life. These and other of our religious principles are most important, and we rightly hold them very dear, but if they have no counterpart in our social and political life, we miss a strength and unity which our ancestors possessed. The Church and State, the sacred and the secular, the divine and the human, are not rightly separated from each other. We, above all other churches, we who believe in a living God, we who believe in the consecration of common life, we who deny that God has revealed Himself to one people, and in one book, and through one church alone; we who believe in the guidance and immediate presence of the Divine Spirit in the world to-day—we, above all other churches, must feel unity not only in theological beliefs, but in principles of action and in ideals which pervade all life.

I note with dismay that there are some Unitarians who would like to exclude all reference to national affairs from our representative paper, THE INQUIRER. Apparently they wish a weekly paper concerning itself no more with the state of the nation than the Athenæum. Theology and tea meetings they seem to think are the appropriate subjects for the paper which represents our principles of religion and morality. Such a paper would be a new departure of a disastrous kind amongst us. Throughout our history we have felt that the principles we love are concerned not only with theological, but political thought, and that the morality we wish to promote is not only the morality of the individual, but of the nation. I am not pleading for my own particular views upon current politics. THE INQUIRER does not express the opinions which I hold upon the great and serious question which occupies so much of our thought to-day. None of us has the right to expect his own particular views on that question. The important thing is that the Editor of such a paper should tactfully and carefully deal with great national issues from a non-party point of view. Moral and religious principles must be brought to bear on national affairs, and the Editor must not be afraid to express himself at the risk of being called a party man. We should all prefer our own views, but the essential thing is that there should be some views, soberly expressed, without party bias and based on moral principles. No paper without political courage and without free speech can pretend to represent our traditions or our principles.

I have said that we are really more united than we imagine. On the wisdom or righteousness of this or that event, judgment in which depends on newspaper evidence, we may naturally differ, but by our traditions and religion we hold certain great principles in common. We believe in free thought and free speech, in urging every man to seek the truth for himself and to express what he seriously and earnestly believes to be the truth, even though it be distasteful to ourselves. That belief applies equally to politics as to religion, and it is our duty to defend it equally in the one sphere as the other. We do not believe in the control of creeds or churches. That means a trust in the human spirit, a reliance on the guidance of God, it is a real confidence in humanity which is of the essence of democracy. We believe in morality, public and private, as the greatest and most fundamental of imperial interests, and next to morality we believe in intelligence. We believe in educating all the children of the nation to the utmost of their capacity, making them strong and vivid in body, mind and spirit, lovers of truth and righteousness and honour. It was said a few days ago that as a nation we all believe in education to-day. We may hope that assertion is true, but with our principles and traditions we hold a view of education which is our own, and which we ought to press. We do not believe in capturing, or allowing the children of this nation to be captured by any one church or creed. It is humiliating to the churches and disastrous to the children that there should be all this jealousy among the sects. We believe in a child's soul, and in education as a setting free and calling forth of dormant energies. We want to make children see for themselves, think for themselves, act for themselves; not to fill their minds with old theological thoughts and dominate their wills by passing fashions of the day. To help children to grow up into thinking, earnest, independent men and women; to teach them that they have a will of their own, and that they are accountable to God and helped by Him, to teach them the duties of life, the duty of brotherhood, the duty of hard work, the duty of reverent free thought, to make them see the beauty of self-sacrifice and tenderness and courage, these and such as these are the ideals at which we aim. We, too, as our forefathers of old, should meet together on the Sunday with the consciousness of holding great principle in common which vitally affect our national and social life. We are not only united by our thought of God, our belief in His unity, our disbelief in orthodox creeds. We are united in our love for freedom, and our faith in man.

THE CONFERENCE AND THE CHURCHES.

THE following letter speaks for itself:—

NEWINGTON GREEN CHURCH, IN ANNUAL MEETING ASSEMBLED, TO THE OFFICERS OF THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

DEAR BRETHREN,—At the instance of our minister and committee, we have taken into earnest and careful consideration your circular letter of Nov. 9, 1901, wherein you urge the appointment of a staff of permanent officials for the transaction of the business of the National Conference.

We desire to express our sense of the high value of these Triennial Conferences held during the last twenty-one years. We would lay especial stress on the fact that they have brought together the representatives of sporadic communities, akin to us, but of—sometimes intentionally—diverse denomination; and we have every wish that such free, independent and friendly conference shall take place in the future as heretofore. We would also gladly recognise the self-sacrificing zeal of those brethren who, at much personal cost and labour, have so successfully carried them out. Nevertheless, we humbly venture to question the wisdom of the late proceedings, and more especially that of the proposals now before us.

The National Conference appears to have become a formal ecclesiastical association, which we view with dislike and no little distrust. We know of no instance of such an organisation which has not sooner or later seriously compromised the liberty of the constituent churches and ministers. Their almost inevitable tendency to encroachment and constriction has usually become more marked with the lapse of years. They become, ipso facto, a pressure upon the freedom, and increase the solitariness of remaining non-included communities; they narrow down the existing varieties of church life, and prove a hindrance to that spiritual spontaneity which might call new forms and therefore new forces into existence.

If there be at the bottom of this movement any hope or expectation that these diversely named free churches shall coalesce under some new and common name, we believe that such hope is not only doomed to failure, but that the object is not worth the necessary effort to attain it. The frank conference of diverse denominations, in our opinion, presents a nobler spectacle than that of nominal uniformity. Nor do we believe that any name can be invented which will at the same time satisfy existing churches and meet the demands of the few or many who, whilst they dissent from the principles and practices of the communities to which they belong, yet prefer to remain where they are. In our opinion, it is not so much our name that forms the barrier to their union with us, as the force of existing social ties, together with an ignorance of our principles, and our religious isolation. No mere change of name can alter these radical facts, or make us more commonly acceptable to the religious world.

And have we not already an organisation which, without essential modification, and without the dangers attendant on the new ecclesiasticism, could easily discharge all the proposed functions of the new Society? Why unnecessarily multiply organisations? The British and Foreign Unitarian Association has been in existence for over three-quarters of a century, has ably represented and aided the cause of liberal religion and has become almost venerable in the deepening esteem of free church life in our own and other lands. To its growing importance its Year Book bears most ample testimony. Already it administers considerable funds, an increasing part of which is supplied by annual church collections; it undertakes an unobtrusive but very effective missionary work both at home and abroad; the almost unique International Conference of last year is proof of its special capacity in this direction; and we would gladly have seen the Triennial Conferences conducted under its auspices. It seems to us that what the new Society claims to have done, might not only as well have been done by this now time-honoured agency, but the increase thereby to its importance and already world-wide reputation, would have been of the best service to progressive religious life.

In conclusion, Brethren, we are so convinced of the loss of power and service by this new departure and so distrustful of the spirit of ecclesiasticism embodied therein, that, with the most unfeigned regret at having to stand aloof, we must most respectfully decline to give this new movement any kind of countenance or support.

Signed on behalf of the Newington Green Church.

WILLIAM WOODING, Minister.
ARTHUR TITFORD, Hon. Secretary.

Another view of this matter is taken by the Rev. Joseph Wood, of the Old Meeting, Birmingham, and Editor of the Seed Sower, who writes as follows in the February number of his magazine:—

"We have already called attention to Dr. Parker's scheme for federating the Congregational Churches by reorganising them as 'the United Congregational Church.' Whether the scheme fails or succeeds, it cannot but be a most instructive object-lesson for our churches, which labour under exactly the same difficulties, and feel the same needs. The Committee of the Congregational Union have now issued a circular to the churches asking for their consideration of the scheme. They preface the request by a statement of what appears to them to be the line and the limit of federation. The autonomy of each church is to be untouched. The election of minister and officers, the admission of members, the conditions of membership, the financial arrangements, these and the like are still to remain within the province of the individual church. But such questions as the recognition by the denomination of each minister elected, the introduction into the ministry of suitable men, the arrangement and possible amalgamation of the colleges, the assistance given to smaller churches, the administration of Congregational funds, old-age pensions for ministers, the conduct of missions, &c., might, it is suggested, be under the control of the church as a whole, instead of resting in the hands of separate independent committees. At present there is no proposal for a common fund for the support of the ministry as in Presbyterian churches. It is evidently felt that the federation scheme cannot be carried all at once by a coup de main. (That was one of the rocks on which Dr. Martineau's scheme foundered.) Federation will have to be approached gradually and tentatively.

"We trust our own churches will not be afraid to look the problem in the face. We may readily admit that the question is not ripe for any revolutionary change, and that the time has not arrived for any attempt at federation without concluding that nothing can be now attempted. A first step has already been taken by the National Conference in the adoption of a constitution which makes it a thoroughly representative body—representative that is of the churches. The next step is to bring the Conference into frequent and personal touch with the churches by means of a permanent secretary who shall give his whole time to the work, devoting himself, not only or merely to secretarial duties, but to the mission and other efforts of the churches generally as a kind of "Pastor at Large." Immense benefit would be conferred on our churches by the visits, counsels, and stimulus of an able and trusted minister set apart for general service. He himself would be one of the first links in a more vital union between the churches. The hope of our churches for the future lies largely in strengthening the hands of the Conference."

FRIENDS OF ARMENIA.

THE miseries and shameless brutality of the Turkish rule in Armenia do not cease, nor do the patient labours of those who are attempting to bring some relief to a cruelly-wronged and down-trodden people. The following passage of a letter from Miss E. Cantlow, secretary of the "Friends of Armenia," gives an instance, and a very mild one, of what has to be endured:—

"Ever now and again as we pursue our work for the widows and orphans of Armenia the extreme caution of our correspondents, rendered necessary by their work and ours, is shaken by some tragic event, and, for a moment, the veil is lifted and we see what is passing in that unhappy land.

"This Christmas has been saddened by the imprisonment of the wife of one of the teachers of our orphans, a Christian girl who graduated at an American High School. Her only crime is that her maiden name was that of a well-known revolutionist, although she was no relative and knew nothing of him, for their native places were some four hundred miles apart. There was no case against her, yet twice she was imprisoned, though on both occasions acquitted. When, however, news of her second acquittal reached the Palace at Constantinople, the die was cast and there was no hope. For the unreasoning fear of the tyrant and fanatic had seized the shadow at Constantinople, and the Courts were quickly given to understand that whether guilty or innocent it was at their peril they acquitted any of that hated name.

"The Court was forced to declare that the first verdict was invalid. Again she was tried—a mock trial truly—and this time she was condemned to five years' imprisonment in a walled city. Yet her only 'seditious' papers consisted of a cutting from an old newspaper printed ten years before she was born and found amongst some of her pupils' papers, and a letter from her little sister of thirteen years about the death of their mother some time previous. While she lay in prison awaiting her trial she was confined with those condemned for the worst crimes."

Miss Cantlow then tells of worse horrors connected with the recent disturbances at Moush, which seem to have stopped short of a general massacre, only because a foreign vice-consul arrived in the district; but the principal buildings of the village, including the Protestant parsonage and church, were burnt, and many men were killed. Thus there are fresh orphans to be cared for, and meanwhile the girls' orphanage at Erzeroum has been almost shattered by the earthquake, and scarcity of the food supply in the neighbourhood of Marash and Urfa has added to the misery.

"But far worse than any suffering from cold or hunger is the insecurity of women's honour. Almost all depends on the character of the Vali, and in some districts women are comparatively safe, but it is the policy of the Turkish Government to put the worse men in power. A humane man rarely rises to the top, and if he does he does not stay there long. The rewards conferred, the favours shown, and the power given to the leaders in the great massacre is a proof of this."

THE very gate of entrance to religion, the moment of new birth, is the discovery that your gleaming Ideal is the everlasting Real—no transient brush of a fancied angel's wing, but the abiding presence and persuasion of the Soul of souls.—Martineau.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Unitarian Home Missionary College was held on Wednesday, Jan. 29, in the Memorial Hall, Manchester. Mr. J. R. BEARD presided.

In the report presented it stated that there were fourteen students during the Session 1900-1901, and that the three students who retired from the College last June had all accepted appointments in the Manchester district, where they became well known during their years at College.

The Visitors' reports on the annual examinations were very satisfactory, and laid special stress upon the preaching ability of the students. The results obtained in the Owens College examinations were also highly creditable, Mr. H. McLachlan securing five first-classes, including three prizes. Lectures on "The Preacher," by the Rev. Joseph Wood, and lessons in Voice Production, by Mr. Acton, had given excellent results. Certain alterations had been made in the rules relating to the Tate Scholarship, which makes it in future tenable by a graduate only, and the effect of this change is to secure maintenance for the scholar during all his three sessions at Manchester College, Oxford. The trustees have for the present raised the value of the Scholarship from £60 to £70. The Treasurer's accounts show an income from all sources of £1,312, with an actual loss on the year's workings of £144. This is due to expenditure for lectures on Preaching and lessons in Voice Production, and also for the maintenance of an increase in the number of students. To maintain, therefore, the better equipment of the students, it will be necessary to take steps to obtain further financial support. A legacy of £450 has been received from the executors of the late Mrs. Sarah Wrigley, and has been added to the investments, which now amount to over £16,000, while the annual subscriptions for last year reached £630.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and financial statement, said the report did not present any very salient or remarkable features. At the same time there were points which might be noted with satisfaction. The report of the Visitors was especially gratifying, and even more gratifying still were the communications they made to himself privately. The result of the work done at Owens College was commendable, inasmuch as it included six firsts and thirteen seconds. He thought they would all agree that the changes made in relation to the Tate Scholarship regulations formed a decided improvement. He was glad that the holders would pass their arts course in Manchester, and that their theological course would be taken at Oxford, Having referred to the losses sustained by the College by the death of several of the supporters, including Rev. William Binns, a distinguished alumnus of the College, and Mr. J. Holme Nicholson, the Chairman said the financial statement was a little disappointing. At the close of last year the College had a small balance in hand, and he regretted that they had gone back slightly towards the old position of a deficit. A satisfactory feature about the matter was that the deficiency had been caused to some extent by the fact that they had more students than in previous years. Of the total expenditure, over £1,200 went in actual payments to tutors and students, while the cost of working the institution was under £200 a year.

Mr. J. H. BROOKS seconded the resolution. He expressed regret that there were no new students this session, and said they must endeavour to get young men from their congregations to enter and study for the ministry.

The resolution having been passed, thanks were accorded to the Visitors (the Rev. P. Moore and the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter), the examiners, and the hon. medical officers.

The CHAIRMAN said all friends of the College would regret the retirement of the Rev. Dendy Agate from the office of honorary secretary after filling the position for fifteen years. He proposed a resolution acknowledging the great value of the services Mr. Agate had rendered to the institution, and tendered to him the warmest thanks.

Mr. R. C. LAW seconded, and the Rev. Principal GORDON supported, the resolution. A letter was read from the Rev. W. C. Hall, an old student, testifying to the esteem in which Mr. Agate was held by all who had passed through the College during his period of office.

The Rev. DENDY AGATE, responding, said that since he took office forty-three students has entered the College. Some were pursuing their studies there or elsewhere, and upwards of twenty had settled in the ministry.

Mr. F. MONKS, of Warrington, was elected President in place of Mr. J. R. Beard, who retired. The Rev. Dendy Agate and Mr. Beard were elected Vice-Presidents, and the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, of Handforth, was appointed honorary secretary.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman brought the meeting to a close.

EVENING MEETING.

In the evening the annual soirée and public meeting took place in the hall. Mr. F. Monks presided, and in his opening remarks said that he was there as a lecturer and learner; but if during his term of office there were any duties he could discharge which would further the interests of that institution he would gladly engage in them.

Mr. J. R. BEARD, in the course of his address, said that great changes have taken place since 1885, when the funds of the College were at a very low ebb. A movement was initiated under Mr. Long's presidency, and since then the invested capital of the College had been raised from under £5,000 to over £16,000, while the number of subscribers had been increased from 472 to 626. They had not been unmindful of the spread of education, and the growing needs of the ministry. Their students had shown readiness and capacity for the opportunities afforded them. By means of scholarships some had proceeded to Oxford and have held distinguished places amongst their fellow-students. They had gained high honours at Victoria, and their influence upon the student life of Owens College has been acknowledged by more than one of its professors. But there had appeared in THE INQUIRER a suggestion that the Home Missionary College should abandon its position and hand over its invested funds and subscriptions list, &c., to Manchester College, and henceforth act as a recruiting sergeant to that institution, administering a little preliminary drill to a certain backward class of candidates. Manchester College is a splendid institution: it has high aims—nothing less than being a free faculty of theology to Oxford University; whilst the capital over which it had control, in one way or another, was exceedingly large. The most beneficial agency in the world, however, may become a fetish. Can its supporters not realise that there are those to whom this college is as dear as Manchester College is to them? that an institution which has lived a vigorous life for forty-eight years, and has put forth fresh roots and branches which make it stronger and more useful than ever, has fully justified its existence? He told them sixteen years ago that if they succeeded in destroying the Home Missionary College it would only be to make room for another of a similar character, and he told them now that although the scheme to which he had referred was altogether outside the range of practical politics its success, if achieved, would shake Manchester College to its base, and would rend and maim their churches and the other institutions which had been conceived for their benefit. For his own part he was confident in the continued and increased prosperity of the Home Missionary College. There was a very large body of earnest Unitarians in this country, and they demanded a college where men should be trained with the special view of ministering to them in holy things. They asked for a ministry trained amongst the people, a ministry abreast of the social needs of the day, trained in Sunday-school work, and, above all, they asked for men in keen sympathy with that ringing note of human brotherhood which was heard rather in crowded cities than in academic groves, and the responsibility of which was learned rather in actual contact with humanity than through the teaching of the schools. He conjured all to stand fast in the support of the Missionary College, to maintain and strengthen it, so that it might continue to send out ministers to heal the nations, and to cry aloud "Hear, O Israel, the Lord your God is One Lord."

The Rev. J. E. MANNING, M.A., delivered an able address on the attitude towards the scientific spirit which students and ministers should maintain, in which he showed that both scientist and theologian were revealers and interpreters of the mind of God.

The Rev. DENDY AGATE spoke of his fifteen years' experience as Secretary of the College, and the Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A., the new Secretary, spoke as an old student of the college.

Thanks were accorded to the Chairman, and to the Longsight Choir for its musical items, and the proceedings were brought to a close.

HE who daily prays must live virtuously. I do not say he who daily utters the words and takes the posture of prayer, but he who prays. No man living in daily violation of what he believes to be the will of his heavenly Father can ask that Father's aid. Prayer, then, is our refuge in temptation.—R. P. Stebbins.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE quarterly meeting of the executive of this Association was held at High-street Chapel, Portsmouth, on Thursday last, 30th ult. The business meeting was held in the library, and was presided over by Mr. J. COGAN CONWAY, the President of the Association.

At the close of the business a public tea was held in the schoolroom, followed by a meeting in the chapel, at which the chair was taken by the President, who was supported by the Revs. C. C. Coe (Bournemouth), E. C. Bennett (Southampton), Mr. G. Cosens Prior (Portsmouth), and others.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the proceedings, expressed his pleasure at being present, and explained that the meeting was held in pursuance of a resolution of the Association that meetings of the executive should always be followed by a public meeting. The reports presented at the committee meeting that afternoon were all of an encouraging character, and showed that there was more life and spirit in the churches in the district now than ten years ago. There were two phrases given to the world by Mr. Gladstone, the spirit of which they, as Unitarians, might take to themselves. One was "The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture"—in all reverence they claimed that that rock was theirs—and the other was "You cannot fight against the future—time is on our side," and the forces of time were certainly on their side to-day.

The Rev. E. C. BENNETT addressed the meeting on "Spiritual Religion," and contended that the highest form of all religion was that in which the fullest expression was given to the secret things of the Spirit. Not the search for intellectual truth, or even the discovery of it, brought the highest joy, but rather the spiritual apprehension of God as the Father of His children, working through all the common experiences of every-day life, speaking through the Christ, and manifesting Himself most clearly as the Holy Spirit working in and through the heart of man.

The Rev. C. C. COE spoke on "Congregational Libraries," and, after referring to the good work done and the possibilities of usefulness in Free Public Libraries, urged that there was still a place and a use for congregational libraries, and suggested that in the getting together and management of such libraries more regard must be paid to the cataloguing of books, the aim being to make the catalogue as far as possible an intelligent and systematic guide to the contents of the Library. Having quoted Lowell's "Dickens in Camp," to show the refining influence of well-chosen fiction, the speaker proceeded to point out a way by which the educational facilities of chapel libraries could be still further developed. Short handbooks should be provided as introductory to various subjects, and then should lead on to larger manuals and text-books; and with regard to the Bible, without going too closely into the minutiæ of textual criticism, a careful selection of books should be provided which should give to the young people growing up among us a clear idea of the growth and development of the Old and New Testaments, and so ensure that the Bible should come before them as a living book, linking the life of to-day to the far-off centuries of the past.

Mr. W. T. BUSHROD, speaking on "Unitarianism as a Permanent Faith," pleaded that there was no need for the half-apologetic tone sometimes assured by Unitarians. Our faith was in harmony with Scripture and with reason, and the clearest testimony of science was on our side, and sooner or later the triumph of the principles that we professed was certain and assured.

After a few remarks from the Rev. E. J. WILKINS, the meeting was brought to a close, a hearty vote of thanks being accorded to the Chairman and speakers on the motion of Mr. G. COSENS PRIOR, seconded by Mr. WM. CARTER.

The CHAIRMAN expressed the thanks of the Association to Portsmouth friends for their hospitality, which elicited a few hearty words from Mr. H. BLESSLEY.

During the evening a choir of boys, under the direction of Mr. Towers, rendered a selection of vocal music in a most pleasing fashion, the items including "Hail Judea," "God is a Spirit," and "Angels ever bright and fair," and "The Convent Bells."

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

IRELAND.

OUR Irish Churches should acknowledge their obligation to Mr. Carpenter, not only for his own work on their behalf, but for setting them upon a task whose performance has done them good. Accompanied by Mr. Conway, Mr. Carpenter was on our side of the water in October last, and spoke on behalf of the Superannuation Fund at a meeting in Belfast. He went away after three or four days of downright hard work, leaving us pledged to do our best for the cause he pleaded for. We laid our plans and set to work; one of our strong laymen put his heart into it; and if we did not realise our full desire, still the £750 or so which "poor Ireland" sends in is not, all things considered, an unhandsome contribution to the Fund.

We met with discouragements, of course; but it was interesting and cheering to hear the comments of some of our keen business-men when the scheme was put before them. "This is a good thing," was the general verdict, one opinion adding, "This is the best bit of Church work our men yet have done." Perhaps a minister of nearly thirty years' standing may be allowed to add that he thinks so too. It is what we have long been in want of. No man should be able in future to take up the work of the ministry without being called upon to consider the question of joining the Fund, not only for his own sake and his belongings, but also for his congregation's sake. Dare I urge one point, however? Then I would say, Make the Life Insurance part of the scheme a little more prominent than it is. I have seen enough, as I have come along, to make me think our men would be none the worse for a little more knowledge of the ways of the world than they generally have to guide them; and if, added to our College staff, we could get a Professor of Worldly Wisdom, I know well that he would make life insurance at the earliest possible moment a matter of urgent obligation.

But, as I said, work for the Fund has done us good. It has brought us more into line; it has made us feel that, in spite of the "sundering flood," we are still in touch with the larger life of our English churches. And if there are congregations which still shut themselves up in a certain aloofness from the rest, and tell you how they "regret that they have no accumulated funds out of which to make a grant," perhaps they will think better of it when they find that they are nevertheless admitted, on equal terms with the rest, to the advantages of our well-planned, truly beneficent, and now triumphant Superannuation scheme.

Meanwhile, three of our churches have been busy with special efforts on behalf of their own work—Holywood and All Souls', and the Stanhope-street Domestic Mission, Belfast. Holywood has secured an excellent organ, and paid for it. The Mission Sale of Work was a small affair; but, small as it was, it was worth holding if only for this: that it was carried through chiefly by the goodwill and zeal of the Mission people themselves, and was an evidence of the honour and affection in which they hold their minister. It is a sincere pleasure to tell that, since the year began, the Mission Committee have been able to add £25 a year to their missionary's salary. All Souls' saw a profit of close upon £500 as the outcome of its small bazaar, and is encouraged to look hopefully forward to the time when the beautiful church in which the congregation worship shall be all their own.

The First Church, Belfast, also has been rebuilding a good portion of its Central Hall, adding to the value of the hall as a source of income and increasing its means of usefulness to the body. The hall is the headquarters of our Church work in the north of Ireland, and most of our local organisations have the free use of its accommodation. There are some of us who venture to hope that erelong it may offer its hospitality to neighbouring ministers and others, not alone for the common work that brings them up to town, but for purposes of social intercourse and leisure too. A central waiting-room and house of call would meet a need which many have felt.

None of our pulpits are "vacant," but, unhappily, two of our ministers are off duty because of serious illness: Mr. King, of Newtownards, is on a voyage to Australia, with six months' leave of absence, and Mr. Pinkerton, of Newry, is ordered into silence for three months. These brethren beloved have the sincere regard, the sympathy, and the goodwill of us all.

We are sadly in want of two new hymn-books, a book of hearty and happy songs of praise for use in our churches, and a book of children's hymns for our Sunday-schools. I do not want to say ungracious things of the books we now have in use, and I am not the advocate of any one book against the claims of others. But in church our psalms are generally anything but songs of joy; and in school, where we have children from four years old upward, we give them hymns to sing which are long years beyond them, and tunes to sing them to which are as deadly dull as, I daresay, they are musically correct. Our services would be none the less devout and none the less helpful if they were brighter and more full of cheer; and our scholars would be none the worse for what we tell them on the Sunday if, through the week, they might be heard humming and whistling our school tunes. O for some believer in the Gospel of Music who should take up the mission work among us, and set before us books of hymns and tunes so good that we shall not be happy till we get them!

Whatever comes out of the inquiry with which the Royal Commission on Irish University Education is charged, it is very earnestly to be hoped that there will be no narrowing of the broadly unsectarian character of the Queen's Colleges; and for my own part, I do not believe that any proposal to turn Queen's College, Belfast, into an Orthodox Presbyterian institution would have the least chance of success, or that any responsible body of men in the Presbyterian Church itself really wishes for such a change. Our own people keep silence upon the matter, having no word to say, it appears, in defence of the unsectarian spirit of the College at which our own young people get their training. If we may not be political partisans, we will be nothing. And so the tide swings by and leaves us stranded. The ablest and staunchest champion of unsectarianism in Collegiate Education hereabouts is Dr. Hamilton, the Principal of Queen's, an orthodox Presbyterian.

No one has spoken more earnestly on the question, and no one has committed himself more deeply to the better way. I was present at the College Visitation in 1896, when, in reply to Lord Dufferin's questions, Dr. Hamilton said: "On the staff of the College all the prevailing religious denominations are represented—Roman Catholic, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Unitarian, Methodist—and to say that perfect harmony prevails among the professors is to understate the truth. The difference of creed makes no difference whatever in friendship or collaboration. Of the students I may make the same report. The diversity of creed makes no difference whatever. It is one great glory of this College that it stands on this broad foundation, opening its doors, its classes, its honours to all. Of that great glory I, for one, hope it will never be deprived." Dr. Hamilton repeated these words in his last year's Report to Parliament, and added, "My views on this point are unchanged"; and further, "If the attempt were made in any quarter to turn this College into a sectarian place of education in any form or degree, or to contract, by so much as a hair's breath, its present glorious width of constitution—I, for my part, should be the first to resist the attempt, and I believe I should be joined in that resistance with equal determination by every professor whose name stands upon our roll. Nothing, in fact, could be more repugnant to our feelings than any such change, and nothing would, in my opinion, be more inimical to the cause of education in Ulster." We are already discussing vague possibilities of University Reform in Ireland; we may shortly be considering definite suggestions of change. In the meantime there is one thing which our people might do and, as I venture to think, ought to do: it is to set our conviction well forward, that, whatever come or go, we must keep our Ulster College to its old lines of the broadest unsectarianism.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION.

SIR,—Would you give me space in your columns to state that Lady Wilson is now acting as Treasurer of the Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union, owing to the much-regretted resignation of Miss E. M. Lawrence.

The subscriptions for 1902, now due, hould be sent to Lady Wilson, 86, Church-road, Richmond, Surrey.

FLORENCE HILL,
Hon. Secretary, Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union, Feb. 4.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Accrington.—On Sunday evening, Feb. 2, a tablet to the memory of the late Edmund Mills was unveiled in the Oxford-street Chapel, in the presence of a large congregation, by the Rev. James Ruddle, of Chorlton-cum-Hardy. The Rev. W. H. Burgess conducted the service, and preached from 1 Peter ii. 12. At the close of the sermon Mr. Ruddle unveiled the tablet and read the inscription, the congregation rising and standing in silence. Mr. Ruddle then returned to the pulpit and gave a short address, describing Mr. Mills as one who had lived "a godly, righteous and sober life." He was one of the founders of the congregation, had been its President for upwards of thirty years, and Superintendent and teacher in the school for twenty years.

Bridgwater.—The annual Sunday-school party took place on Friday, Jan. 31. After tea in the schoolroom, the scholars and friends adjourned to the Friends' Meeting Room, generously loaned for the occasion, when a most enjoyable entertainment, consisting of a lantern exhibition of Alice in Wonderland, &c., was given. Miss Margaret Spiller very kindly distributed the prizes for attendance and good conduct, with a few words of hope and encouragement to all the young folks.

Cardiff.—On Wednesday, Jan. 29, a performance of an operetta, entitled Cinderella, was given by the teachers and scholars of the West Grove Sunday-school. It was rendered all the more interesting, inasmuch as the words were written by Mr. Shapcott Wensley, an old and esteemed member of the Unitarian congregation at Lewin's Mead, Bristol. There was a crowded attendance, and the performance was greatly enjoyed.

Denton.—The forthcoming bazaar of the Wilton-street congregation, particulars of which are advertised in our present issue, is warmly commended to the support of the churches by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, of Gee Cross, and will, we trust, meet with the warm response which such faithful workers well deserve.

Kingswood.—A course of special Sunday evening sermons has been given by the Rev. J. H. Matthews, to good congregations. A Guild for the young people of the school and congregation, above the age of twelve years, has been started with a good list of members. The Rev. H. W. Hawkes' Cinderella play was given in the school last week, under the direction of Mrs. George Titterton. The performers appeared in special costumes, and the representation was most excellent, and gave great delight to a large audience.

Leeds: Hunslet.—A high-class dramatic entertainment was given here on the 3rd inst., entitled The Sleeping Beauty, by friends from Mill-hill Chapel, for the benefit of the bazaar fund. It was a brilliant affair, both as regards costumes and execution, and was witnessed by a large and appreciative audience.

Leeds: Mill Hill Chapel.—The second dedication service took place on the first Sunday of the year. The number was smaller than on the first occasion, as was to be expected; for many joined in it then who would have come up in previous years, if such an opportunity had been offered them; but there were twenty-nine taking part. A book has been placed in the vestry for the registration of the names of those who, year by year, make in this way public profession that they take their stand with the Mill Hill congregation, on the side of religion and righteousness; and those doing so are asked to sign the following declaration, which has been drawn up in such terms that it should bind no one to more than such faith and conduct as is implied by becoming a member of any

Christian congregation:—"We, who have written our names below, joined in the Dedication Service held in Mill Hill Chapel on the dates prefixed, and in doing so declared our desire to unite ourselves with the congregation there meeting for worship, and our purpose to order our lives henceforth (so far as human frailty permits) in accordance with the law of God, declared to us by Jesus Christ."

Leicester: Free Christian Church.—The visit of Mr. F. Maddison, who in public life has never made a secret of his attachment to our liberal religion, was a great success. The occasion was the first of three Conferences for Men, on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 26, when Mr. Maddison gave an address on the question: "Is Religion an Obstacle to Progress?" The main points of the address were: (1) That the great and fundamental basis for the hope of human brotherhood is the Fatherhood of God. Without this, such brotherhood is apt to become an empty fancy, with nothing to give it consistency or reality. And Mr. Maddison held that such a belief, either recognised as such or not, was a universal fact in men's souls. Religion he defined as a movement in the soul of man toward God, and showing itself in good works. (2) He held, as a profound conviction, the belief in Immortality. This great belief seemed to be natural to reformers, and all who were impressed with the dignity and grandeur of humanity. Mazzini, one of the world's finest prophets and revolutionists, was an illustration of the strength of this conviction. But the doctrine of eternal punishment must be abandoned. (3) Materialism is one of the most dangerous foes to progress. Even to make the betterment of the material conditions of the workers (and Mr. Maddison is engaged constantly in such efforts) as to wages, hours, factory conditions, housing—the one thing necessary, is a terrible mistake. We want not less religion, but more of the real sort. Upon this powerful address there followed a keen and spirited discussion. The views put forward differed from one another considerably, and there were some criticisms from the Secularist side, but this gave Mr. Maddison the opportunity to bring his own advocacy of a simple and reasonable religion into clearer emphasis. Being asked to define religion more particularly, he refused to encumber it with orthodox creeds. On the subject of Immortality, he pointed out that its truth and vitality did not consist in rewards or punishments, but in the enlargement and glory which it attributed to man. Altogether it was a most interesting afternoon. Mr. Maddison also delivered an address in the evening.

Leicester: Great Meeting.—The annual congregational meeting was held on Wednesday, Jan. 21. The tea at 6.30 P.M. was not very largely attended, but there was a good attendance at the subsequent meeting. The Chairman of the Vestry, Mr. E. F. Cooper, presided over the meeting. The reports of the congregation, of the Sunday-schools, of the Social Union, and many other institutions were read, and showed a large amount of good work being done. Especially striking is the success of the Sunday-schools, which are now attended by 180 scholars over sixteen years of age. Mr. E. F. Cooper, as Chairman, gave an impressive address. He referred to the gratitude which the congregation felt for Mr. Clephan, who had been Chairman for many years; it was a matter of regret to him and others that Mr. Clephan through advancing age had felt he must give up the Chairmanship, but all would be glad to hear that Mr. Clephan was still serving in the vestry and caring for the interests of the congregation. Mr. Cooper also referred to the importance and use of Public Worship and to the need of moving with the times. It was an address marked by deep reverence for all that is best in our past traditions, united with a spirit of enterprise and boundless hopefulness for the future. Mr. Clephan moved the adoption of the reports, and Miss C. Gittins seconded them. The officers and vestry were re-appointed, and the usual vote of confidence in the minister was carried, having been proposed by Mr. J. Fielding Johnson, and seconded by Mr. Alfred Hopps. Mr. Gow, in his reply, referred to the question of public worship. In former days men and women were driven to public worship through fear. Now they must come through love. It is the minister's business to help to make people want to come to worship, and it is for all, minister and congregation, to contribute to the beauty and reality of worship by earnestness and sincere devotion. A vote of thanks to the Chairman brought the business to an end, after which some selections were given by the choir.

London: Islington.—The morning service at Unity Church last Sunday was overshadowed by the death of Miss Mary Ellen Martineau, which occurred on the previous Friday, after a few days' illness. Miss Martineau was a member of the church, and a constant worshipper when in town; she was in her usual place only on Sunday week. The Rev. Dr. Hicks referred touchingly to her life and death, and a wave of sympathy swept over the congregation for her sorrowing sisters in their bereavement. At the conclusion of the service, Mr. Brittan, the organist, played Mendelssohn's "Funeral March" with great expression, the congregation standing meanwhile.

London: Peckham.—The annual tea and prize distribution of the Avondale-road Sunday-school took place on Wednesday. Tea, games, songs and recitations by the scholars over, the prize-distribution meeting was held under the presidency of the Rev. G. Carter, who noted with pleasure the large gathering of former scholars who were now members of the church. In a short address, Mr. J. C. Griffin alluded to the gratifying regularity of attendance of the elder scholars, to five of whom Mr. W. R. Marshall, on behalf of the teachers, presented handsome stylographic pens. The prizes to other divisions of the school were presented by the Chairman, assisted by Mr. S. W. Davies, a former teacher. Short speeches were made by Miss Carter (in connection with the Scholars' Guild) and by Mr. J. Bredall.

London: Stepney.—The Monthly Postal Mission Conference was held on Sunday afternoon at College Chapel, Miss Florence Hill in the chair, when the Rev. George Critchley, B.A., late minister of the Congregational Church, Burnt Ash, Lee, who is at present taking the evening services at College Chapel, gave an address on "The Alleged Failure of Christianity and its Causes." This was the second of three addresses which Mr. Critchley is giving at these monthly conferences, the first in January having been on "The Meaning and Mission of Christ." The third address, which is announced for March 2, is to be on "The Nature of True Christian Discipleship." Speaking of the alleged failure of Christianity, as contrasted with the religious ideal of Jesus himself, Mr. Critchley drew a dark picture of the evil effects of ecclesiastical tyranny in the Church, of cruel persecutions, and the persistent opposition to all progress of thought, and attributed much of the evil to the perverse doctrines of the deity of Christ and the Atonement, hiding from the world the real helpfulness of Christ's example and the true nature of morality. Miss Hill and the Rev. V. D. Davis, who subsequently spoke, were ready to see more of what was good in the progress of Christian life in the Church, in spite of its tyranny and other evils, and Mr. Davis attributed much of the evil to the early substitution of the claims of orthodoxy for those of a genuine religious life. At the same time he pointed out that the book of the "Imitation of Christ" had come out of the heart of the Catholic Church. At the evening service Mr. Critchley preached an eloquent sermon on 'The Treasures of Darkness." Postal Mission correspondents and other friends may be reminded that after these Monthly Conferences tea is provided for all who wish to stay for evening service, and a pleasant opportunity is thus afforded for the meeting of friends and making new acquaintances. Indeed the "Calendar" states that the chapel is now open at six o'clock every Sunday evening, and tea is provided for any who desire it, so that those who are interested in Mr. Critchley's ministry, coming from a distance, will find the way made easy for them.

Manchester: Pendleton.—The schoolroom, lecture hall, and classrooms have been cleaned and painted, and present a very cheerful aspect. It is also the intention to purchase new hymn and chant books for the church, and to re-cushion the seats. Towards this purpose the sum of nearly £50 has been secured, but the Committee are anxious to raise another £50 in order to cover the whole cost, and balance the church accounts at the end of the financial year.

North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association.—The quarterly conference was held in the Masonic Hall, South Shore, Blackpool, on Saturday last. There was a good muster of delegates and friends from Kendal, Lancaster, Preston, Chorley, besides Blackpool friends from the Banks-street Chapel, and the congregation worshipping in the Masonic Hall. The object of the Association, in holding these Conferences throughout the district, is to strengthen the churches and make known the principles of Unitarianism in the neighbourhood. After tea, provided by the South Shore congregation, a public meeting was presided over by the Rev. Herbert V. Mills, of Kendal, President of the Association, who, in the course of an address, urged all to take an interest in the series of week evening lectures to be given in February and March, and see that the public had an opportunity of hearing them, as by that means those who knew little of the Gospel of Unitarianism might learn how thorough was their teaching, and how well founded, because based on scientific truth. He desired to point out that by reason of their freedom, they, as Unitarians, were better able to take up and advocate whatever outside their churches tended to the enlightenment and uplifting of humanity, and instanced the Humanitarian movement, under which they were brought to a clearer conception of the sacredness of life and a deeper sense of the brutality of war. The Rev. N. Anderton, B.A., of Preston, also gave an address on "The Religious Interests of our Young People." He said that the first thing to remember was that children and young people already had the elements of religion within them. The foundation was present on which they had to build, and in that fact was our great opportunity. Their task was to develop and educate the religious instincts of the young. The family was the best sphere for first training in religion; but Unitarian parents were perhaps more reticent than others in speaking of such matters with their children, and in the Sunday-school was their main effort to provide for the religious needs of the young. This being so, the instruction given there should be of a distinctly religious nature. All subjects were good if rightly treated. No subject was good which did not educate the religious impulses. The perennial difficulty as to the "missing link" between school and chapel was then dealt with. A monthly Children's Service in the chapel, to take the place of the Sunday-school, was recommended. It was also suggested that more might be made of the opening and closing services at the ordinary Sunschool meetings. Young People's Preparation Classes were excellent, but it was difficult to get young people to attend; there were so many competing interests during the week. With regard to Guilds, Mr. Anderton expressed himself unfavourably. He especially disliked the type which encouraged young people to compare their religious experiences and conduct separate services of their own. In conclusion, several suggestions were made, among which was a proposal for a simultaneous Children's Service on Collection Sunday at each of the churches of the Union, the service to be conducted and the address given by a visitor, lady layman, or minister. Discussion followed, Messrs. C. C. Grundy (Blackpool), Sutcliffe (Chorley), Mellor (Manchester), Newell (Preston), and others took part, and the usual votes of thanks brought to a close a very successful conference.

Walthamstow.—The annual meeting, preceded by tea, was held at Truro-road Chapel on Jan. 30. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards represented the Provincial Assembly, and Mr. Elliot came from Highgate. About eighteen members were present. Reports of the work during the year were read by the secretary and treasurer, and adopted. It is felt that an effort should be made to keep the Rev. W. H. and Mrs. Rose for a further period, as there had been a decided improvement in connection with the chapel since they came in October. The congregation has sustained severe losses during the year through members leaving Walthamstow, but there is some prospect now of the numbers increasing. The Sunday-school is in a very flourishing condition as regards scholars, but at least two more teachers are badly wanted.

Whitchurch.—On Jan. 29 the annual congregational party and business meeting of the Church of the Saviour was held, but, owing to the severity of the weather the attendance was not so large as it otherwise would have been. The accounts were read and passed, officers elected. Votes of thanks were accorded Miss Dodd and Miss Lewis for their voluntary services during the year; also to the Rev. W. F. Turland for his untiring zeal and energy on behalf of the church and school. The following evening, Jan. 30, the children and teachers held their New Year's party in the schoolroom, which was much enjoyed.

ABERYSTWYTH

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to Town Clerk.

WILTON STREET CHAPEL, DENTON

ENDOWMENT FUND.

It is a matter of common experience that the Ministry of our Chapels cannot be adequately supported, in purely working-class districts, by the unaided efforts of their congregations.

The members of the Wilton-street Chapel have been working for more than two years with the object of building six houses, of which the rentals will form a limited endowment for the Ministry, available in proportion to the efforts of the congregation.

The Committee believe that by creating an endowment of this kind all necessity for the grants now given by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the East Cheshire Christian Union will cease, and that the congregation will be permanently stimulated by the responsibilities of self-support.

To make full use of the land given, it has been found necessary to build houses of a more expensive character than was at first proposed, and contracts have been accepted to the total amount of £2,940.

The Committee has already in hand, from former efforts of the congregation, and from the proceeds of the Garden City Bazaar, which was so generously supported, a sum of £1,156.

The members of the congregation are working earnestly for the RE-OPENING of the BAZAAR upon MARCH 5th NEXT, and appeal to the generosity of their friends to help them to raise the £1,784 still required.

All Gifts, either in the form of Goods or Money, will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Treasurer,

The Rev. LAWRENCE SCOTT,

or by the Secretary,

The Rev. C. E. OLIVER,

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS

THE offices of THE INQUIRER and Christian Life were formerly side by side in Essex Hall, but the Christian Life office is now removed to 5, Fetter-lane, E.C. Even under the old conditions, with the best of good will, it was often extremely awkward when correspondents sent a communication to one office and asked that copy or proof might be handed to the other. Now, it will be obvious to our correspondents, that if they wish a communication to appear in both papers, they must themselves duplicate the copy.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AKUREYRI RELIEF FUND.—The following donations have been received towards a Fund to be administered by the Rev. M. Jochumsson, in relief of the sufferers from the disastrous fire at Akureyri on Dec. 19 :—Amount acknowledged, £63 16s. ; F. Nettlefold, £5 ; Miss K. B. Thomas, £1 1s.; Miss H. M. Johnson, £1 1s.; Mrs. Gillson, £1 1s. ; Mrs. R. Keating, £1 ; W. Haslam, £1 ; Ion Pritchard, £1 ; Mrs. Bayle Bernard, 10s. ; W. W., 10s. ; Miss Jenner, 5s. ; A Friend, Sidmouth, 4s. Total, £76 8s. There is still time to make up the £100 we are anxious to send to Mr. Jochumsson, and we would beg for a further response during the coming week. The mail for Iceland leaves on March 4. Donations may be sent to THE INQUIRER Office, or to the Rev. V. D. Davis, 9, Nightingale-square, Balham, S.W.

THE Lord Chief Justice gave an elaborate judgment on Monday, in which two other learned judges concurred, in the case of the objections to the confirmation of Canon Gore as Bishop of Worcester. The judgment is that objections (although they were invited) cannot be heard, and that when the King has appointed a bishop the Dean and Chapter are bound to elect him (a pure matter of form) and the Archbishop to confirm the election. This confirmation is now proved also to be a matter of form, and cannot be made the occasion of an inquisition of heresy, such as the evangelical objectors would fain have instituted against Canon Gore. The Guardian, in an article on the judgment, admits that the question is fairly raised "whether the forms of congé d'élire and Confirmation, now in polite language authoritatively pronounced to be shams, ought not to be abolished altogether," and notes what was pointed out at the hearing, that Colonial bishops are already appointed in a much simpler manner. While the suggestion is obvious that the old forms, which have lost all real meaning, should be simply dropped, the Guardian yet pleads for their retention, in view of a possible time when the power of the Crown may again have given place to a genuine spiritual authority in the Church, and the election by Dean and Chapter may have ceased to be an empty form.

The Church may fall on evil days. The malice of her enemies, the encroachments of the civil power, or her own deliberate choice, may lead to a dissolution of the alliance between Church and State. These forms of election and Confirmation, which we are asked lightly to discard now, may, if the time should ever come for reconstructing the Church on an independent basis, prove of the highest value. They could be widened and revivified and used as a foundation for a system of free election and real Confirmation on true canonical principles. Even as things are, these dead forms serve to perpetuate a living principle. Lifeless as they are pronounced to be, mere skeletons of what in earlier days was flesh and blood, they stand there to shame the Crown out of an improper exercise of its legal powers, if such an unhappy contingency should ever arise. They stand there as witnesses for something older and higher and holier than Tudor tyranny and Whig Erastianism. Let us keep them in faith and hope for better days.

Whether the Church disestablished and entirely self-governed would be really happier than it is at present, is, in view of the sharp division of parties within the fold, an open question.

THE Rev. Canon Cremer, Vicar of Eccles, following a tradition of genuine liberality, which has long been connected with his name, is about to signalise the Lenten services in his church by a remarkable series of addresses to be given on Sunday evenings by prominent Nonconformists. Since the law forbids that a Nonconformist should preach from a Church of England pulpit, these are to be "after-addresses," to be spoken "from the lectern." The general subject is "The Church of England and her Daughters : the special contribution of each section of the Christian Church to the common life of the whole." To-morrow (Sunday) evening Dr. Mackennal, of Bowdon, is to give the first address on "The Congregational Movement." Feb. 23 is devoted to the Wesleyans, and on March 2 Principal Gordon is to speak on "The Unitarian Movement." March 9, Mr. J. W. Graham, of Dalton Hall, on "The Quaker Movement." Then follows a Baptist, and on March 23 Commissioner Pollard is to give the last address on "The Salvationist Movement."

WHAT the Rev. R. A. Armstrong has more than once done, naturally enough, with the pulpit of Hope-street Church, Liverpool, in full accord with the fundamental principle of his church, the Vicar of Eccles is now to do, so far as he is permitted, in his parish church, and it is an action that should meet with the warmest recognition. In an address to his parishioners, Canon Cremer writes :—

There is enough and to spare of mutual criticism and fault-finding between Christians, and especially between the National Church and her separated daughters. The true bond of union between Christians is willingness to do the will of God.

Let us listen to representative men while they try to tell us what they conscientiously believe to have been the gain, to the Christian Church as a whole and to the Church of England in particular, from each of the more prominent movements in the Church which have ended in separation.

The mere recognition of the fact that each section of the Christian Church has a strong point, which has been its characteristic message to the Church at large, the mere willingness to listen respectfully to a statement of that message, cannot fail to draw us nearer to one another and to our Master.

Some of us would confess to having a strong prejudice against "Dissenters" generally ; most of us would own to such a feeling in regard to this or that particular body of Christians. There is nothing like knowing a little more about people, if we wish to overcome dislike. Prejudice is often only another word for ignorance, and increased knowledge generally means increased sympathy.

Would that all vicars of the Anglican Church were of this spirit, and that it were similarly met by all Nonconformists!

LOVERS of Browning should by no means miss this month's Cornhill, which opens with some delightful reminiscences by Mrs. Bronson, of "Browning in Venice," with a prefatory note by Mr. Henry James. Browning, Mrs. Bronson says, was amused, but never impatient, with the innumerable requests for autographs he received. When asked viva voce for one, he looked puzzled, and professed to be able to remember only one verse; and would write:

All that I know of a certain star, &c.

But on one occasion he wrote Mrs. Barbauld's lines:

Life! we've been long together, &c.

and after reading the lines aloud, added, "If she had never written aught but that one verse she would deserve to be forever remembered." Mrs. Bronson quotes the following note of a gifted friend concerning Browning:—

It was evident to me that he always strove to excuse the faults of others and overlook their weaknesses, gathering all with his large charity, into the great brotherhood of humanity. But his indignation at anything low, base, or untrue was like a flash of fire. His whole face would change and glow as he denounced those who used their talents to corrupt the world, as he thought some of the modern French novelists do. No word was too scathing, no scorn too intense, for that great sin consciously committed.

Of Browning's reading of his own poems there is this description:—

His reading of his own poems was a never-to-be-forgotten delight—simple, direct, and virile as was the nature of the man. The graver portions he read in a quiet, almost introspective way, as if he were thinking it all out again. I remember once that in finishing the grand profession of faith at the end of 'Saul' his voice failed him a very little, and when it was ended he turned his back to us who were gathered about him in reverent silence, and laying the book quietly on the table, stood so for a moment.

ANOTHER Browning study will be found in this month's Good Words, being a first paper by Mr. Stopford Brooke on "Browning's Treatment of Nature." This number of Good Words opens with an article on Ruskin's "Isola" by Mr. W. G. Collingwood, the frontispiece being a reproduction of Watts' chalk-drawing of Lady Mount Temple.

A MEMORIAL of John Ruskin, containing a medallion portrait in bronze, by the late Onslow Ford, R.A., has been placed on the south wall of the Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey, and was unveiled last Saturday by Mrs. Arthur Severn, in the presence of the Dean and a large company. Saturday was the anniversary of Ruskin's birth, eighty-three years ago.

As soon as Mr. Stopford Brooke has completed his course at University College (with two Browning lectures), he is to repeat the five lectures on the "Poetry of Rossetti and of William Morris" in a Tuesday evening course in Kensington Town Hall, beginning on Feb. 25. Particulars as to the price of tickets, &c., we advertised last week.

A COURSE of six lectures has been arranged by the Committee on "Social Education" of the Charity Organisation Society, to take place at the Royal United Service Institution on Tuesdays at 4.30 P.M. On Feb. 11, 18, and 25 Mr. Reginald Bray, who wrote on the same subject in the "Heart of the Empire," will lecture on the "Town Child"; he will be followed by another contributor to the same book, Mr. F. W. Lawrence, who on March 4, 11, and 18 will deal with the "Housing Problem." Further particulars may be obtained from the Hon. Secretary, Mrs. G. F. Hill, 10, Kensington-mansions, S.W. Tickets admitting to the course are 5s. each; 1s. for admission to a single lecture may be paid at the door.

LAST year a petition signed by over 29,000 women textile workers of Lancashire, asking for the suffrage, was presented to Parliament, and a similar petition, signed by over 30,000 women textile workers of Yorkshire and Cheshire, is about to be presented. On Tuesday evening, Feb. 18, a public meeting is to be held in the Chelsea Town Hall, to receive the deputation of women who have come up with this petition. The chair is to be taken at 8.30 by Mr. Richard Bell, M.P.

IT will be seen from the advertisement in another column that the iron church which has been erected by the Liverpool District Missionary Association in a central position at Widnes (on the Lancashire side of Runcorn Bridge) is to be opened by the Rev. H. D. Roberts on Sunday week, and that on the following Thursday evening, the 27th inst., an inaugural public meeting is to be held. There seems good prospect of the establishment of a permanent congregation at Widnes. The Committee of the Association were led to secure an iron church of their own, because after services had been held for some time their tenancy of the only suitable premises in the town was abruptly terminated. The total estimated cost in connection with the iron church is £300, and is covered by special donations.

OF our monthlies the Seed Sower, now in its ninth year, is "a magazine for the Church, the School, and the Home," and has amply earned its title. The new Unitarian World is "a monthly magazine of Liberal Religious Thought and Work" contains this month another sermon by Dr. Crothers on "The Open Door." The Christian Freeman and Sunday School Monthly began with this year a new series, but has a record of forty-six volumes. Its pleasant stories and helpful lessons are well known. Young Days is the children's monthly, and has begun the year with a story by Miss Theodora Mills, as well as other good things. February shows us already snowdrops and crocuses out in one of Mr. T. Robinson's charming talks about "Mother Nature's Wondrous Ways." Yr Ymofynydd is the Welsh monthly, to which we all wish well, though unhappily few of us can read it. In the February number Mr. Gwilym Evans, of Chesterfield, writes on "Dr. Rowland Williams," and Mr. Thomas Thomas, J.P., on "The History of Unitarianism in Cardiganshire." Of this magazine the Swansea issue of the Unitarian World says:—

One of the most interesting features of the Ymofynydd is "The Crow's Nest"—a searching criticism of the traditional theology of Wales, and a clear exposition, month by month, how the leaders of orthodoxy are adopting more and more the Unitarian standpoint in Theology. No reader who understands the Welsh language should miss this magazine, and it would be worth while for others to learn Welsh in order to be able to understand it. Our Welsh Unitarian brethren—especially the Cardiganshire section—deserve our thanks for the great work they are doing.

A small fund is being raised, we understand, to place copies of Yr Ymofynydd in the Welsh colleges and libraries. These monthlies cost a penny each, all except the last, which costs 2d. If anyone has only a penny a month to spend on this literature, we will not undertake to say which monthly should be chosen, but we hope that very few of our friends are short of the second penny, because everyone, of course, must have Young Days.

MR. JOHN HARRISON, the President of the Provincial Assembly of London and South Eastern Counties, was on Feb. 6 entertained at a banquet at De Keyser's Hotel to celebrate his investiture with the Order of Leopold, of which he has been created a Knight by the King of the Belgians. This honour has been conferred "in recognition of important services rendered to the Belgian poor." The insignia of the Order was presented to Mr. Harrison by his Excellency Baron Whettnall, the Belgian Minister Plenipotentiary; and amongst those present were the Belgian Consul-General and Vice-Consul, Canon Pycke (Chaplain of the Belgian Benevolent Society), and the leading Belgian merchants in London. Many members of the Consular body in Antwerp and Ghent came over specially to attend. We heartily congratulate our friend on this recognition of his good work in this direction—one of many good works of his.

LORD DUFFERIN, who after a long illness passed away early on Wednesday morning, was one of the most distinguished diplomatists of his day, and a great servant of his country. Successively Governor-General of Canada and Viceroy of India, it was of him Tennyson wrote in a dedication of his poems,

Your rule has made the people love
Their ruler. Your Viceregal days
Have added fulness to the phrase
Of "Gauntlet in the velvet glove."

Born at Florence, June 21, 1826, Lord Dufferin was one of the many brilliant Irishmen to whom this country is so greatly indebted. A few days earlier, on the 7th inst., there died at Canterbury that venerable artist, of such astonishing vigour, Mr. T. Sidney Cooper, who was born Sept. 26, 1803, and seemed if he would go on painting for a hundred years. A lad of humble origin, he was apprenticed to a coach builder, and in painting panels learnt to mix his paints. Sheep became his speciality, and longer than the memory of most of us they have been a part of the Royal Academy exhibitions. He was painting them to within a few weeks of his death.

TEACH children first self-control; teach them, secondly, the doing of good deeds to others.—Mozoomdar.

THAT a man has a peaceful, restful life in God is good; that a man endures a painful life with patience is better; but that a man has his rest in the midst of a painful life is best.—Eckhart.

PROFESSOR ROBERT ADAMSON.

ENGLISH philosophy and English learning have suffered an irreparable loss by the premature death, at the age of fifty, of Professor Adamson, which occurred suddenly on the Wednesday of last week. Since 1895 he had occupied the Chair of Logic in the University of Glasgow, and was one of the leading members of the University Senate. With the single exception of Mr. Bradley, the author of "Appearance and Reality," there is no living thinker in our midst who can be compared with him in depth of metaphysical ability or in originality of speculative insight; and considering the rarity of these qualities, the present calamity is even greater than the early removal of Balfour and Clifford from the ranks of English science. All who knew him were awaiting and anticipating works from his pen that would have been permanent contributions to philosophical literature and have materially advanced philosophical research, and it is impossible to exaggerate the feeling of dismay which the sad intelligence of his death has occasioned in the minds of many. Let the following reminiscences of an old pupil, who owes to him more than he can ever express, serve to convey some idea, slight and inadequate though it be, of the man and his work.

For nearly twenty years Dr. Adamson was at Owens College, and it was during the latter part of his Professorship there that I came under his influence and studied under his guidance. A galaxy of great and distinguished men made the College at that time famous. Balfour, Stewart, Roscoe, Milnes Marshall, Boyd Dawkins, Williamson, Ward, were all teachers within its walls, and their classrooms were filled with students. Adamson represented a department of academic discipline far less capable than theirs of being turned to utilitarian account, and his lectures were much more thinly attended; but his election as Chairman of the Board of Studies of the Victoria University was a sufficient indication of the value his colleagues set upon his ripe judgment and well-balanced culture. To no one, not even to Dr. Ward himself, was the youthful University more indebted for the framing of its statutes and regulations and the organisation of its system of degrees. The Honours Course in Philosophy, for which probably he was solely responsible, is unique of its kind, and affords an opportunity for the genuine student such as would be difficult to find elsewhere. Dr. Adamson's interests, however, were wide and extensive and reached far beyond the subjects of his chair. He was constantly labouring for the expansion of University work. Like the late Professor Sidgwick, he was an active supporter of the movement for the higher education of women, and in the opening of Owens College to women students he took a leading and prominent part. "A melancholy fact in modern times," he once said, "is the growing tendency of the trained intellectual life to isolate itself from the practical work of the world," and against him, at least, that sin could not be charged. He was conscious, indeed, of the chills and discouragements to which such service is perpetually subject; he was familiar with the petty obstacles, the narrow prejudices, which even those who profess to revere a moral ideal are sure to throw in the way of its realisation; he knew how a man of intelligence might often break his heart at beholding the ruin of a cause by the blind stupidity of its would-be adherents; but he never allowed these experiences to deter him from exerting himself for the good of society nor to separate himself from the general interests of the community in which he lived. He was "liberal" in the best and truest sense of that word; a consistent friend and helper of democratic institutions and of progressive reforms; for him, as for Fichte, "to found an empire of mind and reason, to destroy the dominion of rude physical power as the ruler of the world" would appear the goal of wise political endeavour. Well do I remember the decisive, emphatic way in which, on one occasion, he insisted that the feeling of a people, when it is pure and spontaneous, is almost invariably right, in opposition to some of us who were venturing to question the infallibility of the vox populi.

But it is of Dr. Adamson as a philosophic thinker and teacher that I am mainly concerned to speak, and it is hard enough to do it with any degree of satisfaction. There was something so fascinating and inspiring in his treatment of a philosophical theme, something so peculiar to himself, that it is impossible to describe in words where the secret of the charm lay. Certainly it was not in any literary ornamentation, not in any daring figures of speech, such as used to delight the hearers of Wallace's lectures at Oxford. He never departed from the method of rigidly scientific exposition; he never attempted to throw even a semblance of simplicity over matters that were essentially difficult. The man who wanted his thinking done for him would have listened to Adamson in vain, and probably not a few of his students did so. He took you at once to the heart of a subject, and led you to it straight along the direct road, without any diversion on the way, or any pretty fluttering round it as it came in sight. But no one who made a real effort to follow him was ever disappointed; to get at his meaning was always worth the toil, and was almost certain to suggest a method of solving other problems than the one immediately in hand. It has been my good fortune to study under a number of distinguished philosophical teachers, both in England and on the Continent, but I never met with Adamson's equal in that respect. From first to last I must have heard at least 300 of his lectures, and each one was a striking exemplification of vigorous independent thinking and of laborious research. If he spoke about a philosophic system, you could rely upon hearing something fresh and original; if he dealt with psychological or ethical questions, he would be sure to throw an unsuspected light upon them, and to clear away a host of confusions. "A problem well put is, in philosophy, much more than half the solution of it" was one of his favorite dictums, and often he would take pains to show that a whole nest of self-made puzzles resulted from the neglect of this preliminary precaution. In the senior classes, when I attended them, he had but two, or sometimes three, students, but he gave us the very cream of his thinking, and many of the lectures were, I believe, delivered for the first time. With few notes, sometimes without any, he would lead us through the most complicated pieces of reasoning with a clearness and an ease that were surprising, never halting for want of the right expression, never interposing a superfluous sentence. In one of those courses, which occupied three hours a week from January to June, he laid before us a masterly exposition of the systems of Leibnitz, Kant and Lotze, criticising each with subtle penetration, and bringing out in every case the vital issues that were involved. His method of criticism was always fair, always judicial; he never attacked a philosophy from the outside; he placed himself within the province of ideas amongst which it moved, and simply inquired whether it was consistent with itself, whether it was capable of satisfying its own demands. A history of Philosophy, written on these lines, and with his profound knowledge, would have been an epoch-making work, an entirely new departure in the literature of the subject. Such a work he had planned as the magnum opus of his life, and he had been accumulating material for it, through the industry of years. That the world should be deprived of it and lose the fruit of his toil is one of the saddest of catastrophes in the annals of thought.

I cannot here attempt to sketch even in outline the characteristics of his own philosophical position; nothing, indeed, would have been more distasteful to him than a mere summary of his views, written, as he would have said, in a fever, and with the grounds on which they rested ignored. In sympathy, I suppose, he was nearest to the Critical Idealism of Kant, or what he took to be the essence of the Kantian system. That he found neither in the doctrine of "things in themselves," nor in the absurd caricature of the forms of space and time and the categories as "a kind of mould in our own minds into which we are obliged to pour our ideas of the universe and the objects and events therein," but in the fundamental contention that the only significance we can attach to reality is that of a system of facts so related as to enter into conscious experience and to be interpreted by rational intelligence. In reference to "things in themselves," he regarded the assumption of them as an excrescence upon the Kantian system, and as almost relinquished by Kant himself, in his more guarded moments; in reference to the forms of perception and of thought, he showed that they were never looked upon by Kant as subjective, in the sense of being faculties of the finite spirit. The life of the concrete individual spirit was just as much a part of the reality of things as the objects over against which it appeared to stand; both had to be interpreted, from the same point of view; both, that is to say, were parts of a world which is what it is on account of its relation to Mind or Self-consciousness. But Adamson utterly distrusted all short and easy cuts to idealism, and even the elaborate constructive attempts of T. H. Green and the Master of Balliol failed to satisfy him. This was one of the grounds, I take it, on which he insisted so strenuously that if we would understand, so far as it may be given to us, the significance of the universe in which we find ourselves, we must resume the problem as it came from the hands of Kant, and clear the way by a thorough-going analysis of reason itself. Without such analysis, it seemed to him,

"metaphysical speculation must remain an airy fabric without solidity or foundation, within which we may live if we so choose, but which can lay no claim to real existence or worth for thought." The conception of an infinite Self-consciousness reproducing itself in, or manifesting itself to or in, the realm of finite spirits and nature, he held to be full of difficulty, and he urged that the idealistic philosophy had still much to do before it could with any amount of assurance claim to have "named" the truth of things. Of this, however, he was convinced. If we represent the ultimate reality, which we describe as Mind or Spirit, after the fashion of an object, from which finite spirits are severed, as they are assumed to be severed from the finite objects of their experience, we shall find it impossible to accommodate our thought of such ultimate unity of existence with that independence which each finite spirit asserts for itself. But identity or unity in existence is not necessarily represented in adequate manner by mere pictures of conjunction or fashion, such as we use to help out our notion of unity or identity in things. It may be, so to speak, not a given fact, but a relation which the finite spirit gradually realises in the development of its own inner life, such unity, for example, as is exemplified in the identity of principle or spirit that binds together the members of a community. It may be a oneness in end or aim, not a oneness in actual being, and so regarded it need not in any way conflict with all independence that can be claimed for or that could be of practical significance to the individual finite soul.

As an instance of Professor Adamson's power of philosophical criticism, let me cite a very fine piece of analytical reasoning, which he once brought to bear against the attempt to apply the Category of Causation to the possible relation of the Infinite to finite intelligences, a mode of conception common alike to the metaphysics of Dr. Martineau and the empirical philosophy of Berkeley. Theology of this sort, he argued, "is simply a translation into the language of idealism of the popular view that the experience of the conscious subject is due to some action from without; and, if no further analysis be given, it is not of the slightest consequence, philosophically, whether we say that God is the cause of the varied character of conscious experience, or that things are the cause. In both cases, we have started with the conception of the finite, self-existent mind, and explained its experience as communicated to it from without. Such a mere fashion of speech makes clear neither what the significance of 'coming from without' can be for an intelligence possessing only subjective states, nor how the notion of 'without' can possibly arise in its consciousness, nor how it comes to regard itself as finite, and to refer for explanation to an Infinite Mind." He proceeds to point out, that, from Berkeley's point of view, the criterion of objectivity is "want of consciousness of productive power on the part of the finite subject"; the finite subject, that is to say, does not think of itself as producing its objects of perception in the same way as it thinks of itself as producing its ideas of imagination. But, insists Adamson, "in the absence of other grounds, objectivity of this sort might be accounted for by reference to unconscious acts of production on the part of the finite subject, as well as by action from without." Experience would thus be entirely a process of subjective evolution; inner and outer would imply only differences in the activity of the subject, the former being conscious and the latter unconscious; in other words, this passage to the being of God, breaks down utterly.

Dr. Adamson's published writings are not numerous; but they are of sterling worth. His treatise on "The Philosophy of Kant," small and compressed though it is, is in many respects the most thorough estimate that has been formed of the Kantian philosophy, and has been translated into German; his little monograph on "Fichte," in Blackwood's "Philosophical Classics," is a perfect masterpiece of concise exposition. His articles on Hume and Kant in the "Encyclopædia Britannica" are full of careful analysis and penetrating criticism, whilst that on "Logic," and the shorter ones on "Belief" and "Category" are known to all philosophical students. To Mind he contributed a number of papers and reviews, and his last appearance in print was in the form of an essay on "Moral Theory and Practice," which constitutes a chapter in the volume, "Ethical Democracy," issued by the Society of Ethical Propagandists. He once told me that it was his intention to publish the substance of his lectures when they had taken final shape and he had retired from the duty of lecturing; but now it is sincerely to be hoped that they may in some way see the light, and be preserved from the wreck of so much that would have been precious.

If it is hard to speak of his work as a thinker, it is harder still to speak of him as a man. To those of us who knew and respected him, he stood for the very ideal of the philosophic life; the embodiment of the spirit that reflection upon the deep problems of existence should engender; the example of that absolute fidelity to reason and splendid confidence in its exercise, which Plato or Aristotle would have approved. As students, we were ashamed to present him with a slovenly piece of thinking in a college essay, and in later years to win his commendation for any bit of work we had been able to do, was in itself a sufficient reward. We were always sure of his counsel and aid when we sought it, and to spend an hour in his company meant to gain a store of ideas that would claim attention for long afterwards. His death will leave us with a feeling of dreary blank, and his memory we shall never cease to cherish.

IT is to be noticed that these things so hardly won, these virtues for which we pay the price, form not only the marked features in our character, but in the trying and doubtful periods of life they are the most reliable. In the emergencies of life, it is only those things that are ours because we have paid for them that we can depend on.—J. F. W. Ware.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

IN the Contemporary Review of last November, we noted an interesting article by Mr. Richard Heath on "Protestantism in France," the burden of which was that while the spirit of Protestantism was more and more pervading the national life, and Protestants out of all proportion to their numbers were coming to the front in all matters of State, yet Protestant Churches in France were steadily declining in strength and were on the road towards extinction. On this M. Merle d'Aubigne has written a letter of strenuous denial, enforced by ample evidence from statistics, which appears in the current number of the Review. In the first place, M. d'Aubigne asks where Mr. Heath got the number 1,500,000 for the Protestants of France in 1835, and declares that it must be a mistake, since there never were so many throughout the last century; and as to the 650,000 of the present, that represents the Protestants known to their church authorities, while scattered over the country, not attached to any church, there must be many thousands more. The churches in the country and in small towns are admittedly declining, but that is not a symptom of Protestantism only, it is due to the general decline of the population, which is more than made up by a great increase in the large towns and industrial centres. Further definite evidence is adduced in the fact that whereas in 1835 Paris had not more than ten French Protestant Churches, it has now in city and suburbs 105 places of worship, while the number of pastors has steadily increased. In 1806 there were 120, in 1857 there were 738, and now they number more than 1,200. And further:—

In 1830 the "Société Centrale Protestante d'Evangélisation" did not exist; now it has 150 stations, and a yearly expenditure of £17,000. The "Société Evangélique de France" was not yet born, nor the "Société Evangélique de Genève," neither were the Synodal Reformed and the Free, the Methodist, and the Baptist Churches, or the MacCall Mission. Since 1835 these churches and societies have founded hundreds of congregations, and have an outlay of £132,000 a year.

The Protestants also support many valuable charitable institutions, and recently, in the space of three years, have doubled their contributions to Foreign Missions, giving now £40,000 a year for that purpose. Altogether it is calculated that French Protestants give £276,000 a year for the support of their religious and charitable organisations, while the number of known Protestants in the whole of France is less than the population of the city of Glasgow. Admirers of the Huguenots need not therefore fear, says M. d'Aubigne, for the future of their Church.

Mr. J. A. Hobson offers, in the Contemporary, a "Re-statement of Democracy," working out the thought of the State as an organism in a very interesting manner. The doctrine of "the general will," he says, finds its most masterly expression in Mr. Bosanquet's work, "The Philosophical Theory of the State," and he adds:—

I have approached the matter from the psychological rather than from the philosophical standpoint, and in applying the term organism I go beyond the judgment of some of these thinkers. But what I seek to establish is the admission that a political society must be regarded as "organic" in the only sense which gives a really valid meaning to such terms as "the will of the people," "national duty," and "public conscience." The individual feeling, his will, his ends and interests, are not entirely merged in or sacrificed to the public feeling, will and ends, but over a certain area they are fused and identified, and the common social life thus formed has conscious interests and ends of its own, which are not merely instruments in forwarding the progress of the separate individual lives, but are directed primarily to secure the survival and psychological progress of the community regarded as a conscious whole.

How the doctrine of extreme individualism, and "one man, one vote" is viewed under this conception, our readers must see for themselves in Mr. Hobson's article. His conclusion is that "a developed organic Democracy will have evolved a specialised 'head,' an expert official class, which shall draft laws upon information that comes to them from innumerable sources through class and local representation, and shall administer the government, subject to protests similarly conveyed." "It is plain that when a rational Democracy is formed, laws, like hats, will be made by persons specially trained to make them." "A true Democracy is only possible when society, a true organism, becomes conscious in its intelligence and will, and thus is capable of that self-control which is the essence of Democracy, and which contains the only liberty and equality that are worth the names."

The Nineteenth Century and After opens with three South African articles, in which the Empire which has annexed the gold-mines of the Transvaal is warned against what will happen if it does not check the inrush of foreign immigrants; the advantage of Chinese labour for the Rand is cogently argued; and the Boer prisoners in Ceylon are picturesquely described. Dr. G. Johnstone Stoney, F.R.S., writes on "The Demand for a Catholic University," which, he argues, is essentially ultramontane in its origin, and contrasts the attitude of Irish Catholics before and after the Roman coup of 1849 at the Synod of Thurles.

In the Monthly Review, the Earl of Carlisle has an article on "Public House Trusts," examining the policy of the "Central Public House Trust Association," and the advocacy by which it is supported. A doubt is expressed whether its methods will really lessen the amount of drinking in this country. The illustrated article is on "The Story of a famous Botticelli," the picture of the "Adoration of the Magi," which was once in the Church of Santa Maria Novella, and is now in the Uffizi Gallery at Florence.

In the National Review will be found "A British Tribute to Hungary" by Sir Rowland Blennerhassett, Bart., marking the close sympathies in the love of liberty which unite the two countries. Hungary, it is pointed out, has shown great capacity, especially of late years, for absorbing people of other races, particularly Jews and Germans.

No nation in Europe has treated weak or subject races with anything like the forbearance or spirit of justice which has been shown by the Magyars. This is strikingly the case as regards the Jews, with the result that probably in no country in Europe are the Jews more thoroughly nationalised than in Hungary. Ever since the arrangement of 1866, under which Hungary obtained her present position, the material resources of the country have been developed in a way which excites wonder and admiration. We have been accustomed to speak of the marvellous growth of cities and towns in the United States of America and in the King's dominions beyond the sea, but Hungary within the short space of forty years has created a thriving commerce, manufactures, a network of railways, a sound system of public education, and has produced great names in politics, literature, science and art. The voice of Hungary is becoming more and more supreme over the whole policy of the Dual monarchy. It is the qualities of the Hungarians that have ensured this consummation.

Whoever has thought of the late M. Jean de Bloch as an impractical dreamer should read the article in the Fortnightly on his character and work by Mr. R. E. C. Long. He was, Mr. Long points out, "one of those exceptional prophets who are honoured most in their own country." He is also the subject of an interesting "Character Sketch" by Mr. W. T. Stead in this month's Review of Reviews, where a good portrait will be found, and many biographical particulars. Concord also has an obituary notice, in which it is noted that Ivan Stanislavovitch Bloch, who was a Polish Jew, has left 50,000 roubles for the continuance of the peace propaganda in which he was engaged at the time of his death. Concord also has a first article beginning a thorough examination of Dr. Conan Doyle's plea in his "War in South Africa: Its Cause and Conduct."

GUILDS.

SIR,—In your condensed report of what seems to have been an admirable address, on "The Religious Interests of our Young People," by the Rev. N. Anderton, B.A., of Preston, two sentences surprise me. I read that "with regard to Guilds Mr. Anderton expressed himself unfavourably." Perhaps, on reflection, I ought not to be greatly surprised at this sentence, because I recollect that once upon a time I felt as Mr. Anderton evidently does. But I am bound to confess that my feeling about Guilds in those days arose more from prejudice than from knowledge, and also from hearsay in regard to a certain kind of Guild which, so far as I know, in our denomination, has now no existence, if it ever had! I rather surmise that my friend Mr. Anderton's mind, in regard to Guilds, is somewhat in the same condition that mine then was. I should like to ask him: Has he ever been a member of any Guild? Has he ever conducted a Guild in any way? I suspect not, though I may be wrong. But I know Mr. Anderton to be a fair-minded man, and I put it to him as to whether he is entitled to condemn, or speak unfavourably of the whole "Guild Idea," without some wide and intimate knowledge of Guilds as they actually are.

The other sentence which surprised me was this: "He especially disliked the type which encouraged young people to compare their religious experiences and conduct separate services of their own." Much depends, I suppose, on what Mr. Anderton exactly means by the two clauses in this sentence. Taking their most obvious meaning, I am led to ask: Does Mr. Anderton object to adults "comparing their religious experiences"—if they be so inclined? I cannot think he does. Then on what principle does he object to young people "comparing their religious experiences" if they be so inclined? It will not do to say because they have none, for if they have none they cannot compare. Nor will it do to suggest the possibility of priggishness and canting, because it is "religious experiences" Mr. Anderton is dealing with. It goes without saying that cant and hypocrisy are to be discouraged both in old and young, but surely the alternative is not—either cant and hypocrisy or no religious expression at all? If Mr. Anderton is under the impression that comparing of religious experiences may be helpful to adults but injurious to young people, I venture to say that, in my judgment, he is entirely wrong; and I can only imagine again that in this matter he has had no Guild experience. More than ten years of Guild work with young people has taught me a different lesson. Some of the very best religious results to individuals, as well as to Sunday-school and chapel and life generally, I have witnessed as the outcome of our Guild usages. As you will see, Sir, I am so far contending for a principle which Mr. Anderton appears to impugn—namely, the right of young people to speak together concerning their religion, if they be so minded; and I can vouch for the benefit of it to young people themselves. Why may they not speak, under proper circumstances, of spiritual things? Is it because they are "young"? Then at what age may they speak? Is it assumed that young people have no spiritual life? If so, it is a strange assumption. And if they have a spiritual life—as, thank God, we know they have—is it not to be cultivated by a reverent self-expression of it in the company of others? Alas! is it not one of the things we greatly lack in our religion—this helpful habit of religious expression? Let me assure Mr. Anderton that, with us, it is never likely to be overdone. His fears about it are, I fancy, mainly in the abstract. As a matter of fact, instead of expression outrunning experience, in none of our Guilds, as in none of our congregations, does religious expression anything like reach up to the religious experiences at which many have evidently arrived. That our young people, as well as their elders, have a right to speak sincerely together about their religious life, if they so desire, and that they can benefit each other by so doing, I strongly maintain. Yea, I go further. In direct opposition to Mr. Anderton I hold that young people have a right, if they wish and can, to "conduct separate services of their own." As a matter of principle, why may they not?

The priest, I am aware, assumes that God and the people need him as a go-between, or something will go wrong; and is there not an unconscious assumption on our part when we think and act as though under no circumstances would it be safe for any group of our young people to worship God together, or to talk over the better life, with no adult present? Sir, I say, with all emphasis possible, that young people conducting and joining in a religious service of their own would, to my mind, be ideal; for the root of all religion is sincerity, and I have found no souls so unadulteratedly sincere as young people unspoiled by elders in matters of faith.

The every-day fact, however, is that, so far as I know, we simply haven't got this ideal thing—at which Mr. Anderton is girding—in any of our Guilds. For the sake of the spiritual life of our Unitarian body I only wish the day had arrived when young people could and would have "separate services of their own"—i.e., services of, by, and for young people. Surely this is both good Christly Gospel and good common sense. Needless to say, it does not mean that young people are going to have less—they will rather seek more—of our religious guidance when they are more spontaneously and personally concerned in spiritual things.

Space will not now permit me to point out that Mr. Anderton has taken an astonishingly narrow view of the Guild idea. He has mistaken a gargoyle for a cathedral. He has seized upon one somewhat fancied point, and apparently not noticed all else. His address shows that he is as deeply anxious as anyone to give children and young people religious instruction; and he indicates various means. Among these he says that "Preparation classes are excellent." Well, does he not know that a "Preparation class" may be part of a Guild's work? It has been so in our case during the past season, with the result that nineteen young people became members of the congregation. The simple truth is that the Guild, in any place, is just what you like to make it, and may, as it ought to, include every organised effort of the young people, for their own good or others'—recreational, educational, philanthropic, and religious. Every institution, small or large, about a school or church, ought to feel the vitalising influence of the Guild. Ay, and the neighbourhood also. For example, some of our Guild workers, together with the singing class, are this month giving a lantern service at the Workhouse. May I urge Mr. Anderton, not only to read the "Year Book" of the Guilds' Union, in which a summary of what our various Guilds are actually doing is given, but, above all, to attend some active Guild meeting.

TEMPERANCE REFORM.

SIR,—Not as one who desires "License," or with any wish to "cavil and carp," did I protest against Mr. Street's suggestions, but from a firm conviction that the preservation of individual liberty and veracity is of vital importance. Temperance legislation is not under discussion, or I might convince Mr. Street that I am as anxious for the protection of the children as he is himself. Our concern is with suggested modes of action, notably the manufacture of "unwilling converts," about which he preserves a discreet silence in his reply to my letter.

My antipathy to priesthoods, medical and otherwise, led me to protest. I looked at the unwilling converts in the making, and I saw the priest at work with his old weapons in the old way. First the interdict, then the application "of a little firmness," but a sufficient quantity to induce in them "the faith they lack."

I have not denied the right of a man to discharge his doctor or his piper for incompetence or any other valid reason. What I have denied, and still deny is his right to extort more from either than he pays for.

I will cite three parallel cases in which the quality of the action is the same in each:—

Case 1.—The man who discharges his doctor or piper for non-compliance with his (the man's) teetotalism.

Case 2.—The farmer who discharges his labourer for voting opposite to his (the farmer's) wishes at an election.

Case 3.—The managers of a rate-supported school who decline the services of an able teacher because of his Unitarianism.

These latter folk have their defence to hand, fashioned after the manner of Mr. Street, thus:—"Numerous theological experts have decided that Unitarianism, even in small doses, is highly dangerous. We are within our right in declining this teacher, but we do him no harm, as others may employ him with all his heresies." Sir, some of us have been opposing these despotic things for years past, and the imputation of over-sensitiveness about people's liberties will sit lightly upon us, and not deter us in the future.

For the rest, Mr. Street approves a plan of campaign which is wholly obnoxious to me, and there the matter ends between us.

By all means let us foster an enlightened, organised public feeling, but let it come out into the open and have a healthy expression—from the pulpit, on the platform, through the Press, at the mass meeting. Reforms will stand a better chance by these means, than by the doubtful activity of an army of amateur detectives. GEORGE WICKS.

THE ICELANDERS.

SIR,—I am glad to see your Fund for Akureyri is growing, for the poverty of most of the Iceland folk must make it impossible for them to cope unaided with such a loss as that of the recent fire. I have had the pleasure of meeting Miss Olavia Johannsdottir several times in Liverpool and Edinburgh, and have been amazed to hear how much the very poor but brave women of Iceland manage to do for others. Miss Johannsdottir is their representative on the International Women's Temperance Union, as well as being President of their National Union, which includes over 300 members. The Reykjavik Women's Union, amongst other work, supplies poor sick people with flowers, linen, and as far as funds permit, with nourishing food. The women in Bilderdal have a fund of £55 to help the widows of drowned seamen. They are desirous of starting a much-needed Sailors' Home, and of having trained nurses to help the sick poor. Ten young women are now being sent to Scotland to learn nursing.

Miss Johannsdottir edits an illustrated fortnightly paper for children called Oskan ("The Youth"), and is joint editor with Miss Jinsdottir of a monthly women's paper called Tramsikn, which advocates Temperance, equal rights for women, and Christian enlightenment.

Miss Johannsdottir is full of plans for the good of her people, and though she has hardly any means by which to realise them, she keeps a high ideal and does her best. At the Edinburgh International Convention (of the W.W.C.T.U.), she said:—

I want to see the White Ribbon encircling all that is best and noblest in the nature of our women, calling forward the life in God which alone can enable us to meet the manifold needs of humanity.

Besides all her work in Iceland Miss Johannsdottir has more than once been on Temperance lecturing tours in Norway, and I hear from that country how much they long for her to meet them again and continue her work.

OBITUARY.

MR. HENRY TATE.

IT is our sorrowful duty to record the death of Mr. Henry Tate, the fifth son of the late Sir Henry Tate, Bart., which occurred on Wednesday morning at his residence in Ennismore-gardens, S.W., after only a few days' illness, of acute pneumonia. Mr. Tate, who was only forty-eight years of age, had spent most of his life in Liverpool, but quite recently had removed to London. In our issue of Feb. 1 we recorded his participation with Sir John Brunner in the opening of the new Church Hall of the Ullet-road Church, in Liverpool, their joint gift to the congregation, and a memorial to the donors' fathers. Speaking on that occasion, Mr. Tate referred to his father, the memory of whose life and work was still fresh, especially among Unitarians; and it had been our happiness to remember that there was a son, bearing the same name, in whose ready kindness and generosity we could recognise a like spirit to that which rendered the life of the late Sir Henry Tate so abundantly fruitful of good.

The funeral is to be at Brookwood Cemetery this (Saturday) afternoon at 2.30, a special train leaving Waterloo Station at 1.15 P.M.

MRS. S. CHARLESWORTH.

BY the death of Mrs. Samuel Charlesworth, on Jan. 30, already recorded in our columns, the Unitarian body loses one of those converts to our faith whose gratitude for the possession of it begets a devotedness which remains with them during the rest of their lives. Her earliest religious associations were with the Church of England, and she often spoke of the mental distress to which she was subjected by the doctrinal preaching of a narrow-minded Evangelical clergyman during the impressionable period of her opening womanhood. This was in Newcastle-on-Tyne, her native place where, happily for her, the Rev. George Harris was at that time minister of the Hanover-square Chapel. Some non-theological lectures, delivered by Mr. Harris in the town, first attracted her attention to our body. His noble sentiments and fine spirit of philanthropy convinced her that the faith which animated such a man must be of God, and for good to man. The result was that she became a member of his congregation and an intimate friend of his family, an intimacy which she always regarded as one of the happiest privileges of her life. It was a revelation to her of genuine goodness of character, springing from simple and beautiful religious faith. Her volunteer services in the choir were gladly accepted. She became a teacher in the Sunday-school, and took part in all the activities of the congregation with zeal and gladness. It was a source of moral satisfaction to her that her husband served as honorary secretary of the congregation for about five years. The congregations with which they were connected, after leaving Newcastle, were those of Upper Chapel, Sheffield, and of Hackney, London. The marked features of Mrs. Charlesworth's character were her strict conscientiousness, her deep sense of duty, and public spirit. She was an adherent of the woman suffrage movement from its very beginning. She strongly resented anything which tended to repress in the womanly nature the feeling of self-reverence, and considered that to make woman a political cipher did that. She was also a warm supporter of the temperance movement, a total abstainer for about sixty years. She had very nearly completed the eighty-second year of her age.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Skylark and the Mole.

A LARK that built its nest on the ground and soared into the sky to sing, made the acquaintance of a blind Mole that lived underground.

The Mole said to the Lark: "I wonder where you burrow to when you go away singing. It's very pleasant to listen to; but I can't think how you do it. I've tried to sing, but I can't make anything of it. And what puzzles me most is that you seem to crawl up instead of down, and so fast, and such a long way. It must be a wonderful hole you've got."

"You poor dear old thing," said the Lark, "I haven't any hole. And I don't crawl; I fly."

"No hole at all!" said the Mole. "That is dreadful. And what do you mean by flying?"

"Why," said the Lark, "when the air is fresh and the sun bright, I just flutter my wings and I am lifted up and up, soaring and singing. And the higher I fly, the farther I can see over this beautiful world. It's glorious."

"How strangely you do talk!" replied the Mole, "with your 'flying' and 'seeing,' and your 'beautiful world.' Whatever do you mean? It sounds like nonsense. But, perhaps, I don't hear you right; for my ears are covered over to keep the dirt out."

And the Lark laughed a pretty little laugh. And then he said pityingly: "I am so sorry for you. Not sing, and not even know the meaning of flying and seeing, and live in a dark hole in the ground! Why, it's worse than being in a cage! I'd rather die at once."

And the Mole at first was very angry with the Lark for mocking and insulting him and calling his hole "dark."

"It was a capital hole," he said, "with all its galleries and roads complete, and a very comfortable nest and a well down to the brook. And what did the Lark mean by saying it was 'dark'? Did he think there were not plenty of worms?"

He was a fierce little Mole, but his anger was soon over. And when the Lark had apologised for hurting his feelings, he listened patiently to his explanations of flying and seeing till he thought he understood. At last he said: "Well, perhaps the flying suits you; but I should think it must be very hard work, and very dangerous. I am glad I haven't got to do it. But how you can like to have a lot of things touching your eyes all at once I can't make out. But every one to his taste."

And then the Lark flew up a little way and sang of his delight until even the blind, burrowing Mole could understand something of his feeling. And when the Lark came down again, the Mole said: "I suppose there are things I don't understand, and perhaps they may be very fine; but it's very snug and safe underground."

And the Lark said: "Yes, you do miss a great deal, and I could not bear to live as you do. But, after all, I see that if your life isn't so full and bright as it might be, it is good as far as it goes; and, as you can't fly, it's as well to be content with burrowing. And you certainly are out of the way of cats."

And then a man came by thinking of his little crippled girl whom he had left at home singing to her doll. And the Lark and the Mole got out of his way, both of them saying that they were glad they weren't men.

There are several morals in this fable. The one I wanted to teach was this. There are lives, like that of a crippled child, or a blind man feeble, old and poor, which are deprived of many things that make the joy of life for the healthy and strong. We are very sorry for them, as the Lark was for the Mole. And sometimes we may feel that such a life cannot be worth having. Yet it is better, richer and fuller than the life of a Mole, and even that is good as far as it goes. The human life, though shut out from many good things, may be rich with love and trust and submission. We all want something we have not got. But we all have a great deal that is very wonderful for which we may be thankful. We have what we have, whatever we may lack. And even those for whom we are very sorry may find it good to be alive.

WE KNOW.

"JESUS Christ is a man," they say—
Say it to you and to me;
"Never wrought on the land,
Never walked on the sea.

"Son of a human mother,
Human father as well,
Did not ascend into heaven,
Did not descend into hell.

"Nor raise the dead from their sleep,
Nor heal the sick of their pain,
Nor give to the dumb their speech,
And eyes to the blind again.

"Only a poor, sad man,
Helpless for weal or for woe;
Living, as all of us can,
And dying, as all of us know."

Sun of our radiant days,
Star of our loneliest nights,
Guide of our dreariest ways,
Friend of our dearest delights!

We who have walked on the sea,
Turbulent billows of fear,
Not fearing because of thee,
Not sinking because thou wert near;

We who have felt our dead souls
Glow as a coal at thy breath,
We know thy lordship of life—
We know thy lordship of death.

Where thou dost dwell is our heaven,
What thou hast been we would be.
Leaven us, Lord, with thy leaven,
Help us to toil after thee.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 15, 1902.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

THE annual meeting of the National Education Association was held on Tuesday afternoon at the Westminster Palace Hotel, the President, Lord BATTERSEA, in the chair. In addition to the regular business of the annual meeting, the following resolution was unanimously adopted :—

That this meeting calls upon Parliament to promote a system of National Education which shall be efficient, progressive, unsectarian, and under popular control; and to oppose all legislative and administrative proposals having a contrary tendency.

The passing of this and other business resolutions gave opportunity for a declaration of principle in the matter of education and for a full consideration of the present position of affairs.

The friends of education, Lord BATTERSEA said, had reason to mourn the conduct of the Government in the past, and while they did not yet know what the new Education Bill was to be, in the light of past experience they could not but look with anxiety to the future. They were now in the seventh year of what must be called a national education crisis, and no Government in his experience had ever promised so much and done so little for education. The forces of reaction had prevailed, and the interests of popular education had suffered. Their Association had no sectarian or partisan interest to uphold, their one aim was to serve the cause of the education of the people, and they would willingly support any Minister, to whatever party he belonged, who made it his object to provide national education worthy of the name.

The PRESIDENT's contention that the education policy of the present Government was dominated by sectarian interests was strongly enforced by several speakers. Mr. LYULPH STANLEY declared that there was no true educational force behind the Government, but two forces of a very different character, represented in the first place by the demand for clerical control, enforced by a band of clerically-minded laymen, with all the narrowness, but none of the responsibility of the clergy; and in the second place the dislike of a genuine progressive education for the people. Against these great social and ecclesiastical forces they could only set the power of direct popular control, and that must be maintained at all cost. So also that veteran educationist, the Rev. E. F. M. MACCARTHY, of Birmingham, insisted. They might endure, he said, to see the School Boards abolished, provided something better was put in their place, but they must die in the last ditch rather than suffer the new authority to be less popularly elected than the present Boards; they must stand for popular as against clerical control.

There was a general concensus of opinion that the education authority, whatever it might be, ought to be elected ad hoc, and directly by the people. Mr. R. CAMERON, M.P., urged that the County Council would not be the best authority, and this was also Dr. CLIFFORD'S view, because so few of the councillors really cared for education, and the influence of the squire and the parson would too largely prevail; whereas the interests of education were so great that no body charged with a multiplicity of other duties could give due attention to them. On the other hand it was pointed out that the administrative area must not be too small, for, as Mr. NORTH BUXTON said, the work of the small country Boards had often been as bad as that of the Voluntary schools. The county, he added, might be the rating authority, so as to ensure the equalisation of rates. What must be aimed at in rural districts, Mr. LYULPH STANLEY said, was an area for each authority sufficiently large to secure a good representation, but at the same time small enough to make it possible not merely for the gentry, but for capable working-men, who had made their way up from the popular schools themselves, to take an active part in the administration.

The subject of evening continuation schools was not forgotten. The PRESIDENT, with whom this has long been a subject of special interest, dwelt upon its extreme importance, and pointed out how Germany, Norway and Sweden, and particularly Switzerland, are far ahead of us in this matter, and Mr. STEWART HEADLAM reminded the members of Parliament present of the urgency of the question, since the Act of last session would expire on the last day of July, and something must be done immediately if next winter's work in the continuation schools is to be properly matured and successfully carried out; nothing but fresh legislation would suffice, and it would not do to wait for the Government's large education measure.

On the general outlook, in spite of some natural foreboding, signs of encouragement were noted. Mrs. MAITLAND, who urged that the devolution of education to the borough and district councils should be resisted, because that would mean the shutting out of women from their rightful share in the administration, said that her experience up and down the country convinced her that there was a great awakening of interest in the subject of education among the people themselves, those whose children were in the schools, and many who were young enough to have been themselves brought up in the schools; and at the same time the great trade and co-operative societies were showing that they were more fully alive than ever to the gravity of the situation. Thus she hoped that a force of public opinion would be generated sufficient to deter the Government from any too retrograde measures. And Sir JOHN BRUNNER also spoke words of hearty encouragement. The Prince of WALES's pointed saying that "the old country must wake up" had been of immense influence, and there had been a great change in public opinion during the last few months. In the North of England he noted that a number of Conservative leaders had been speaking on the subject of education on lines almost as broad as their own, and it was very widely recognised that they must be rid of sectarian strife as a hindrance to education. After all it was only a small body of men who put forward obscurantist views, and at heart the country was not clerical.

The work of the National Education Association, of which Mr. A. J. MUNDELLA is the active secretary, has been invaluable, especially in its efforts towards the formation of a sound public opinion. Of its publications the annual report gives the following account :—

The demand for leaflets, pamphlets, and similar matter has grown during the past year with the growth of public interest in the Education question. Much of the work done by the Committee in this department has not been published, being in the form of memoranda on intricate points, and other matter for use in Parliament and the Press. For the short fight on the Education Bills and the Codes a number of leaflets were produced and published, and withdrawn when the points at issue were settled. The Committee have also published or assisted in the publication of various pamphlets and other papers which, whilst helping in the formation of public opinion, were not exactly in accord with the principles of the Association, and were, therefore, not included officially amongst its recognised publications.

The "Education Crisis," first published in 1896, has been revised and to a large extent re-written; a new pamphlet dealing solely with the present position, entitled "The Education of the People," has been prepared. These will be published at an early date.

"The Committee," it is further stated in the Report, "is working in friendly alliance with the various Education Leagues in different parts of the country. It especially welcomes the Labour Education League, which has been formed by leaders of the Trade Unions, and notes with pleasure that the Free Church Council and many political organisations are giving increased attention to the Education question."

In view of the present crisis the Association is prepared for strenuous exertions, and has opened a "special campaign fund." Its operations must naturally depend on the amount of financial support accorded by the friends of education throughout the country. The Hon. E. LYULPH STANLEY is the treasurer, and the central offices of the Association are at Surrey House, Victoria Embankment, W.C.

A TRUE MINISTRY.

BY THE REV. W. G. TARRANT, B A.*

IT is very easy for us all to miss the full significance of things, through their familiarity. Scenes of Nature, of the city, and of the home, which are full of interest to the alert mind, are passed by heedlessly because we see their like frequently. Dear faces which if we could see them once, and then no more, would stir our heart of hearts, voices which would appeal to the best that is in us, come and go about us daily and find us too little sensible of their value. So it is very often with the services of the church. But quietly consider: one hour of prayer together with our fellow-creatures in the presence of the Creator and Father of us all, who knows and loves us all; one season of peaceful delight as we adore God's glory and goodness; one earnest time of search for life's deepest truths and of communion, spirit with spirit—who shall reckon the value of these things for human hearts! Now and again—would it were oftener—the full glory of such occasions bursts upon the mind; the mist of custom and commonplace is lifted, and we know ourselves there in the light of the presence Divine. How easy, how simple and inevitable it is then for us, weak and erring as we are, to trust, to hope, and to will—how foolish become our fears, how ignoble our sins! Let any of us, whatever our station in life, come into such a presence-chamber of God, the mature man of business, the lad just taken on in the office or workshop, the mothers and girls who may each do so much to make home and the world sweet and beautiful—let any child of man be thus led to feel himself a child of God—then, how the whole field of conduct is flooded with light, how the mind leaps toward things "lovely and of good report," and life, in spite of all its troubles and shadows, is felt and known to be a blessing!

It is to help us so that the church exists. It is to set our feet on the ladder that reaches to heaven, and if we cannot wholly mount it yet ourselves, to put us where the angels of God come down to cheer us and gladden our hearts.

Do you think that it is easy for a church to fulfil such a function? Can any one man, however gifted, however earnest, at all times command himself and his powers, so that he needs no help as he takes the lead in promoting such a service to humanity? Who—who is sufficient for these things? May God forgive the man who does not know his need of all the help that can be brought to him in his ministry! May God pity the poor church that does not know that finest part of its blessed privilege—the power it has to help its helper, to minister grace and cheerfulness and strength to that one heart which is there to minister these things to all!

Be trustful to this man; if there is need, be patient. But, above all, be helpful. You expect much from your minister. Good: never do him the wrong of expecting little. Never do him the worse wrong of leaving him alone to do it. Remember that, be he equipped by nature and education as well as he may, there is nothing so little self-dependent as the mind of the preacher. Other men, such e.g. as students absorbed in purely intellectual labours, may in the pride of conscious power resent your interference—though the world's wisest men of science have usually accepted willingly the merest grains of truth that lowly helpers might bring them. But the preacher is engaged in more than intellectual problems. He is not an artist bent on solitary achievements in his studio. The preacher has not only to discover but to impart; and besides teaching men to know he has to help them to become. In order to affect the lives of men as he desires he must in some way get to their hearts, win their respect and their confidence, and if possible their love. Only if he has these things can he speak the Word of God with living power.

Now, much of the minister's work may be done, and ought to be done, in private intercourse; but his characteristic duty is to speak in public; and here the need of the church's help is obvious. What can more finely express the intimate and vital connection between the public speaker and those whom he addresses, than Mr. Gladstone's saying that the orator "receives as vapour from the audience what he pours back as a flood!" We all feel the truth of this statement—at least all who have had any share in such work. If a preacher knows, or believes, or only but half suspects, that they who hear him are out of touch with him, if some are evidently indifferent—I will not suggest a harsher temper—it is hard for him, if not, indeed, impossible under such conditions, to speak to any great effect the words of help and healing. We read that in one place Jesus himself could do no mighty work "because of their unbelief." How should such as we, then, succeed in such a case!

But when things are not so, but far otherwise, when the minister knows from his life with the people through the week that their hearts are with him; when Sunday by Sunday he looks around and sees them all there—from the dear grey heads bowed with years and solemnly reverend, down to the bright-eyed little ones—each in his well-known place, with looks attentive and eloquently expectant; when the voices of the great wide family blend as one in the song of praise, and the hush of common prayer is felt throughout the place—then it is that the soul that passionately wishes to serve of his best and longs to be indeed a "Minister of the Word" is set free in heart and mind, in thought and love, for a full and effective ministry. Men may say, after such a glorious hour is over, that he "preached well"; but the glory is not his, the secret is the Lord's. Minister and people have but prepared the way of the Lord, and what was but a wilderness has blossomed like the rose. It is at such times that the Church is one whole embodied sacrament, a means of divine grace to weak, suffering, toiling humanity. Then it is that young hearts, like some of these here to-day, see brightest visions of their life in years to come and vow their secret vows to the Searcher of all hearts. Then the worn and troubled and sinful are visited by new gleams of the Light behind all shadows and the Love that saves to the uttermost. Then the strong and vigorous, who were, nevertheless, growing a little weary, perhaps, in well-doing, renew their strength and form fresh plans for good works of all kinds, for God's poor and sick and ignorant and feeble children, their brethren. And then, even the aged begin to sing, if it were but the song of Simeon, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace—for mine eyes have seen thy salvation."

Are those the hours you desire to experience as often as you and your minister shall come together here to seek the blessing of the Father on all your work wherever it may take you? Is this the atmosphere that you would have so diffused through this place that, while you all, old and young, to whom it is a spiritual home shall delight in it more and more, even the casual stranger from the streets shall at once begin to feel himself drawn towards a closer fellowship with you?

If this is truly your heart's desire then, I charge you, remember this day! Remember its prayerful hopes and secret resolves! Remember the days gone by, and let tender thoughts of them sweeten your whole life; and if any of you are conscious of wasted opportunities, let the time past suffice for them, and hereafter walk in newness of life. Remember, I beseech you all, remember the splendid possibilities, the glorious heritage that may be yours as a Christian Church, as a fountain of health and gladness, light and life, in this great city of ours. If the work grows toilsome, if at times it seems at best but very humble work, remember the words of him who said, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these, my brethren, ye did it unto me." And not only here, not only on one day in the week, but in your homes, in your daily life, in your secret prayers, remember him who gives himself now to labour among you and "to watch for your souls, as one that shall give account—that he may do this with joy, and not with grief."

* The latter part of a charge to the congregation delivered at the Induction of the Rev. R. H. Greaves as minister of the Highgate Unitarian Church, on Saturday, Jan. 25.

I DO not know of any one thing which on the whole conduces more to individual comfort, on the journey through the rough ways of this troubled life, than a hopeful temper, which to the poor is a mine of riches, and to the afflicted the sun that scatters the clouds of night. We owe it to our fellows to show such hope as is in us. Courage many men are capable of who are not capable of hope. "Hope evermore, O man; for e'en as thy thought is, so are the things that thou seest."—Atlantic Monthly.

THE CONFERENCE AND THE CHURCHES.

HAVING received for publication last week the letter of the Newington Green Church to the officers of the National Conference, we asked a member of the Conference Committee (not the President) to put another view of the matter before our readers. The following is his response :—

As the Committee of the National Conference, in response to requests from many churches for further information on the appeal for a regular income, have announced, by an interim circular, their intention of issuing a further and more detailed statement of the case, it seems a little previous to be sending criticisms to the Press before the Committee's promised statement has been received. But as the Newington Church could not wait any longer to unburden its soul, and as its criticism is at once so courteous in its tone and so misleading in its assumptions, it seems to call for an instant reply. Of course, no one can speak for the Committee itself except the President; but as one who has attended all its deliberations, I am familiar with the mind and intention of those who have urged the desirability of securing from the churches themselves an income sufficient for the proper discharge of the duties imposed on the Conference.

In the first place, it is an entirely ungrounded assumption that at the bottom of this movement there is a question of a new name for our churches. No mention has ever been made in or by the Committee of names old or new. Many of us who support the Committee's proposal are heartily sick of the controversy about names, and would willingly offer to hang, draw and quarter any one who mentioned the subject for the next twenty years! "'Tis life whereof our nerves are scant," and no name will bring upon us the four winds of heaven. The Committee of the Conference are not so childish as to suppose that salvation for our churches lies in a name, or that prejudice against us can be broken down by the adoption of a brand-new designation. Our Newington friends tell us, as if it were a great discovery, "No mere change of name can alter radical facts, or make us more commonly acceptable to the religious world." Who ever said or thought it could?

A second ungrounded assumption is that some kind of ecclesiastical tyranny must of necessity follow from any closer fellowship of our churches in voluntary union. There is a previous assumption which calls for remark, — that the National Conference has become a formal ecclesiastical association; and innocent readers will at once conjure up visions of Church Courts trying heretics, Councils formulating creeds, Synods deposing ministers, Assemblies exercising discipline, and all the rest of the ancient paraphernalia. "Ecclesiastical Association" sounds terrifying, but perhaps an ordinary man may be allowed to discriminate. The National Conference is only an ecclesiastical association in exactly the same sense, and not indeed to the same extent, as our District Associations. They, in fact, have many more and much greater possibilities of ecclesiastical tyranny over the churches than the Conference has or is ever likely to have. Yet did ever any one hear of their "seriously compromising the liberty of the constituuent churches and ministers"? The idea is absurd, but not a tithe so absurd as the assumption that the Conference has become an ecclesiastical association which can exercise ecclesiastical tyranny. Really we are not to be frightened by that bogey of a word "ecclesiastical. If three churches unite together to promote a mission, or to provide a joint pastorate, or to take common action of any sort, that is an ecclesiastical association, and there can be no restriction on the perfect liberty of each so long as each is free to come in or go out of the arrangement. Nor is it the case, as is erroneously assumed, that the organisation of Free Churches in voluntary union has always or generally "seriously compromised the liberty," &c. History does not confirm that statement. The Baptists, the Society of Friends, and the Congregationalists, have each voluntarily come into a much closer union for common purposes than is known by us. Seventy years ago, when the Congregational Union was formed, exactly the same dark prophecies of the tyranny that would follow from such an attempt to organise the churches for mutual help were sent to the Press. The Society of Friends furnish a yet more striking instance of a well-organised union in which the individual churches yet retain full liberty of action. Nor is it true that such an organisation "must needs narrow down the existing varieties of church life, and prove a hindrance to that spiritual spontaneity which might call new forms, and, therefore, new forces into existence." (I will not pause to ask how "forms" can call "forces" into existence!) As a matter of fact there is as wide a variety of opinion and of church life among Congregationalists as among ourselves; an impartial observer might not be wrong in concluding that they were far less conservative in habit than ourselves, and readier to try new experiments, and launch out in new directions of service. Closely organised as is the Society of Friends, opinions range among them all the way from Unitarianism to the narrowest Evangelicalism, and in their early morning schools they give us a splendid instance of the church adapting itself to new conditions as a result of its spiritual spontaneity.

Closer fellowship in voluntary union for mutual help and common action is all that the most ecclesiastical among us are after, and that is quite compatible with the rocky Individualism of our Free Churches. Of course, union and cohesion and the agglutinous instinct may be carried to the point of self-loss, and yet we do not so flourish under a rocky Individualism as to encourage us to believe that the last word has been said on Church life.

The last assumption I have time to notice is that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association could easily discharge all the functions of such a union of the churches as we have in the Conference. But what is to save us from ecclesiastical tyranny under the B. and F. any more than under the Conference? Much as I honour the B. and F., if it came to a question touching the freedom of a church or a minister I would rather trust the matter to the properly-appointed delegates of the churches than to any society of private subscribers, which anybody on earth is free to join. But it is not because of any fear that it would seek to exercise ecclesiastical tyranny that I do not wish the B. and F. to exercise the functions of the Conference. For the matter of that, whether in the Conference or the B. and F., our ministers and laymen are the same broad-minded, genial, magnanimous, liberty-loving men, and we may dismiss, as the most childish of all fears, the idea that anybody is going to trample on our freedom.

But it remains that the B. and F. is an association of individual subscribers and not of churches, and that fact alone is sufficient to indicate that there is a line of work for the Conference which cannot be undertaken by the B. and F. There is not, there need not be, the least antagonism between the two. Each has its own functions and sphere, each may supplement the work of the other, each may be to the other a source of strength and encouragement.

CONFERENCE AND UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

IT is evident that there are questions with regard to the position and work of the National Conference, and its relation to the churches and other Associations, which need to be clearly thought out, that we may be brought, if possible, to one mind as to the true ideal of our religious community, and the channels into which its whole strength of active service may be most effectively thrown.

As a contribution to this discussion we are glad to reproduce here the greater part of the leading article in the February number of the Nottingham High Pavement and Peas Hill Chronicle. The article opens with a reference to our recent article on Mr. Gannett's plea for "Reconciliation," and the response of Dr. Washington Gladden and Dr. Whitou from the side of Liberal Orthodoxy. From this point the article proceeds :—

"While we rejoice to observe this temper in our orthodox friends, it is important for us to consider what is to be our own attitude when confronted with these broadening tendencies. There are, it seems to us, two dangers to avoid. (1) It were all too easy, in a generous mood of universal kindliness, to belittle strong convictions, and weaken by amiable compromise the firm fibre of our theology. It were a cheap policy and a cheaper principle to eliminate real differences of thought, and by seeking the greatest common measure of identical ideas end in a sprawling, mawkish unsectarianism, without intellectual power or spiritual reality. (2) It were still easier, perhaps, to work for victory instead of life, and meet this broadening orthodoxy with a harsh demand for unconditional surrender. It has been alleged that there are not wanting disturbing signs that some extremists have so far forgotten our principles and ideals that they resent every approach on the part of liberal orthodoxy, and every welcome on the part of the freer faith. They say, in effect, 'let these advanced men call themselves "Unitarian"; let them lay down their terminology and unconditionally surrender. Once our doctrinal victory is acknowledged we will negotiate with them; but until then don't let us fidget about reconciliation.' That is the tone of a denominational bully. The Evangelical Free Church Council has given us the cold shoulder. The creeds and articles of the Anglican Church and the confessions and trust deeds of orthodox Nonconformity excommunicate us; but that is one of the strongest reasons why we should not in turn retaliate with the same essentially unchristian conduct. Let us rather include, wherever possible, those who exclude us. To insist that a church or an individual should adopt our label is the complete inversion and betrayal of our non-credal and non-subscribing principle. It makes a doctrine or a doctrinal name once more the condition of spiritual union. Having protested with magnificent heroism for over two hundred years against the orthodox notion that certain dogmas are necessary to salvation, and that doctrinal unanimity is necessary to religious union, are we now asked to make the repetition of a theological watch-word a condition of entrance into the Chief Shepherd's fold or into any portion of that fold? We have a better opinion of both the Christian instincts and the common sense of Unitarians. Whilst striving to see clearly and speak veraciously, to think truly and act honestly, they will not foolishly abandon the splendid position they occupy for any sectarian isolation or temporary denominational triumph. Recognising now, as always, that the only abiding union is to be found in spiritual life and moral conduct, they will seek, as God's missionaries, to spread abroad that principle of comprehension, so that all who profess and call themselves Christians—and those who do not—may be led into the way of truth, and hold the faith in unity of spirit, in the bond of peace, and in righteousness of life.

"How can we best work towards this end? One way is to encourage such sympathetic intercommunion of diverse minds as we saw realised in London last May, in the International Conference, when great leaders of various ecclesiastical connections all the world over met as brethren of the Liberal Faith. There was no intellectual weakness or doctrinal compromise there: there was mutual respect for divergent habits of thought and phraseology, and there was a true and fundamental spiritual unity which those who experienced it can never forget as long as they live. It is that spirit which finds expression in Manchester College, Oxford, in our Churches, and in our National Conference. Our Conference is in no sense a rival of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. It is differently constituted; it is more spacious in scope; it has a wider sweep and different functions, because it is not restricted to the diffusion of Unitarian Christianity, but includes Unitarian and non-Unitarian. Moreover, in the words of the Essex Hall Year Book, 'the Conference is intended to be the representative of the churches: the British and Foreign Unitarian Association is governed by a committee appointed by its individual subscribers.' Both organisations are needed, and both have necessary and legitimate spheres of work. To be loyal to the one is not to be disloyal to the other. There is every reason why the British and Foreign Unitarian Association should continue its doctrinal propaganda; but there is an equally urgent reason why the National Conference should express nationally the same Catholic spirit that the International Conference expressed internationally. It can thus prove the basis of union for kindred churches and spirits of varying degrees of orthodoxy and heterodoxy. Very heartily, therefore, do we commend the National Conference to the fullest confidence of our readers, and very heartily too do we rejoice that at a full council meeting of the High Pavement Chapel it was decided, not only to continue the annual collection for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, but also to grant annual collections to our National Conference. This is a fine testimony to our council's breadth of outlook, and affords an example of generosity which we venture to hope our churches throughout the country will be swift to follow."

IRISH UNIVERSITY EDUCATION.

SIR,—Your North of Ireland correspondent seems well convinced it should be a matter of great importance to our churches to keep Belfast Queen's College free in every way from doctrinal influence. So it has been from the first, so it is, so it is likely to remain.

Belfast Queen's College, however, is but a part, and the smaller part, of that political controversy which, since the Synod of Thurles, has been troubling the waters of Irish feeling, and the brains of Great Britain's statesmen.

In consequence of that Synod, John Henry Newman was at work in Dublin for some years. And now it is the Society of Jesus, which by its University College is the Roman Catholic hierarchical organ to prevent the poison of unsectarian learning corrupting the Hibernian conscience.

This University College having an indirect subsidy of State money—half of the Fellows of the Royal University who hold examinerships, &c, must belong to this Roman Catholic seminary, and their £400 a year in the case of each such Fellow helps the College, Stephen's Green—causes in the Royal University and its Senate, and in the mind, I believe, of President Hamilton, himself one of that Senate, a very divergent effect.

They who are Denominationalists want a Roman Catholic University directly State-subsidised, and provided duly in history, philosophy, &c., with that special "atmosphere" of which Mr. Balfour some while ago spoke, whereas the Non-Sectarians in this small assembly of the Royal University Senate hope that a teaching university on the lines of the late Queen's University may be started, if nowhere else, at least in Ulster.

Why what should be in Belfast should not be through Ireland it will be for Non-Subscribing believers in unsectarian education to explain. Education paid for by the State is to give knowledge of earth, air, sea, and sky as physically objective, and the same for all alike.

If religionists want religious teaching at the expense of the State, they are not content with the dictum of the Master, "To Cæsar, Cæsar's." They want the coins of the realm for their own pockets.

Belfast, Feb. 10. ROBT. J. ORR.

I BELIEVE that there is no away, that no love, no life, goes ever from us; it goes as He went, that it may come again, deeper and closer and surer, to be with us always even to the end of the world.—George Macdonald.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE nineteenth annual general meeting of the contributors was held at Dr. Williams's Library, Gordon-square, on Wednesday afternoon, the 12th inst., Mr. William Long, President, in the chair. There were present also the Revs. S. A. Steinthal and J. E. Carpenter, Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., Messrs. David Martineau, P. J. Worsley, Charles Harding, and A. W. Worthington, hon. sec., who reported apologies for non-attendance from Mr. Edgar Chatfeild Clarke, the treasurer, who was absent through ill-health, Messrs. Harry Rawson, E. Clephan, Julian Winser, and Frank Preston.

Mr. Worthington read the annual report as follows:—

REPORT.

The object of this Fund, which is to aid "Non-subscribing Congregations in the maintenance of faithful and efficient Ministers," entails, for various reasons, a responsible and anxious duty upon its managers.

In dealing with applications for help, the preliminary question arises whether the congregation seeking aid can rightly be classed as non-subscribing. It is further desirable to ascertain whether a congregation raises a sufficient portion of its minister's salary to guarantee its independent continuance. While a congregation relies mainly on the support of a district, or a general, Association, it does not clearly fall within the objects of the Sustentation Fund. Duly honouring every self-sacrificing and devoted effort to plant the Kingdom of God in fresh fields, the Board has yet to regard, as its own special duty, the aid of congregations which possess a recognised vitality and status sufficient to ensure at least their permanence, and also a hope of their ultimate independence.

Thus it is important to ascertain that the members of a congregation are themselves doing their utmost to provide an adequate stipend for their minister, and otherwise to support him in his labours. For it is incumbent on them to remember that the main object of the Fund is to assist and stimulate congregations to improve the stipends of their ministers, not to lessen or supersede their own contributions. Occasionally the managers have recognised that the minister of an aided congregation has laboured with an energy that deserves encouragement. In almost every such case, the conditional offer of an increased grant from this Fund has been cheerfully met by a corresponding addition to the congregational contribution for its minister's stipend.

Lastly, the inquiry as to the "faithfulness and efficiency" of the minister himself, touches necessarily upon delicate questions as to his character, ability, education and energy, and also upon the extent to which he concentrates his time and activities on his ministerial work.

The Board rejoices that the information obtained by inquiries on these various points, chiefly supplied by the congregations and ministers themselves, very rarely shows any reason for declining the application of a congregation for aid; while the uniformly grateful acknowledgment of their grants, both by congregations and ministers, proves the great advantages arising from this Fund, and induces the hope that its distribution is recognised as being made in a sympathetic spirit.

The funds at the disposal of the Board receive occasional additions from donations and bequests. On the other hand, the annual subscriptions tend to decrease through the loss of old friends of the Fund. Only by an occasional appeal can the subscription list be maintained at a regular amount. No large donations have been received this year, and, as the Treasurer's statement shows, the expenditure has exceeded the income. It is much to be desired that the representatives of the subscribers whom we have lost would continue their contributions, and thus, in addition to helping the Fund, maintain the continuity of many honoured names upon the subscription list.

At the distribution of the funds last midsummer, the Board took into consideration its growing resources, and determined to make grants for the year to the full amount of the annual income. Indeed, in faith that such a policy would meet with support, the grants were increased, as will appear from the following list:—

The Board could not make grants to all the congregations from whom it received appeals. One or two in the North of England have been referred to the Augmentation Fund, which deals with English congregations of a similar character in counties touched by, or north of, the River Trent. One or two congregations to whom the official forms of applications have been supplied have not returned them, and in three cases applications have been, for various reasons, unwillingly declined.

* In these cases the condition has been complied with, and the increased grant will be paid.

The Board have had much pleasure in securing the assistance of Mr. Edwin Tate as a coöpted manager in place of his late father, Sir Henry Tate, thus retaining an honoured name upon the roll; and it also rejoices to add to its number—in place of the emeritus veteran, Rev. T. L. Marshall—another minister, Rev. C. C. Coe, who toiled energetically for the establishment of this Fund, and whose prolonged experience and wide acquaintance with our congregations render him peculiarly fitted for the post.

It has been for some time the intention of the Board to appoint a deputation to canvass for contributions in Ireland, to which country considerable grants have been made year by year, although its wealth has not contributed to the Fund in the same proportion as that of England. But the inquiries made did not encourage such an effort, and the congregations seem more prepared to help the Fund by collections than by individual contributions.

It was thought even more desirable to postpone any effort of this kind, as the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, M.A., and Mr. Cogan Conway undertook a mission to Ireland on behalf of the Ministers' Superannuation Fund, which, we rejoice to learn, will be shortly established with a capital exceeding £20,000. Our contributors will heartily welcome into existence this younger child of the National Conference, from which the Sustentation Fund itself formerly sprang. The objects of the two Funds are entirely similar and mutually helpful—the one seeking to aid a minister, while health and strength render him "efficient"; the other encouraging his own efforts to provide an income for the time of increasing years and failing strength. The two Funds, with the same origin and similar objects, will jointly help in the important work of freeing the life of our ministers from the harass and anxieties of too scanty means.

It remains only to fulfil the mournful duty of recording, with respect and regret, the names of contributors of whose support the Fund has been deprived during the year that has now closed, many of them having reached, as will be seen, a venerable age. The list includes Mrs. Scholey, of London, who numbered 97 years; Mrs. Joseph Lupton, who had reached 83 years, and Mrs. T. Chatfeild Clarke; Mr. William Blake was 85, and Mr. J. Holme Nicholson 76 years of age. Of another departed veteran, Mr. John Every, we cannot record the age. J. L., another original subscriber, has also passed away. Younger members of some—we trust of all—these families, will perpetuate familiar names upon our list of contributors.

The statement of accounts for the year 1901, also presented by Mr. Worthington in the absence of the Treasurer, showed a balance in hand at the beginning of the year of £333 7s. 7d., receipts from donations £29 17s. 8d., annual subscriptions £392 12s., interest on investments £828 16s. 11d., income-tax returned £29 8s. 1d., making a total of £1,614 2s. 3d. The expenditure included grants amounting to £1,252 9s. 7d,, a figure differing from the total of grants in the annual report, because covering a period of two different half years. A balance of £316 12s. 2d. was carried down to 1902.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, pointed out that the managers had again followed the course of spending the whole of their available income in grants. They had a strong feeling that they ought not to accumulate income as capital so long as there was any needy case to be met. They were well assured of the good done by the Fund.

Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU, in seconding, spoke a word of warning, for while he quite agreed that it was not desirable to amass any considerable sum, he thought they should keep a small balance to meet any emergency.

The resolution having been passed, and Messrs. David Ainsworth and Edgar Chatfeild Clarke, the retiring managers, having been re-elected, the cordial thanks of the meeting, on the motion of Sir JOHN BRUNNER, were given to Mr. Long for his services as President.

Mr. LONG, in acknowledging the vote, said that he had been President much longer than he had intended, but it had been a great pleasure to him to take that part in the work. He then moved that Mr. Harry Rawson be elected President for the ensuing year. Mr. Rawson had been with Mr. Worthington secretary of the Fund since its establishment, and up to the present had never missed one of the half-yearly meetings.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, in seconding the resolution, said that they owed the existence of the Fund to the paper Mr. Rawson read at the Conference in Liverpool in 1882. Nothing they could do could show the fulness of their gratitude to him for his many services.

Mr. Edgar Chatfeild Clarke was re-elected Treasurer, on the motion of Mr. WORTHINGTON, seconded by Mr. CARPENTER, with warm expressions of sympathy with him in his illness.

Thanks were accorded to the Hon. Secretaries, on the motion of Mr. WORSLEY, seconded by Mr. HARDING, Mr. Worthington being re-elected with Mr. Frank Preston in place of Mr. Rawson.

Further votes of thanks were passed to Mr. E. W. Marshall, the hon. auditor, to the trustees of Dr. Williams's Library, and to the President for his services in the chair, and the meeting was brought to a close.

KHASI HILLS UNITARIANS.

A REPORT from Mr. Hajom Kissor Singh of Unitarian work in the Khasi Hills district of Assam tells of the Nongtalang Unitarian Conference held Dec. 28, 29 and 30 last year. On the Saturday evening a devotional service and welcome meeting were held, when representatives from various places, including the churches in Jowai, Raliang, and Shillong, were present, and also a representative of the Shillong Brahmo Somaj.

On Sunday morning the first service was at 7 o'clock, and at 10 A.M. sermons were preached by Mar Singh on "The Abounding Grace of God," and by the Rev. D. Edwards on "Working out our Salvation." At 1.30 P.M. Babu R. Singh Berry, of the Brahmo Somaj, preached on "The Relation of the Creatures to their Creator," and Mr. Hajom Kissor Singh on "Our Duty to do the Work of God as Jesus did." In the afternoon several of the leaders joined in singing and preaching in the thoroughfares of the village.

On Monday the business meeting was held, and delegates reported on the work of their churches. The President of the Union, Mr. Kissor Singh, read the report of the Executive Committee, which expressed regret that the B. and F.U.A. was unable to send out a missionary to take charge of the work in the Khasi Hills, and recorded with sorrow the death of the Rev. S. Fletcher

Williams. It mentioned the issue of 400 copies of the chapter on "Sin and Salvation" from the Khasi Catechism of Liberal Religion, written by Mr. Kissor Singh, and the receipt of a sum of 75 rupees from the late Miss Durning Smith for the Church Building Fund, 65 rupees being given to Nongtalang and 15 rupees to Máwpat. Collections for the Union Funds were made, and individual subscribers contributed 48 rupees. The permanent Mission Fund amounted to 546 rupees. Mr. Kissor Singh reported a visit to the church at Raliang, July 28, 1901, where all the Unitarians, including the Rev. D. Edwards, their minister, are cultivators. There is a morning-school, and the Khasi Catechism on the "Religion of God" is used, as at Jowai. Oct. 20-26 Mr. Kissor Singh was at Shillong, and conducted services and preached in the meeting-houses at Mawkhar and Labau. At Máwpat he found the people hopeful and united, and preparing to build a church. The work at Shillong is in the charge of Mar Singh.

Resolutions of sorrow for the death of Mr. Fletcher Williams, and of greeting to the Rev. J. T. Sunderland were passed. Subsequently the account of the Mission Fund was read and passed.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

ONE of the excellent offices rendered to our churches by the B. and F.U.A. is the commission it occasionally gives to some distinguished friend to visit an outlying province. The value of such deputations is found not only in the wise counsels given to our own people and the information reported to the parent society; their chief benefit, it seems to me, is found in the personal influence which our friends exert and the inspiration they leave behind. In an isolated district like ours the temperature, so to speak, of our churches is raised by the occasional presence of enthusiastic and sympathising friends. During this season we have welcomed amongst us Dr. Blake Odgers and Professor Estlin Carpenter, and both these gentlemen have quickened our courage and stimulated our zeal. Dr. Blake Odgers was with us at the anniversary meeting of our missionary association, and his breezy optimism swept away many dusty cobwebs, making us all feel fresher and brighter for our work. There was an excellent report in one of our local papers of his evening address, in which he enunciated with great plainness of speech some of the irrational elements of "Orthodox" theology. I know one good lady who cut this report out of the paper and carries it in her purse to be studied by herself and read to her friends. She says it is better than any Unitarian tract she ever met with, and that she never before so clearly understood what Unitarianism means. But, apart from his platform utterances, Dr. Odgers took infinite pains to secure information as to the condition and prospects of our congregations, and his report must have been most helpful to the Committee of the B. and F.U.A. Later on, we welcomed Professor Carpenter to Newcastle. The special purpose of his visit was to deliver the well-known course of lectures on the criticism of the New Testament. It was most encouraging, in this busy, commercial city, to find large audiences meeting, week after week, to listen with rapt attention to these scholarly discourses; and the enthusiasm with which the vote of thanks was accorded on the closing evening must have assured the lecturer that his time and labour had not been spent in vain. But, perhaps, the memory that lingers most pleasantly in our minds is that of what I may call a domestic visit to our Newcastle Church; this was primarily arranged to give the Professor an opportunity of laying before us the scheme for the superannuation of ministers; but, when the business was over, a little company met our friend in the school-room, and, over cups of tea, came into closer converse with him and realised the charm of his presence. I speak at some length of these two visits, because those who dwell in districts where Unitarianism is popular or even fashionable cannot understand what a time of refreshing is given to struggling and isolated churches by the rallying words and the personal influence of leaders in our ranks who are charged with these kindly commissions by our friends at Essex Hall. In our Newcastle district we are fortunate in having settled ministers at all our churches. The Rev. F. Wood, ministers to our old-established congregation at Sunderland, and Rev. Arthur Harvie has charge of the new church at Gateshead—and it is interesting to know that three of our pulpits are occupied by good and tried men out of the ranks of our own lay-preachers. The Rev. Arthur Harvie having resigned his post as missionary, Mr. Glover has succeeded him in the charge of the brave little company, that hold the fort at Choppington; Mr. Glendining is maintaining the welfare of the congregation that meets (in Apostolic fashion) in an upper room at Byker; while we hear excellent reports of the zealous ministry of Mr. Paxton at South Shields. In this way we grow our own pastors; while we are also proud to know that further afield there are churches who are acceptably served by men who were once lay-preachers in Northumberland and Durham. In consequence of these happy settlements, the rest of our preachers have very little work to do on Sundays; and last September it was decided at our Conference of Unitarian Workers to attempt some missionary enterprise during the week. I have had the pleasure of joining with our ministers and laymen in two courses of week-night meetings, the one consisting of devotional services with a short sermon, the other taking the form of theological lectures dealing with the affirmative aspects of our faith. I cannot decide which course has done more good; but certainly the devotional services drew the larger audiences, and it was refreshing to see so many working-people gathering, after a busy day's work, to spend an hour in prayer and praise. I am sorry I am not able to say much about our earnest fellow-workers at Tees-side. I was to have spent a week visiting amongst them last December, but, unfortunately, I took a chill, lost my voice, and, to my bitter disappointment, found myself unable to serve the good friends from whom I always receive a hearty welcome. Middlesbrough is fortunate in retaining the services of Mr. Lambelle, and I hear that Stockton has just invited a minister to settle amongst them. Darlington and Barnard Castle still remain pastorless; and to any man who is willing to face difficulties and work courageously, each of these places would, I believe, yield a harvest as the reward of patient toil. I have not mentioned Carlisle, because it belongs neither to Tyneside nor to Tees-side; but, in spite of his distance from us, we regard the Rev. C. Travers as one of our most faithful and self-sacrificing labourers; if he does not achieve success he certainly deserves it, and I commend to all my readers the notice he has issued of a bazaar to be held by his people next May for the support of their funds. We are trying to keep alive to the needs of Unitarian work in this vast population around us. Sometimes we get despondent and drowsy, and, feeling almost as though some miracle is needed to quicken our zeal, we cry: "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O arm of the Lord." But, when we ponder the matter, we know that the only answer to that prayer is, "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Zion." So we learn the old lesson, Laborare est orare; and we become assured that the arm of the Lord will only be revealed when we put on all our strength, and became wide-awake to the solemn duties of our holy faith.

FRANK WALTERS.

Newcastle-on-Tyne, Feb. 10.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Burnley.—On Sunday last the thirty-second anniversary of the opening of the present building was held in Trafalgar-street Unitarian Church. The preacher was the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., of Warrington, who preached three eloquent and inspiring discourses on topics admirably suited to the occasion. The attendances were good, considering the wintry weather prevailing.

Bury (Chesham).—On Tuesday, Feb. 11, Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, gave a dramatic recital. In spite of the recent snowfall, there was a very fair audience. The recital, which included selections from Shakespeare, Dickens, Jerome K. Jerome, and Ben Brierley, admirably displayed Mr. Harwood's great powers, and the appreciation of the audience was expressed in a hearty vote of thanks.

Chatham.—On Wednesday week the members of the Unitarian Sunday-school, to the number of more than 150, were entertained to tea by Mrs. Wood and Miss Tribe, who also gave ninety-nine of the pupils prizes for good conduct and regular attendance. A prize was also given by the organist and choirmaster, to the leading chorister, for good conduct and singing. The secretary, Mr. W. Bailey, announced that the Sunday-school was increasing beyond its limits; and though they required excellent conduct in those admitted, they were face to face with the difficulty of accommodating their rapidly-increasing numbers. He said that he had sent a letter respecting their library to THE INQUIRER, with the result that Mr. David Martineau promised them books to the value of £2 10s., and that Mr. Stanton Preston offered to support a grant of five pounds' worth of books by Dr. Williams' Trust. A vote of thanks was given to Mrs. Wood and Miss Tribe for their kindness to the Sunday-school children.

Glossop.—A little over two years ago, in November, 1899, the congregation held a bazaar for the purpose of raising a sum of money to liquidate the debt on the minister's house. The result, after paying all expenses, was a sum of £405. A second bazaar has just been held, on Jan. 23 and 25, for the same object, and has proved equally successful. The gross receipts, including a generous donation of £50 from Captain E. Partington, J.P. who along with the late Mr. Elmund and other, M.P.'s has been one of the most munificent supporters of the Glossop congregation, amount to £440, of which about £40 will be required for expenses. Since the opening of the new church in 1896, the congregation has raised, in round numbers, a sum of £1,000 towards the cost of its parsonage, almost exclusively from its own resources, and in addition to its heavy working expenses. As a result, it has the satisfaction of seeing itself in possession of the means of wiping out this debt, and can now turn its attention to that which, unfortunately, still remains on the church. For what it has achieved it is deeply indebted to the splendid generosity of two of its own members, Messrs. Herbert Partington and Isaac Jackson, who have unstintingly contributed to a work entailing much labour and sacrifice on the part of the poorer members.

Great Yarmouth (Resignation).—The Rev. C. D. Badland, M.A., has resigned the pulpit of the Old Meeting, the resignation to take effect at Lady Day.

Holywood.—A vigorous effort has been made by the congregation of the First (Non-Subscribing) Presbyterian Church to raise a fund for the purchase and erection of an organ in memory of the late W. H. Malcolm, who was for thirty-six years an honoured member, and whose constant desire it was that the congregational worship should be improved in this way. The object has now been achieved and an instrument erected in the church worthy of him whose name it bears. On the 2nd inst. special musical services were held for the opening of the organ. The preacher was the Rev. W. H. Drummond, B.A., of All Souls' Church, whose appropriate and impressive discourses were heard by very large congregations morning and evening. Special music was provided by an augmented choir. On Monday evening, the 3rd inst., an enjoyable social gathering was held in the schoolroom. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. Omar C. Nelson. The meeting was addressed by the Chairman; the Rev. S. H. Mellone, minister of the church; and Mr. Richard Patterson, J.P. Appropriate presentations were made to Miss Mary Greenfield in recognition of her energy and enthusiasm in starting the organ fund, and to Miss Malcolm in recognition of her valuable services at the harmonium. During part of the evening the members and friends adjourned to the church, where a short organ recital and sacred concert was given, in which the organist, Mr. T. Baird, Mrs. S. M'Crum and Mr. Coleman took part, and which was much enjoyed by all who heard it.

London: Essex Church.—On Sunday week, the 2nd inst., Miss E. M. Lawrence was presented with a silver cake basket and knife by the teachers and scholars of the Sunday school, on the occasion of her marriage. One of the teachers, longest in the school, made the presentation, with a few appropriate words, after which Miss Lawrence's own class asked her acceptance of a biscuit box as a memento of their happy Sundays. Miss Lawrence, who has taught for many years in the school, was also secretary for ten years, and will be much missed, for she devoted a great deal of her time to the work and different societies connected with the school. At the end a farewell hymn was sung, followed by many hearty wishes for her future happiness.

London: Rhyl-street.—The Rev. John Hunter, D.D., having kindly offered to help the Mission in any way in his power, Mr. Wilson arranged for a lecture at the Mission, which was given on Monday evening. Dr. Hunter's subject was Coleridge's "Rime of the Ancient Mariner," which he treated in his usual brilliant, suggestive, and exhaustive manner. Dr. Collins, L.C.C., took the chair, and in the course of his remarks paid a tribute to the late Mr. Corkran, so long a missionary of the Domestic Mission Society, and a social reformer in the East-end. The audience was large and highly appreciative, and the collection made for the Domestic Mission Society amounted to £4 16s.

London: Stamford-street.—A pleasant and successful Band of Hope and Mercy Anniversary Meeting was held on Friday week. The Rev. Frederic Allen presided and extended a hearty welcome to the members, parents, and friends present, numbering about 130. The Superintendent, Mr. A. W. Harris, presented a report, which recorded a varied and interesting year's work, and a steady increase in attendance, now averaging over 100, the only complaint being that too common one—want of adult helpers. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant (of Wandsworth) gave a delightful address, listened to with appreciative attention by everyone, and Mrs. Tarrant also addressed the meeting, and distributed thirty-seven medals and prizes earned by members during 1901, the latter all handsome volumes, the generous gift of Mr. A. H. Biggs. Music and recitations were given during the evening.

London: Wood Green.—On Saturday last the annual meeting of the congregation of Unity Church was held. Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P., was in the chair, and gave a brilliant, wise, and helpful address. The year's report of the church and of its manifold activities was very satisfactory, and the finance in a healthy condition. The one difficulty growing out of the report was that £273 had to be got for the new Church Building Fund before March 25, in order to realise the promise of another £25 from the "good" London District Unitarian Society. Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence generously gave £25 to help forward, and the congregation will do their best. Lady Lawrence was on the platform. Short speeches were made by the minister, secretary, treasurer, and other gentlemen. The meeting was genial and harmonious, perhaps helped by the old-fashioned "cup of tea."

Manchester: Chorlton-cum-Hardy.—The first anniversary services of the Wilbraham-road Unitarian Church were conducted on Sunday last by the Rev. J. Ruddle, whose subject in the morning was "Our Home," and in the evening "Worship." The choir sang Macfarren's "The Lord is my Shepherd" in the morning, and in the evening Clarke Whitfield's "Behold how good and joyful." Mr. F. H. Dale kindly presided at the organ, and Mme. Jessie Hulme sang a solo from "Jephthah" in the morning, and a sacred song by Gounod in the evening. The services were much enjoyed, and notwithstanding unfavourable weather the attendance and collections were satisfactory.

Moretonhampstead.—A Free Public Library, the gift of Mr. T. B. Bowring, to the town, to be known as "The Bowring Library," has just been opened. It stands in a central position near the quaint old Market House. The library was opened by Mrs. Bowring, in the presence of a large company, and a meeting was held in the reading-room. Mr. Bowring, in an interesting speech, referred to his early years spent in the town, and his subsequent experience of twenty years' in the United States, where he had been impressed by the fact that every town of any size had a free library, and he was glad to be able to make that gift to his native town. An address was subsequently given by Mr. C. Seale-Hayne, M.P.

Pudsey.—Very successful services were held in the Unitarian Church on Sunday, Feb. 2, the occasion being the opening of a new organ (built by Messrs. Abbott and Smith, of Leeds, and consisting of two manuals, thirteen stops). Appropriate sermons were preached morning and evening by the Rev. W. H. Davies, the choir rendering anthems at each service. In the afternoon the splendid choir (consisting of thirty-six voices) from Chapel-lane Chapel, Bradford, took part in the service, Mr. S. Ward demonstrating the powers of the new organ. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., gave a most suitable address. The church was completely filled, and in the evening there was again a very good congregation. The opening services were continued on the Sunday following, the choir (with the assistance of a few outside friends) rendering the sacred cantata Palestine.

Rotherham.—On Sunday week the Rev. W. Stephens, at the Church of Our Father, took for the subject of his morning sermon "The Crucifix," with reference to a local controversy, and the Rotherham Advertiser, of Feb. 8, devoted nearly a column to a report of the sermon, and in a leaderette referred to the preacher's admission that to him the crucifix was a symbol of trust and its contemplation a source of strength. The sermon concluded with a plea for Christian charity and a more single-hearted following of Christ. In connection with the Literary and Social Union, the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., of Sheffield, lectured on Wednesday evening, Feb. 5, on Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice."

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Monday evening, Feb. 10, Mr. J. B. Wostinholm in the chair. There was a large attendance, and the heartiest spirit pervaded the meeting. The finances were shown to be in a satisfactory condition, and the report recorded a large amount of active work. Very great regret was expressed at the coming termination of the Rev. J. Ellis's ministry of nearly nine years. A special grant of £20 was voted to him, in token of the congregation's warm appreciation of his services.

Stockton-on-Tees.—Mr. Henry Cross, of Yarmouth, who has accepted an invitation to occupy the pulpit of the Wellington-street Church for six months, is giving a course of Sunday evening addresses, extending from Jan. 5 to March 30, under the general heading "Truth 'Up to Date.'" On Feb. 5 an entertainment was given to the children of the Band of Hope, and on the following evening the monthly Social was held, and also the first meeting of the Young People's Christian Guild, conducted by the minister.

Swansea.—A tea and entertainment in celebration of the third anniversary of the ministry of the Rev. Tudor Jones] was held in the school-room on the 30th ult. There was a very large attendance at the entertainment, while over 150 persons previously partook of tea. Mr. C. H. Perkins presided, and in the course of a few remarks spoke of the progress made by the church through the zealous labours of the minister and Mrs. Jones. The entertainment, besides music, songs, and recitations, included a dramatic piece, entitled the Original, which was admirably produced by Mr. W. W. Holmes and those who acted with him.

Torquay.—On Jan. 26 the Rev. A. E. O'Connor gave the first of a series of four Sunday evening discourses in Unity Hall, explanatory of the principles of Unitarian Christianity, the subjects being "The Bible," "Jesus of Nazareth," "Our Thought of God," and "The Way of Salvation." On Jan. 23 a lecture on "Modern Explosives," with experiments by Mr. C. W. Priestley, began the spring session meetings, and on Monday, Feb. 3, a concert was given, in which some high-class music was rendered by a good orchestra and pianoforte. On both occasions the attendances were very satisfactory.

WILTON STREET CHAPEL, DENTON

ENDOWMENT FUND.

It is a matter of common experience that the Ministry of our Chapels cannot be adequately supported, in purely working-class districts, by the unaided efforts of their congregations.

The members of the Wilton-street Chapel have been working for more than two years with the object of building six houses, of which the rentals will form a limited endowment for the Ministry, available in proportion to the efforts of the congregation.

The Committee believe that by creating an endowment of this kind all necessity for the grants now given by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the East Cheshire Christian Union will cease, and that the congregation will be permanently stimulated by the responsibilities of self-support.

To make full use of the land given, it has been found necessary to build houses of a more expensive character than was at first proposed, and contracts have been accepted to the total amount of £2,940.

The Committee has already in hand, from former efforts of the congregation, and from the proceeds of the Garden City Bazaar, which was so generously supported, a sum of £1,156.

The members of the congregation are working earnestly for the RE-OPENING of the BAZAAR upon MARCH 5th NEXT, and appeal to the generosity of their friends to help them to raise the £1,784 still required.

All Gifts, either in the form of Goods or Money, will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Treasurer,

The Rev. LAWRENCE SCOTT,
Great Hucklow, Eyam, Sheffield ;

or by the Secretary,

The Rev. C. E. OLIVER,
Peel-street, Denton, Manchester.

Please send Goods to Denton. All donations in Money will be acknowledged in THE INQUIRER.

The Parsonage, Gee Cross, Hyde,
Jan. 9th, 1902.

I have much pleasure in commending the appeal of the Wilton-street Congregation for help in providing a permanent endowment for the Chapel, and wish them all success in their New Bazaar.

Their earnest desire to see its future assured, must command the cordial sympathy and support of all friends of the cause for which they are so faithfully labouring.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS

THE offices of THE INQUIRER and Christian Life were formerly side by side in Essex Hall, but the Christian Life office is now removed to 5, Fetter-lane, E.C. Even under the old conditions, with the best of good will, it was often extremely awkward when correspondents sent a communication to one office and asked that copy or proof might be handed to the other. Now, it will be obvious to our correspondents, that if they wish a communication to appear in both papers, they must themselves duplicate the copy.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AKUREYRI RELIEF FUND.—The following donations have been received towards a Fund to be administered by the Rev. M. Jochumsson, in relief of the sufferers from the disastrous fire at Akureyri on Dec. 19 :—Amount already acknowledged, £76 8s. ; Sir E. Durning Lawrence, Bart, M.P., £5 ; Lady Durning Lawrence, £5 ; Mrs. George Holt, £5 ; Miss Holt, £5 ; Anon, £5 ; Anon, £3 3s. ; the Misses Lambert, £2 ; G. B. Dalby, £1 1s. ; B. West, £1 1s. ; T. Harwood, £1 1s. ; A. G. Warren, £1 1s. ; A. M. R., £1 1s. ; Miss Thompson, £1 ; Mrs. Russell Martineau, £1 ; Mrs. Crompton, £1 ; Rev. C. A. Greaves, 10s. (second donation, making £1) ; Mrs. Philip Roscoe, 10s. ; Miss Smith, 10s. ; Two Sisters, 10s. ; J. Briggs, 5s. Total, £117 1s. It will thus be seen that, thanks to the generous response of many friends, our hope of receiving at least £100 for this purpose has been more than realised, and it will be our happiness to transmit to Mr. Jochumsson the whole of the above amount, with any further gifts that may still come in. The mail for Iceland leaves on March 4.

THE Indian Messenger of Jan. 19 notes an influential public meeting organised by the authorities of the Calcutta University Institute, to do honour to the memory of the late Rev. S. Fletcher Williams. The meet was held in the hall of the institute on Tuesday, Jan. 14, the Hon. Mr. Justice Gooroo Dass Banerjee presiding. The following are the resolutions passed :—

I.—Proposed by the Rev. P. Mozoomdar, seconded by Babu Bipin Chandra Pal, and supported by Rai Bahadur Chuni Lal Bose—

That this meeting desires to place on record its profound sorrow at the death of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, and its high appreciation of his valuable services during his short sojourn in India.

II.—Proposed by Babu Hirendra Nath Dutt, seconded by Babu Mohit Chandra Sen, and supported by Mr. Abul Kasem—

That subscriptions be raised to commemorate in some suitable form the memory of the late Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, and that a committee consisting of the following gentlemen be formed to give effect to this resolution :—The Hon. Mr. Justice Gooroo Dass Banerjee, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sarkar, C.I.E., Raja Peary Mohan Mookerjee, C.S.I., the Rev. P. C. Mozoomdar, Satyendra Nath Tagore, Esq., Babu Kali Charan Banurji, R. D. Mehta, Esq., C.I.E., the Hon. Mr. A. M. Bose, A. F. M. Abdur Rahman, Esq., H. R. James, Esq., Babu Nalin Bihari Sarkar, R. N. Mookerjee, Esq., Dr. P. K. Ray, Babu Rabindra Nath Tagore, Dr. Nilratan Sarkar, Rai Bahadur Chuni Lal Bose, Babu Sasi Bhusan Dutt, Babu Bipin Chandra Pal, J. N. Das-Gupta, Esq., Babu Hirendra Nath Dutt, Babu Benoyendra Nath Sen, Babu Mohit Chandra Sen, Abul Kasem, Esq.

III.—Proposed by Mr. Satyendra Nath Tagore, and seconded by Dr. P. K. Ray—

That a copy of these resolutions, signed by the Chairman of this meeting, be forwarded to the Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and also through him to the bereaved family of the late Rev. S. Fletcher Williams.

WE publish this week the greater part of a sermon preached in Calcutta by Mr. Protab Chunder Mozoomdar to a large congregation in the Hall of the City College, on the occasion of the meeting of the Theistic Conference on Dec. 27, last year. The service was held in the early morning, beginning at 7.30, and in the evening of the same day the Conference was opened, under the presidency of the Hon. Justice N. G. Chandavarkar of Bombay. After the President's address resolutions were passed of sorrow at the death of the Queen Empress Victoria, and of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams. The latter resolution, moved by Mr. Mozoomdar, spoke in warm terms of the devoted services rendered by Mr. Williams, which had greatly helped and strengthened the cause of Theism in India, and recalled his presence at the Theistic Conference at Madras in 1898. Later in the evening a paper on the Position and Prospects of Theism in India was read by Mr. Benoyandra Nath Sen. On the following morning a paper on Theistic Mission Work was read by Dr. V. Ray, Munsiff of Jessore, from which we note one point. It will be seen that Mr. Mozoomdar in his sermon spoke of Theism as "wider than the Brahmo Samaj" and the "New Dispensation," and as "the bed-rock on which all systems and all religious philosophies are founded." Dr. Ray, on the other hand, pleaded that Brahmoism was the name of widest significance :—

None can be larger than it, none wider in its scope. The word Brahmo is an adjective derived or coming from Brahman, the Infinite God. Brahmoism thus means religion coming from God or God-made religion. And what religion can there possibly be which is wider and larger than that which flows from the fountain of Godhead and is perennially supplied from that source? Brahmoism is a Dispensation and the perfection of all previous dispensations. It will not change or alter, but it will grow and advance without ceasing. We accepted under Divine guidance three primal mottoes and one of them is Truth alone triumph. We have pledged ourselves to follow truth and truth only, or God and God only. We as individual members may be disloyal to new lights and fresh truths ; but then we shall cease to be Brahmos, but Brahmoism will not cease to be the largest, and, I shall add, the only religion for man. My creed and yours may require to be rebuilt if we did not build it on the sure and solid foundations of revelations which the Lord has vouchsafed to grant to us ; but Brahmoism stands for now and eternity the largest and the only religion for man. There may be a sense in which Theism is larger than Brahmoism. It is the sense in which things in general are larger than things good, larger than things beautiful. I have no quarrel with him who would in that sense say that Theism is larger than Brahmoism.

Mr. Mozoomdar would probably agree that the difference here noted between Dr. Ray and himself is one of expression only, and that they would be entirely at one in their apprehension of the fundamental spiritual truths of religion. Certainly Mr. Mozoomdar would give his whole-hearted adhesion to this later passage in Dr. Ray's address :—

Brahmoism teaches the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man not as a separate and divisible truth, but it teaches the Fatherhood of God, and the brotherhood of man because of such Fatherhood. And as soon as the light of that truth breaks into his soul a Brahmo is constrained by the love of the Father to do his utmost to bring all men he knows to the feet of that Father for rest and peace and joy and life immortal. He ceases to be a Brahmo who ceases to labour to bring men to his Father's feet. It has therefore been rightly said that every Brahmo is a missionary. Woe unto us if we call ourselves Brahmos and preach not by our life and words the faith which we profess to follow.

DR. NEWMAN HALL, who died at Hampstead on Tuesday morning at the age of 86, was one of the most widely known Nonconformist ministers of this generation, an Evangelical of the straighter sort, but, apart from his creed, a man of broad sympathies and great popular power. Born at Maidstone, in 1816, the son of a printer and newspaper proprietor, belonging to the Congregational body, he was a graduate of London University, where later in life he also took a law degree. His first ministerial charge was at Hull, from 1842 to 1854. While there he published in 1848 a pamphlet, "Come to Jesus," typical of the old Evangelical appeal, which has had an enormous circulation in many languages. In 1854 Newman Hall removed to London as minister of the Surrey Chapel, in Blackfriars-road, and entered there on a widely influential ministry. He had the secret of gaining hold on the people of the working classes among whom he laboured. In his address as chairman of the Congregational Union in 1866 he spoke of this, and in the following passage referred to the character of the preaching required:—

As we aim to instruct the people at large, we must use the language of the community, and not of a school; of common life, and not of theological cant. Why should we make lessons in a religious vocabulary a necessary preliminary to Christian instruction? Why cannot we express truth in terms already known? As with words so with style. However elegant or forcible, it must be clear. If you wish to instruct, you must be understood. Sound thinking never yet necessitated obscure talking. It is only the plea of indolence to say that the truth alone, apart from style of utterance, ought to secure the homage of the hearer.

NEWMAN HALL was also a successful platform speaker, and rendered good service after the American Civil War by a lecturing tour in the States, in allaying the irritation which had been caused by the attitude of the majority of this country during that struggle. He himself had been a strenuous champion of the North. He used the same occasion to obtain contributions for his new chapel in Westminster Bridge-road, which cost £63,000, of which the American contributions helped to build the prominent "Lincoln Tower." In 1892 he resigned his charge and was succeeded by the Rev. F. B. Meyer. It is interesting to note that Newman Hall and Spurgeon began their ministry in London in the same year, and were close friends. The same year also saw the close of both ministries, for it was in 1892 that Spurgeon died. At the end of some notes on Newman Hall by "P. W. W." in the Daily News, the following sonnet of his is quoted, telling the secret of his life:—

How deep, how pure, how tranquil is the lake!
Lowly beneath the great hills it doth lie,
Yet looketh day and night unto the sky,
Whose tints and glorious radiance it doth take.
The sun and stars a matchless mirror make
In its calm bosom, bending from on high;
Yet none the less, earth's objects that are nigh
Are seen reflected there—the ferny brake,
The bending birch tree and the steadfast pine,
The daisied meadows where the cattle feed,
The tiny pebbles on the beach that shine,
Each tuft of moss and every trembling reed.
Lord! to my soul be such pure calmness given
Reflecting all things fair in earth and Heaven.

THE chief meeting in this country in connection with the annual simultaneous Peace Day meetings, organised by the International Peace and Arbitration Associations, is to be held this (Saturday) afternoon, at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. The chair is to be taken at 3 P.M., by Mr. F. A. Channing, M.P. The resolution to be proposed at this meeting will also be submitted on the same day and in identical terms to similar meetings convened for the purpose at other centres in Europe and America.

TEMPERANCE REFORM.

SIR,—Only a word in final reply to Mr. Wicks, who misunderstands or confuses the issue between us. What was my suggestion? That the family physician should be changed if, in face of established physiological facts and the teaching of the most eminent medical experts, "he still insists that alcohol is a food or even a necessary medicine." This is not dismissing a doctor because of his non-compliance with the patient's teetotalism—the patient himself might not be a teetotaler—but because of his invincible ignorance. To call this despotism and tyranny is absurd; for a patient who engages has the right to dismiss his medical adviser for good reason. And to compare such action with that of the farmer who discharges a labourer because of his vote, or the Board-school manager who bars out a teacher on account of his Unitarianism, seems to me to betray a lack of judgment.

C. J. STREET.

Bolton, Feb. 19.

WITH reference to the correspondence on "Temperance Reform," our attention has been drawn to the following passages in a sermon preached by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong some little time ago:—

"If you do not approve of total abstinence, spend no time or energy in girding at the teetotallers, but make up your mind how the individual can best bring his influence to bear; and then bring yours. If you do not approve of this or that proposal for legislation, spend no time or energy in inveighing against those who do approve, but think out a better way yourself, and work at that. We teetotallers and direct vetoists are constantly being told, 'Oh! that is not what you ought to do; you ought to do this other.' No, good critic, it is not we, but you, who ought to do that other. We are doing what we believe in to the best of our poor judgment, and we can do naught else. It is for us to do what we believe in—for you to do what you believe in. If you have a better cure for this stupendous evil, which is gnawing the vitals of the nation, for God's sake do not sit by the way-side scolding us, but get to work yourselves, and bear a hand against the common foe.

"I often wonder how this great battle will look to our children's children in the true and faithful perspective of history. We see now with such supreme astonishment the moral blindness, the indifference, the biassed judgment, the obliquity, with which our forefathers viewed the monstrous evils of their time. How could it be, for instance, that in all Liverpool, when it was thriving on the sale of the flesh of Africans, only four men—two Quakers and two Unitarians—could be found to declare against the negro slave trade? They were not all monsters, the men of those days. The great Liverpool families, who built up vast fortunes by this traffic, were largely men of character and honour. But they had not that gift of imagination by which men realise the cruelty, the iniquity, the horror, of customs rife and approved in their very midst. But now we think that if we had been of that day, surely we should have sided with the lone voices of the wilderness."

THE LATE MARQUIS OF DUFFERIN AND AVA.

A REMINISCENCE OF CLANDEBOYE.

A HAMILTON, the Viscount Claneboye,
A great part in the great plantation played
Of Ulster, some three centuries agone—
Eager to see his effigy, and read
In the limned face some traces of the power
And intellectual subtlety that rais'd
A courtier and a noble from the manse*
I craved permission. Swift the answer came,
Permission more than courteous, so I gazed
Into the countenance beruffed, severe,
Shrewd, secret of that old diplomatist,
And so methought could better read his time,
And know his perilous place in that grim world,
And think of him as living though long dead.
But more than this I learned, for he was there
Whom men now mourn, our great Pro-consul, he Whose fame, Canadian snows, and Indian plains,
And sands of Egypt, and dim Polar seas
Had traversed. He was there with welcome warm,
With tactful easy kindness. Such methought
The magic that could draw Canadian hearts:
The mastery that swart Indian Rajahs loved:
That kindness, to a stranger student shown,
Had made the bonds of Empire firmer yet.

A CATHOLIC DISSENT.

NONCONFORMITY as described by George Eliot was a thing hardly to be mentioned in polite society. What we see to-day is a religious force and a national power of the most impressive significance.

But many of our fraternity have not yet learned to regard it as such, much less to rejoice and glory in it as their own peculiar inheritance. This may be to our credit, being in part due to a real catholicity of spirit and a genuine desire for comprehension. Often, however, these larger ideals are but plausible pretexts for a dubious practice. Converts who have come over from the Church are not a little amused to observe how those born of a hopelessly dissenting—and, therefore, of course, plebeian!—ancestry consider it a distinction to coquet with the Establishment, and a mark of indubitable breeding to repeat Matthew Arnold's tag about the dissidence of dissent and the Protestantism of the Protestant religion. Was it not Mrs. Barbauld who once said that there is no record of any family having kept its dissent and a carriage for three generations? Mr. John Morley, in his noble essay on Compromise, is equally severe. "Are we to suppose," he asks, "that it is firm persuasion of the greater scripturalness of episcopacy that turns the second generation of dissenting manufacturers in our busy Lancashire into Churchmen?"

Many and diverse, indeed, are the "persuasions" that, in absence of living convictions, prevail upon Nonconformists to transfer their allegiance. Social and political considerations of a subtle and insinuating kind, a dignified and historic architecture, the prestige of national traditions, a rich and beautiful service, congenial companionship, fewer and less persistent calls for self-sacrifice in leisure and money, less exacting taskmasters—all these and other considerations tend to seduce the modern Dissenter, especially when he happens to be, as he often is in our own Liberal Churches, an unwilling and reluctant Dissenter. If a change of allegiance were accompanied—or, rather, preceded—by a corresponding change of theological opinion, there would, perchance, arise no cause of complaint. Our very love of freedom and our admiration of independent thought would prompt us to wish every bona fide pervert joy of his new surroundings.

But the people who are affected by the considerations we have indicated remain intellectually where they were. They have retained their theological convictions, but they have transferred their affections, and so broken the rational connection between their thinking and their feeling. Their intellect, with however much loss of urgency, still gives testimony to certain aims and ideals which their action nevertheless contradicts and betrays. The head and the heart are in antagonism, and, as usually happens when a man is too weak to discover a true reconciliation, the heart carries the day. They sunder thought and will from emotion, and so destroy the unity of their life and the value of its witness. They ignore, or do not approve, the narrower and more exclusive political, social and ecclesiastical aims of the Established Church, and yet they suffer themselves to support it in purse and person. Perhaps they never quite cease to feel the fascination of an ideal church—international and cosmopolitan in scope, free in thought, and catholic in spirit; but they give up working for its realisation, and aid instead the creed-bound institutions of orthodoxy.

It may indeed happen that some of these people whom we have in mind never "go over to the Church." Instead, they begin to lose interest in their religious home, and end in a dreary indifference. And so we have in all our congregations a wide luxurious fringe of loosely attached individuals whose private life may be very genial and very good, whose culture may be unexceptionable, but whose church life is the merest vanity because their faith in the faith has lost all enthusiasm and earnestness. We do not wish to part with them, for Liberal Religion can ill afford the loss of even these half-hearted ones. But how shall we retain them? More important still, how shall we restore them to vigorous and abounding activity? By presenting to their hearts a Church-Idea more to be desired and in every respect more love-worthy than any rival that now woos and wins their affections. We must shatter the illusion that to have leanings towards the Establishment is a sure sign of maturity and breadth. We must make Channing's ideal vision a real presence to their souls. "There is a grander Church than all particular ones, however extensive—the Church Catholic or Universal, spread over all lands, and one with the Church in heaven. . . . No man can be excommunicated from it but by himself, by the death of goodness in his own breast."

In the light of this idea, Church-of-Englandism and all orthodoxies shrivel into comparative littleness and insignificance. But can we fairly claim that we are more true to that Universal Church-Idea than any other particular body? Most certainly we can. Without any mock humility or arrogant boasting, we can affirm that our dissent, in so far as it is free from dogma and obedient to the Spirit, is immeasureably more catholic and fulfils far more faithfully the great and glorious maxim Quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus, than any merely historic or national Church. The truth is we do not take ourselves and our movement half seriously enough. There has been entrusted into our hands an idea of omnipotent power, and it is ours to accept it as God's pledge of victory. Those who have been captivated by the spirit (no less than by the science) of Comparative Religion will not need to be reminded that the charter of the Church of Christ bears the everlasting emblazonry "Whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother" (Mark iii. 35). Adopting this comprehensive motto, we shall be able to show that we are dissenters, proud of our dissent and descent, not because our religious outlook is sectarian and provincial, but precisely because it is altogether too catholic and universal to be restricted to the narrow territory of the Established Church. In a word, we shall learn to discern the dissidence of Greek, Latin, and Anglican denominationalisms, and recognise the catholicity of a true dissent.

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

"I WILL be what I will to be," can be said, and should be said, by every human soul.—R. W. Trine.

IN ECCLES PARISH CHURCH.

WE noted last week the announcement of a series of addresses arranged by Canon Cremer to be given during Lent by representative Nonconformists in Eccles Parish Church. The six addresses, which are given from the lectern at the close of the evening service, under the general title of "The Church of England and her Daughters," are to tell of "the special contribution of each section of the Christian Church to the common life of the whole," a Congregationalist, a Wesleyan, a Unitarian, a Friend, a Baptist, and a Salvationist being the invited speakers. Only reasons of health, we are told, prevented Dr. John Watson from appearing in the series as representative of the Presbyterian Church of England.

The first address of the series was given last Sunday evening by the Rev. Alexander Mackennal, D.D., of Bowdon, whose subject was "The Congregational Movement." Speaking at the outset of the part played by Congregationalists in the democratic movement in England, including the extension of the franchise, and of municipal government, Dr. Mackennal said that their men, trained in the Congregational church meeting, had brought with them into public life, where they took so high a place, the habit of conference one with another, and the virtues of mutual consideration and mutual concession. Those things were of the utmost value in the new public life to which England was called.

For the following summary of the rest of the address we are indebted to the Manchester Guardian:—

"Dr. Mackennal pointed to the political changes through which the country passed in the nineteenth century, and, proceeding, said no Catholic had a more confident conviction of Christ's real presence in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper than the true Congregationalist had in the presence of Jesus Christ in the church meeting. No Catholic bowed with greater reverence at that, to him, solemn moment when the Incarnate One was supposed to come down and rest upon the altar than the true Congregationalist when he contemplated Christ's great promise that where two or three were gathered together in His name, He would secure them by his presence from fatal error. Congregationalists did not believe that the church meeting was infallible, but they did believe that it might be inspired. They did not believe that they were guarded certainly against all the mistakes which were incident to human imperfection, but they did believe in the presence of Christ to guide their deliberations and, even if they erred, to turn their error into experience and their experience into larger wisdom. Congregationalists believed that when Christ said He would be with His Church to guide and govern it, he had in view congregations of faithful men who were taught by Him and who submitted themselves to His authority. They believed that a society, a permanent fellowship of persons who had come together as a church of Jesus Christ, might claim and might receive that great blessing of guidance and illumination which He had promised, as recorded in the 17th and 18th chapters of St. Matthew's Gospel.

"The attitude of the Congregational churches for 300 years towards the creeds had been very various and by no means uniform. There never had been a single time when all those different communities had maintained the same attitude towards the creeds of the Church in two successive generations. There had been periods when the creeds were reverenced by them, and there had been periods when they had been valued only in order to study and to criticise. There had been times when they had been apprehended as admirable and venerable historic documents, and when they had been valued for a further reason, the study of history as the best method of studying truth. But in all those different periods, in all those diversities of judgment with respect to specific creeds, there had been one constant assertion which was made by the earliest Separatists, as it was made by the Congregationalists to-day. They bound themselves to the acceptance of not only that which God had revealed to them in the Holy Word, but of that which He should yet reveal. Their attitude towards the creeds had always been determined by this, that, whatever value they might have in the exposition and definition of a church, no creed was a final statement of the truth, because no creed as yet fully came up to the measure of that Christian experience which Christ intended to discipline and to guide.

"Any church existing within a settled political community must be either established or tolerated. Dr. Mackennal at some length discussed the question of toleration from the point of view from which he spoke, and said Congregationalists held to their conception of church fellowship because to them at least it appeared the attitude of a large catholicity. He thought the catholicity of the future would recognise the essential truths for which the different communities were standing, and would recognise that they existed on the basis of brotherhood simply. That was the direction which the catholicity of the future would take. It would recognise that there was truth in all the different church conceptions that had entered into the heart of man, and that the work of the catholic of the future was not to strive to abolish those distinctions, but to recognise the honest endeavour of the different churches, each one to be true to its own ideal, and to rejoice in everything that brought them together in one great living fellowship."

The second address in the series is to be given to-morrow (Sunday) evening by Professor Slater, of Didsbury College, on "The Wesleyan Movement."

With the concluding sentences of Dr. Mackennal's address, it will be interesting to read the following passage from the last lecture in his recently published "Sketches in the Evolution of English Congregationalism" (the Carew Lecture, delivered in the Hartford Theological Seminary, Connecticut. 1901. Nisbet and Co. 5s.). In that lecture, dealing finally with the subject of Toleration and Catholicity, Dr. Mackennal said:—

"The eighteenth century worshipped the very word 'toleration,' i.e., what Milton claimed as 'the liberty of unlicensed printing'—the right of men to utter all that God has allowed them to think. In the nineteenth century there was a double reaction against the word. Coleridge, who for a short period was a Unitarian preacher, discovered that toleration was not a religion, was not even a force, was only a void that force might fill; and he quoted, approvingly, Jacobi's words—that the only true tolerance was the bearing of the intolerance of others. The Nonconformists, under Edward Miall, grew to resent legal toleration; it seemed to imply a right in some thinkers to extend permission of thought to others; to tolerate a man who has equal rights with yourself is to insult him. But time has brought a more equable mood. Legal toleration has begotten the tolerant habit in men; patience with those from whom we differ; the love of understanding them; the sense of appreciation; the search after truth by the co-ordination of varieties. Phillips Brooks has done good service by his little book on this subject. Tolerance, as a grace of character, will abide when toleration has become an archaism.

"The Catholicity of to-day recognises that 'no prophecy of Scripture is of private interpretation'; but that any and every 'private interpretation' contributes to full understanding. The National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches is perfectly frank in its welcome of diversities of judgment in Church polity and the government of Churches. There is no sinister afterthought among us, no complacent dream that we shall bring our brethren over to our way if only they will let us talk to them. We are like Chaucer's schoolmaster—and we are equally at home in speaking and in listening. Our experience that it is possible and eminently edifying for men of different denominations to talk to one another with no thought of proselytising, to work together without reckoning up what Churches are most increasing their numbers by the co-operation, encourages us to believe that we have found the way to unity and Catholicity by federation."

> Gladly would we learn, and gladly also teach—

LIFE WITH GOD.

BY PROTAB CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR.*

How I remember about forty years ago the eagerness with which we read Theodore Parker's "Discourse of Matters pertaining to Religion," or F. W. Newman's "Theism, Doctrinal and Practical," or Miss Frances Cobbe's "Intuitive Morals," or the stray articles and essays that used to appear in English magazines and American journals. At that time Theism was to us, as to others, a great speculative venture. But to-day, behold how in all matters of religious life men's ideas have gone far and further, till our views coincide with the profoundest ideals of the most advanced thinkers in all lands. Nor is Theism a matter of speculation only. Planting our feet on the grand spiritual literature of our ancestors, we have embraced all that is noblest and highest in the religious inheritance of the other nations wherever and by whomsoever presented. Deeper than speculation is devotion. The life of love that rises from aspiration of man's soul to God falls as inspiration from the heart of God to man. In those days our worship was the chanting of a few hymns from our ancient devotional literature. And now, behold and watch the height and depth of the language of worship in Theistic bodies.

When I speak of the swelling devotion of Theism, I mean all the prayer and adoration and the unspoken meditation. In our society we often notice with wondering hearts a grand revelation of the Spirit of God, and if we do not notice it always it is only because our souls are inert and our hearts are benumbed, but we do at times see how the descent of God has meant the ascent of the soul. When touched by the great Eternal Spirit all that is deep within man has unfolded, and all that is tender in him has blossomed into the beauty of heavenly life. How our resolutions have been reinformed amidst innumerable difficulties and how our workers have been encouraged to spread the good tidings all over India and even elsewhere, how from three or four isolated workers they have expanded into a clan, into a society, a vast community that has forgotten creed, colour, and constitution in the common bond of fraternity in God.

If this is not the life of God in man I do not know what else the life of God has ever meant. But all this growth in opinion and the growth of God in man and the growth of man in God is evidenced by what is called insight, for, my friends, as man groweth in God, God also groweth in man. What was but faintly understood at first becomes clearer and brighter. His face seen obscurely as through the darkened glass becomes clearer and brighter as man's eyesight grows clear, and this reciprocal growth is evidenced by the growth of the devotee's insight. Believe me, sight is much lesser than insight; there is an Eye behind the eye which seeth things which no eye hath ever seen, and there is an Ear behind the ear which heareth when skies are voiceless and when men are stricken dumb. And this insight is the organ, if there be an organ, the sixth sense of man's perception of things spiritual. Granted all that science and art have discovered and done, they will not discover the depths of reality which the heart of the devotee discovers within. Those sounds will never be heard, which the inspired conscience and inflamed soul and rapt faith and prayer hear when God speaks in silence.

What is Insight?—Insight into Nature. Scientists have measured and weighed and tabulated matter and motion in their various aspects, which is satisfactory to them. To me science is the revelation of God. Science is also God's daughter as religion is. But I deplore that science, so often materialistic, agnostic, God-forgetting, soul-forgetting, discounting things eternal, and throwing overboard the profound aspirations of human nature, should pose as the sole teacher of the day. If profound insight is needed to discover the truths in light and sound, it will be needed to supplement a perfect knowledge of matter by the perfect knowledge of spirit, until the "starry heavens" above beat in perfect harmony with "the moral law within."

How is it that in spite of all the great Western books and the Hebrew books which we love and revere we have an inalienable love and reverence for the great sacred books of India? It is not a foolish patriotism. Rationality is indeed higher than nationality; and when the two conflict nationality must go to the wall and rationality prevail. But here rationality and nationality strike up the same tune. We are perfectly reasonable, perfectly logical, when we extol the spiritual insight of our ancient sages which not only we shall develop and maintain, but the whole world shall have to accept. The spiritual genius of India, the deep seeing of the Hindus, shall not die. It is the wisdom which the East once taught the West and will teach once again. Oh, Sons of Rishis! followers of the revered ancestors, your souls rapt up in traditional bonds have lost altogether the genius and inspiration which are your legitimate inheritance. Nature is steady, creation is the same living divine thing, but our ears are dull, our understandings dead. Possess once more the wisdom of your fathers, read between the verses of the tenth mandal of the "Rigveda," and your Theism, call it by what name you will, will be your salvation.

But if God is in the body of Nature He is still more truly revealed by the souls of men which are sparks of the eternal conflagration that burn from beginning to end and from the everlasting to the everlasting. The Divine is in you, and if the divine in me recognises the divine in you, therein springs up the imperishable union of souls. No brotherhood is possible in the world until the holiest in each man beholds its kindred in all men. When that is done, and the face of God is revealed in each one of us, we will agree even if we differ in many things. There will be a unity in difference which alone is the true unity of believers. Doctrines grow and decline, but the Spirit of God never declineth, and the spirit of man if it abides in God is never in the wane. There is a deeper, higher, purer in man than will seem at first. Be pure yourself and you will see purity in the most impure, sublimity in the meanest object. Be devout, be loving, and your love will unlock secrets of all men's souls.

Yet, my brothers, progress is good, insight is good, but there is another thing which must grow with both, and that is holy activity. Oh the torpor! the death-like languor of our nation! If our hands were half as active as our tongues, if our conduct were half as excellent as our opinions, our practical life half as noble as our theoretic boast, the Brahmo Somaj would be the most glorious body in India. If all confess what they believe, if they have the courage to speak out what they know to be true, the majority, if not all, assembled in the National Congress pandal would subscribe to the faith of Theism. But their tongues are tied, their souls are dead, their practical life does not correspond to what is within them; they have become the unfaithful children of God. Life does not mean the bustling untiring activity of the Bazaar; but life means thought-life, heart-life, life of the conscience vitalising the products of the moral nature. Sometimes when I mark the absence of thought-life in our fellow-believers, who have learnt a few parrot lessons and repeat them in season and out of season, I feel inclined to mourn. Teach men the finest dogmas, teach them to sing the sublimest hymns, but if they have not gone down to the profundity of their hearts, directly death overtakes them, directly calamity overtakes them, they wail and weep like the most abject unbeliever. The actualities of life make the real test of religion. By thought-life I do not mean constant speculation, but sympathy with the thoughts and aspirations of all nations and countries, swelling sympathy with the downtrodden and with the fallen in every walk of life. Too much speaking defeats itself, it dissipates the energy of the soul that should come out in practical life.

These are some of the features of the great truth of Theism. The best of the Hindus are rising to this unsectarian universal faith, the best of the Christians are beginning to recognise the dealings of God in all ages and countries; even amongst the Mahomedans the tide tends in the same direction.

Oh God of Nations! Oh Eternal Father! descend unto us to-day, speak Thou the word of comfort and assurance; lead us to Thy sanctuary, where all differences melt away, where there is repose for the weary, consolation for the stricken. Bless Thou Thy Brahmo Somaj; bless Thou Thy people who under other names are working for Thy kingdom; let our union with Thee be the bond of our great union into one common brotherhood.

OBITUARY.

FIELD-MARSHAL SIR NEVILLE CHAMBERLAIN.

By the death of Field-Marshal Sir Neville Chamberlain, at the age of eighty-two, England loses one of her most distinguished soldiers, as well as one of the kindest and most chivalrous of English gentlemen. The daily papers have given particulars of his service in India, but we hope a fuller account will some day be forthcoming. The many times he was severely wounded indicate an almost reckless bravery. The most serious case was at Delhi, where he was second in command, at the time of the Mutiny, and should have been more careful of himself. But he leaped his horse over a wall into the midst of the enemy, and all but lost his life. Much of his most valuable work was done on the Afghan frontier, where his profound sympathy with the border tribes won for him a splendid influence. I remember his telling this story. A kind of couch grass grows on the hills which is absolutely ineradicable, because it sends its roots down six feet into the ground. One of the tribesmen was telling Sir Neville that they knew something of past history, and of the succession of invaders who had come and conquered India. "You English," he said, "are the last, but we are the couch grass. You will go when the time comes, but we shall remain." And Sir Neville added, with a quiet emphasis I have not forgotten, "The man was perfectly right." It was owing to this personal influence that he was chosen to conduct a mission to Afghanistan previous to the last great war. The effort was unsuccessful, but it is noteworthy that he was believed to be the one man who had a chance of preserving peace. His last command in India was of the Madras Army, and in 1881 he returned home. It was in 1900 that he became Field-Marshal.

After his retirement from active service, Sir Neville lived at Lordswood, a beautiful place on the high ground near Southampton. He joined our Church of the Saviour, and became a liberal subscriber to its funds, though during the life-time of his wife, who was a Churchwoman, he generally attended service at a neighbouring church with her. After her death he felt at liberty to come regularly to our Unitarian worship, and he was generous in his donations to the Southern Association, and to the Southampton congregation. Quite recently he gave £1,000 to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. His simple-hearted modesty and intense dislike of anything in the nature of parade prevented his ever coming forward as a personal leader of our cause, but the support which he felt he could give he gave ungrudgingly. In politics he was a sincere Liberal, and spoke at a public meeting in 1885 in support of the Liberal candidate. But he was strongly opposed to Home Rule, and left the party after the introduction of Mr. Gladstone's Bill.

One scene rises to memory while I write. We were at Lordswood. Depredations had been committed in the poultry-yard. The offender, a magnificent hawk, had been caught, and was brought up for judgment, confined in a cage. Lady Chamberlain was certainly willing that its neck should be wrung, for the protection of her chickens. But Sir Neville was too chivalrous to exact the supreme penalty from a captured foe. He thought the bird had received a warning and would not come again, and the hawk was allowed to go scot-free. My latest recollection is no longer ago than last summer, when we visited him in his beautiful home and admired a Wellingtonia which is one of the largest in England, and bids fair to rival the giants of California. He himself seemed so hale and vigorous, that it is hard to believe the end was so soon to come. He spoke among other things of the war in South Africa, and expressed the opinion that we had not been altogether free from blame in the matter. But he spoke with careful reserve, as one who knew how difficult the question is to judge. We may, indeed, be proud of having had such a man in our household of faith.

H. S. S.

It will be remembered that Sir Neville Chamberlain was one of those who publicly protested against the policy of farm-burning and devastation in South Africa. An old comrade, who served with him in the Punjab before the Mutiny, wrote of him in The Times:—

"It is the soul and character of the man that few can do justice to who did not know him as I did. I do not suppose that there is even a photograph to remind the present generation of his magnificent physique and fine head and face. His reserve and almost morbid modesty shut out any approach to advertisement of his past, either by himself or his friends and his admirers. He had the courage of his opinions, and thought Lord Lawrence a wiser man than Lord Lytton on questions of Afghan policy and a scientific frontier for India. . . . He no more followed the fashion, either in thinking or in dressing, than John Lawrence did—indeed, both of them rather preferred to breast the tide than to swim with it, and they were neither of them, consequently, popular heroes in their own generation or in society, whatever they may be in history. Neville Chamberlain commanded the Punjab Frontier Force when he was little more than thirty-two years of age. . . . Though a mighty man of war, in my opinion he was at heart a lover of peace."

MR. P. W. CLAYDEN.

A STRENUOUS life was brought to a very peaceful close by the death on Wednesday morning of Mr. P. W. Clayden, at his residence, 1, Upper Woburn-place, Tavistock-square, W.C. From the very serious attack of bronchitis from which he suffered a year ago Mr. Clayden had so far recovered that with care he was able to continue some part of his journalistic and social activity, though he was forbidden to go out at night, and at Christmas had the happiness of seeing a large gathering of children and grandchildren and other relatives about him; but a few days after he was again attacked by bronchitis, and though he went out again once or twice into the square, his strength failed and the end has come.

For more than forty years Mr. Clayden has been known and honoured among us, as a Unitarian minister and as a distinguished journalist.

Born at Wallingford, in Oxfordshire, Oct. 20, 1827, the son of Mr. Peter Clayden, he was brought up in the Congregational connection, and was privately educated for a business career; but, as a young man, he came under the influence of James Martineau, and became a convinced and earnest Unitarian. In 1855 he settled as Unitarian minister at the Spain-lane Chapel, in Boston, where, at the re-opening of the old chapel recently, he again officiated. For four years he laboured at Boston, and was, at the same time, connected with the Boston Guardian, thus from the first associating journalism with his ministerial activity. In 1859 he removed to Rochdale, as minister and as leader writer for the Rochdale Observer; but after a few months (the Daily News in error says "eight years") Mr. Clayden became, in 1860, minister of the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, where his ministry in the old chapel was long held in affectionate remembrance by those who had grown up in the schools, and those who had been kindled by his ardent preaching. Mr. Clayden's eight years at Nottingham were a time of great activity, not only in the church work of the district, marked by the establishment of the second congregation at Christ Church in Nottingham itself, but in the field of journalism and politics. At the time of the American civil war Mr. Clayden was passionately on the side of the North, and it was his championship of that cause which first brought him into connection with the Daily News. Through the introduction of Miss Harriet Martineau, who was relinquishing her active connection with the paper, Mr. Clayden, in 1866, became a leader writer, and two years later resigned his pulpit and removed to London, that he might be able to devote himself more fully to what, perhaps, more than anything else he felt to be his life work. His connection with the Daily News ceased only with his death.

But before he left Nottingham he fought one more great fight, standing for Parliament at the election of 1868 in the Liberal interest. He and his followers fought with great enthusiasm, but he was unsuccessful at the poll; and at two subsequent elections, contesting the Norwood Division of Lambeth in 1885, and North Islington in 1886, Mr. Clayden again suffered defeat, so that he never entered Parliament; but none the less, he was a potent influence on the Liberal side in politics, not only through his newspaper work, but in active organising efforts, as through his service as hon. secretary of the "Liberal Forwards," and through such books as his "England under Lord Beaconsfield," published in 1880.

When Mr. Clayden settled in London in 1868 it was as assistant editor of the Daily News, a post which he held until 1887, in which year he became night editor, retiring from that arduous post in 1896, though still continuing his active connection with the paper. It might have seemed that this was enough work even for a man of Mr. Clayden's surprising energy and readiness of faculty, but from 1871 to 1884 he was also minister of the Free Christian Church in Clarence-road, Kentish Town, and he found time to write several books. While still at Nottingham he had published a work on "The Religious Value of the Doctrine of Continuity," and in 1874 appeared his "Scientific Men and Religious Teachers," but, apart from his political writings, his most valuable works were biographical studies. Thus in 1883 he published a life of "Samuel Sharpe, Egyptologist," and in 1887 the "Early Life of Samuel Rogers," followed two years later by "Rogers and His Contemporaries." His last book, "England under the Coalition," appeared in 1892.

As a journalist Mr. Clayden was held in very high esteem. For the year 1893-4 he served as President of the Institute of Journalists, and in 1894 presided over the International Congress of the Press at Antwerp. As to the sincerity of his own journalistic work, the Daily News quotes the following sentences in which Mr. Clayden once spoke to an interviewer:—

> I cannot imagine a man being a good and successful Liberal journalist who is not a Liberal at heart. I know that there is an impression in some quarters that a man can write a leader as a barrister makes a speech. So far as my experience goes that is not so. I have had thirty-five years of leader-writing, and I have never been asked to write, and I have never dreamed of writing, anything that I did not believe—at any rate at the moment I was writing. I have had a good deal of editorial experience, and I have never asked a man to write what he did not believe. I have sometimes modified his leader when he has written it. But that had nothing to do with him; he was not responsible. If a man writes a leader to order, that leader becomes the property of the person for whom he wrote it.

Mr. Clayden was a member of the Council of the B. and F.U.A., and a faithful attendant at these and other denominational meetings; and in the sixties had been associated with Dr. Martineau and Mr. Tayler in the attempt to establish the Free Christian Union. Very recently he bore witness in these columns to his loyalty to the Unitarian name. He was a trustee of Dr. Williams's Library, and when St. Pancras became a Metropolitan Borough he was made an Alderman of the Council.

Mr. Clayden was twice married, in 1853 to the daughter of the late Mr. Charles Fowle, of Dorchester, who died in 1870, and in 1887 to Ellen, daughter of the late Mr. Henry Sharpe, of Hampstead, who died in 1897.

A great worker, a generous and warm-hearted friend, a man of high principle, devout religiousness, and noble enthusiasm, Mr. Clayden will be sadly missed in our counsels and by the wide circle of his friends; but our farewell must be with the thankful sense of a life rich in honourable labour happily completed.

The funeral is to be on Monday at Highgate Cemetery.

MRS. ANDREWS, OF COMBER.

IN the early hours of Thursday, the 13th inst., this highly esteemed lady passed from earth, at the advanced age of nearly ninety-five years. Her grandfather, the Rev. Thomas Drennan, minister of the First House, Belfast, was born in 1696. He is described by Dr. Bruce as "an elegant scholar, a man of fine taste, overflowing benevolence and delicate sensibility." He was an intimate friend and correspondent of Dr. Francis Hutcheson, the eminent philosopher and professor of the College of Glasgow, in the early part of the eighteenth century. His son, Dr. William Drennan, born in 1754, was educated as a physician; practised successfully in Newry; afterwards moved to Dublin, and returned to Belfast in 1807. He made a name for himself in politics and literature, and was a leader "in all that was patriotic, benevolent, educational in the town." He was the author of poems of no mean order of merit, and the well-known phrase, "the Emerald Isle," first issued from his pen. Some of his hymns, found in our hymn-books, are familiar, such as that beginning:—

The heaven of heavens cannot contain,

and,

Why does the will of heaven ordain,

and also,

O sweeter than the fragrant flower.

Dr. Drennan married Miss Swanwick, a descendant of Philip Henry, and through her the family is linked with the bearers of many well-known and revered names in our household of faith. Dr. Drennan died in 1820. His widow moved to Comber, where she lived with her daughter until her 100th year.

Miss Sarah Drennan, the daughter, was born in 1807. She was married in 1826 to Mr. John Andrews, J.P., of Comber, and from that time her home has been in this town, in which the Andrews family has for generations held an honourable position. Mrs. Andrews was the oldest member of our congregation in Comber, and the last survivor of those who witnessed and shared in the travail of its birth. She was always a zealous sympathiser in its work, a ready helper and a genial friend. The regularity of her attendance at its public services was remarkable, until the burden of age sapped her strength. Her interest and helpfulness continued to the end, as did likewise her benevolence to the poor of the town. The congregation will long cherish the memory of her gentle spirit, and will think of her when, in future, they sing those words of her father's hymn:—

'Tis he who scatters blessings round
Adores his Maker best;
His walk through life is mercy-crowned
His bed of death is blest.

On Saturday morning her remains were reverently borne through the snow-covered street by sorrowing grandsons to the family vault, in the presence of a large number of sympathising friends of Comber, Belfast, and the neighbourhood. Her surviving sons, the Right Honourable Justice Andrews, P.C., Mr. John Andrews, J.P., and Mr. Thomas Andrews, Vice-Chairman of the Down County Council, and President of the Non-Subscribing Association were chief among the mourners. The services in the home and at the grave were conducted by the Rev. T. Dunkerley.

MR. HENRY EATON.

THE congregation of Effra-road Church, Brixton, has suffered a great loss in the death of Mr. Henry Eaton, of Tulse Hill, who died on Feb. 13, in his seventy-third year. Mr. Eaton was an old and attached member of the church, and during a long period held the office of secretary, which he only relinquished about two years ago.

For many years he acted as superintending engineer to the Postal Telegraph Department in the London district. He had always taken a deep interest in good work, not only connected with his own church, but in other directions, notably on the Committee of the Charity Organisation Society, and as its local hon. sec. His kindness, integrity, and quiet helpfulness made him beloved wherever he was known. Happily he was spared lingering pain—passing peacefully away after an hour's illness.

The Times of Tuesday in a memorial notice spoke of Mr. Eaton as "one of the pioneers of the Electric Telegraphs," and having recorded his death, proceeded as follows:—"He was born on June 27, 1829, and began his career in the service of the Electric and International Telegraph Company when seventeen years of age. In 1867 the Colonial Government made application for an experienced engineer to go to Mauritius, and Mr. Eaton was selected by Mr. Cromwell Varley for the post. After three years' absence he returned to England and was at once re-engaged by his old company. He took charge of the wires of the various companies purchased by the Government, and concentrated them at the central station of the Electric and International Telegraph Company in Telegraph-street. After the completion of the transfer he was appointed superintending engineer of the metropolitan district of the Post Office Telegraphs, and continued in that position until he attained the retiring age of sixty-five. During the whole of his service his one aim was the improvement of the telegraph and pneumatic tube systems."

A memorial service was conducted in Effra-road Church on Sunday morning by the Rev. F. W. Stanley. In the sermon allusion was made to the sad loss sustained by the church, and to the value not only of helpers in the religious work continually attempted, but also of the silent sympathy and influence exercised by those whose presence becomes, by lapse of time, one of the associations of the house of God to fellow-worshippers.

The anthem, "Blest are the departed," was sung by the choir, and at the conclusion of the service the "Dead March" in Saul was played by Mr. John Harrison.

At a meeting of the Reading and Discussion Society on Friday evening, Feb. 14, a resolution was passed in silence, expressing the deep sympathy of members with Miss Eaton, his only daughter, in her great bereavement. The funeral took place at Norwood Cemetery on Tuesday morning. Among those present were the wardens of Effra-road Church, Mr. H. Carter and Mr. E. G. Warren, and the Rev. Dr. Springett, vicar of St. Matthew's Church, Brixton.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

DID you ever hear a really good band or orchestra play one of those grand symphonies by Beethoven or one of the other great musicians? Such a symphony cannot be well produced without a great deal of trouble being taken by many people, and a great deal of time being spent in preparation for such a performance. First, the musician has to compose the symphony, to plan out the different parts for each instrument, so as to obtain the best result in the finished whole. He must have a knowledge of the powers and capabilities and effect of all the instruments that are to be used, so that each instrument shall play what is best suited to it, and one instrument not over-power another, but each help to make the playing of the others effective.

But the composing of the symphony is not the only thing that has to be done in preparation for our beautiful concert The instruments have to be made, and made very perfectly, or they would play out of tune, or harshly, or badly in some other way, and so spoil the effect. And the performers—those of you who have taken lessons on the piano, or violin, know how slowly you seem to get on, and how much you have to practice before you can play even simple tunes—think of the hours and hours in all the weeks and months and years that those musicians have been practising before they were able to play so well; but when all this trouble has been taken, and all the necessary work has been done, the result is well worth it all.

You have seen how the conductor stands before the performers and beats time with his bâton. But beating time is only one of the duties of a conductor. Have you noticed how quickly he turns over the pages of his music, as if there were only a few bars of music on each page? That is exactly the case; the conductor has before him what is called a "full score," which means all the parts that have to be taken by the different instruments written out, one under another, all down the page, so that he can see at a glance where each instrument comes in, and what it has to play. Each instrument, or set of instruments, has a line to itself, so that there are only as many bars on each page as one line will hold.

Sometimes the conductor is also the composer of the symphony, and think what a pleasure it must be to him to hear his own beautiful music well played and giving such enjoyment to all the people at the concert. He knows when and what each man has to play, and he helps the performers by looking at them and making a sign just before they have to begin a fresh passage, and so, by keeping everything under his control, he is able to get the beautiful effect that gives such pleasure to the hearers.

Now life in this world ought to be very like such a performance, George Eliot speaks of the "choir invisible, whose music is the gladness of the world," and if we were all to do our best to add to that "gladness of the world" by doing right, and by loving and helping other people—instead of taking away from it, by neglect of duties, by selfishness, or any other fault—the world would be a brighter and happier place to many than it is now.

God has planned out the beautiful music of good, true, and strong characters, and loving helpful lives, but God's music can never be performed as He means it to be performed, unless each instrument does its best, and keeps in tune with all the rest. We are all both players and instruments in God's band, and not one of us is unimportant in God's sight; in a full orchestra, there are two very small instruments, called a triangle and piccolo; if you were to see all the instruments laid down on a table you might feel inclined to say of those two, "Oh! they can't be very important, they are so small"; and yet the effect of just those two small instruments is to add very much to the brightness of the whole symphony, and they fill a place in the performance which can be filled by no other instruments. So none of us must feel that our part is too small to be worth doing well, and as we are practising as well as performing, in the symphony, all our lives, it is never too late to try to play our music better than we have done before, and so help to make the whole more like what our Father means it to be.

Let us try to live that other people may be happier, and feel more of the "gladness of the world," by the music of our lives.

MINISTERS' SUPERANNUATION FUND.

SIR,—I have to-day received a copy of the constitution and by-laws which are to be submitted to the first meeting of the donors and subscribers to the above fund on Wednesday next. I regret to notice that it is proposed to practically hand over the management of the Fund, after the year 1906, to the members of the National Conference, who will be able, at the general meetings, to entirely outvote the subscribers to the Fund.

This arrangement seems to me to be most unfair and injudicious. The members of the Conference are principally delegates from congregations, temporarily appointed for each separate conference, and they need not necessarily have contributed a penny to the Fund which they are to be empowered to manage.

I trust that the donors and subscribers to the Fund at their meeting next week will decline to sanction the above proposal.

WE need deepening in sympathy. Shut up in self, we are blind to the woe that is the average lot. There is no limit to what we may aim to do for others' relief. The one best fitted to make home happy—the first step toward making the world better—is he who has a thorough, hearty, and joyful confidence in the providence of God, who really believes and knows how joyously to declare the fact of an infinite loving-kindness and tender mercy.—*Elizabeth P. LONDON, FEBRUARY 22, 1902.

AN APPEAL FROM INDIA.

THE Fifth Annual Report of the Indian Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association has now been issued, and a large edition has been printed for wide distribution. The Report is of special interest and value, in that it contains not only the Committee's record of work during the past year, but the last Report of the late Rev. S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS, in which he summed up in so able and instructive a manner the experiences of his two-and-a-half years' residence in India, and the conclusions he had come to in regard to the religious condition of the people of that country, and the prospects and opportunities of Brahmoism. This Report, when it was presented to the Association last autumn, was published in full in these columns, and we feel sure that many of our readers will be glad to have it in the handier form in which it is now issued, together with the Indian Committee's Report. Those of our readers who have not received a copy, and are interested in the progress of religious thought and life in India, should apply at once to the Book-room at Essex Hall. The Report is published for free distribution.

From this and from the notes we have published from time to time (as in our present issue) since last autumn, it will be seen how deep was the impression made by Mr. FLETCHER WILLIAMS on our Indian brethren, and how quick is their response to any expressions of sincere sympathy and any genuine effort to enter into their religious aspirations.

The progress of Brahmoism seems to have reached a point at which it is eminently desirable that the work should be concentrated. The Indian Messenger in a recent article urged the need for such concentration in practical work. The people are now familiar with the message of the Brahmo Samaj ; the missionary's fervid appeal finds ready listeners ; but the enthusiasm thus created must be guided into channels where it may bear practical fruit. "The mere teachings of the Brahmo Samaj," it is said, "are no longer any novelty to many of our cities and towns. Now they want to see Brahmoism at work." This, indeed, has been from the first the aim of the society, as it was of its first great leader, RAMMOHUN ROY, whose efforts of social reform went hand in hand with his teaching of a purer spiritual faith ; but the need is felt for greater activity in this direction, that works of practical beneficence may demonstrate to the world more surely than eloquent words, the uplifting and inspiring strength of the Brahmo faith. This was one of the appeals which Mr. FLETCHER WILLIAMS made with great earnestness to his friends in India. He spoke with pain of the divisions among the Brahmos themselves, which has had so disastrous an effect upon their hopes of wider influence ; and he begged them as far as possible to unite in good works, in which they could forget their differences, and through which a new spirit of devout enthusiasm might be breathed into their common life, such as would heal the differences and make them again one people in very truth. This word he spoke to them while in their midst ; it must now speak to them with new and searching power, pleading through the pathos of his death, that he may not have given himself to their cause in vain.

But it was not only for the sake of that ardent hope that Mr. WILLIAMS pleaded for such beneficent activities. He felt them to be an essential part of the life of every religious society, bringing it into vital touch with the needs of the world. Every wise effort of social amelioration would have had his earnest support, and we can well understand how warmly he would have endorsed the appeal, which will be found at the end of this article.

The religious education of the young is rightly felt by the leaders of the Brahmo Samaj to be a matter of the utmost urgency, and their endeavour to provide adequately in Calcutta for the education of girls is deserving of the most generous support. The attempt to establish a school for boys, under Brahmo influence, unhappily failed through want of funds, but the girls' school, as will be seen from the following statement, has been carried on for eleven years with growing success, and has received cordial recognition from Government. At the annual prize-giving, on Jan. 17, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, Sir JOHN WOODBURN, presided, and expressed his own and Lady WOODBURN's great satisfaction with the work of the school, and his hope that the funds required for the erection of adequate school-buildings would be forthcoming. The managers, it will be seen, have decided that they would not be justified in carrying on the school, unless they can provide proper accommodation, and in considering their appeal for help, it must be remembered that the Brahmo community is not wealthy like ours, but with very limited resources has long carried on a faithful and self-denying work.

Mr. PRITCHARD's letter explains that the Committee of the B. and F.U.A. do not feel that the funds of the Association can be devoted to this purpose, which, nevertheless, has their complete sympathy ; and it must be evident that the successful maintenance of such a school, established in worthy buildings of its own, must be a source of strength to the Brahmo cause.

In offering to receive contributions in answer to this appeal, it is a happy thought of Mr. PRITCHARD's, to propose that they should be sent as a FLETCHER WILLIAMS memorial gift. English donations so given will have an added worth for our Indian brethren, and it will, we feel sure, be grateful to the feeling of many of our friends in this country to have such an opportunity of testifying to their warm appreciation of the work done by Mr. WILLIAMS in India, while at the same time they are themselves helping to sustain a good work, in which he would have taken the keenest interest.

We would point out to our readers that it is a large sum which is required, and that this appeal is one which may well be brought to the notice of all friends of the higher education of women who have any sympathy with India, even if the more intimate appeal above referred to would not specially touch them. Friends may do good service by giving a wide publicity to the statement of the Brahmo Committee, and at the same time they might well take the opportunity of distributing, in quarters where it would be appreciated, the Report of our own Indian Committee, in which, as we have said, is incorporated the last Report of Mr. FLETCHER WILLIAMS.

THE BRAHMO SAMAJ SCHOOL AND COLLEGE FOR GIRLS.

THE British and Foreign Unitarian Association have received an application, signed by prominent members of the Brahmo Samaj, asking financial assistance to help establish on a firm basis a school and college for girls more immediately connected with their Theistic community, and which during its eleven years of existence has already been recognised by Government as doing excellent work.

The appeal which is set forth farther on has the sympathy of the Association Committee, but it is felt to be outside their sphere and the object for which their funds have been subscribed.

They have asked me therefore to independently bring the matter before friends interested in India and in educational work there and to receive and forward to Calcutta donations in aid of the school, which may be sent to me.

Many friends of India, and more especially those who have followed the excellent work done by the late Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, in association with many of the gentlemen who have signed the appeal, will sympathise with the efforts of a poor community to establish a liberal moral and religious educational institution.

To many of us the donation will be looked upon as our "In Memoriam" gift to mark our interest and appreciation of the work of our late friend. Readers of the Indian report, just issued, must have been struck by the many touching resolutions of sorrow and of recognition of the valuable services rendered by Mr. Williams, and will feel that no more fitting way could be found for perpetuating his affectionate memory among the members of the Brahmo Samaj than by helping them in a task in which he would have been in heartiest sympathy.

Donations may be sent to me at Essex Hall, and shall be duly acknowledged in THE INQUIRER. ION PRITCHARD.

THE INDIAN APPEAL.

211, Cornwallis-Street, Calcutta,
Dated the 1st November, 1901.

DEAR SIR,—We, the undersigned members of the Brahmo Samaj in this country, venture to approach you with the following statement and request.

It must be known to you that a Theistic Church has sprung up in India through the exertions of our distinguished countryman, Raja Ram Mohan Roy, aided by the subsequent efforts of Maharshi Devendra Nath Tagore and Mr. Keshub Chunder Sen. This Church has been in existence for 73 years now, and counts its adherents in all parts of India, though their total number is very limited as yet. The Theists of India call themselves Brahmos, and the Church is known as the Brahmo Samaj.

. . . . .

If the Theistic community is to thrive in India, in the midst of the dense mass of idolatry and superstition around, schools imparting moral and religious education from our point of view are indispensable for our children. We have opened a Girls' School on the above plan, and it has been in existence for eleven years now, but it is suffering severely from inadequacy of funds. It is known as the Brahmo Girls' School, and founded under the auspices of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj—a Branch of the Brahmo Samaj, which has taken the most prominent part in all matters of social reform and educational progress—is located in Calcutta, and consists mainly of Brahmo children. It is affiliated to the Calcutta University; teaches up to the Matriculation Standard of the University; and includes, besides, a Class for the training of teachers. It is under a Committee of Management, and receives a grant of money from the Government. The distinctive aim of the School is, as implied above, to combine secular with sound moral and religious instruction on theistic principles, while effort is also made to train the students in those arts which are usually considered to be a necessary part of female education—namely, drawing, music, domestic management and cookery. Attached to the School is a Boarding Department, opened especially to meet the case of those pupils whose parents live away from Calcutta. The Department is under the immediate care and supervision of the Resident lady-teachers of the school, headed by a Brahmo Lady graduate of the University, and supplies a distinct want. The boarders are at the present moment nearly fifty in number, being as many as the present premises can possibly accommodate.

Tested by educational results, as shown in connection with the examinations held by the Calcutta University and other examinations, our school ranks second to none in the whole province.

The school is suffering from want of funds. Its utility and high character have been recognised by the Government, which makes it an annual grant of nearly £300. But in spite of this the management find that, after defraying the necessary current expenses, very little is left in hand to enable the management to supply those educational appliances which do not at present belong to the school, but which are essential to all sound education. Further, the school is at present held in rented premises. While they are the best that our finances enable us to engage, they are not sufficiently good and healthy, from a sanitary point of view, nor are they situated in a sufficiently healthy district of the city. They do not afford space for playground for the children and the young ladies; and, more than all, they do not provide sufficient accommodation to meet the present demand, and the Committee have to refuse for want of room many applications for admission. Besides, the rent of the premises constitutes a heavy drain on the income, and renders the existence of the school always precarious.

If the institution is to be placed on a secure foundation; if it is to be carried on as it should be, with due regard to the health and culture of the students, it should have a proper house of its own—well situated and sufficiently commodious; and unless this can be secured, it will—the Committee are compelled to own with regret—no longer be desirable to carry on the Institution. The management feel—as they have never felt before—that, unless they can carry it on on proper lines, they should give up carrying it on at all; for the task of the due care and education, physical, intellectual, moral, and religious, of the daughters of our community, is an onerous and anxious burden, carrying with it heavy responsibilities.

Under these circumstances, the Committee of Management have issued an appeal, in the name of the most distinguished members of our community in Bengal, to the Brahmos and the eminent people of the province, for subscriptions for the purpose of constructing a suitable building for the school. Sir John Woodburn, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, has been pleased, as a mark of his appreciation of the work done by the school, to grant the fund his patronage, and has himself subscribed to it. A sum amounting to about £1,200 has been raised. But an additional sum of £2,500 is wanted. The management have tried their utmost exertions for further subscriptions, and they regretfully come to the conclusion that there is little likelihood of their being able to raise this latter sum in this country. Our own community is small; we have tried to raise from it as much as we possibly can. Outside our own community, it is difficult to raise much money for female education; for although the liberal education of their daughters may have been considered by the Hindus of yore as essential as that of their sons, our orthodox countrymen of the present day look with but scant favour upon female education.

Under these circumstances, may we venture to appeal to you for your sympathy and help? We feel that it is almost too much for us to request such help. But we do it in despair of other sources of assistance. Should you and other friends of female education enable the Managing Committee to raise a suitable building for the education of the theistic girls of a foreign and far-off land, service of the highest importance and value will have been rendered to a not insignificant section of the human race, and our community will be laid under deep and lasting obligations to their benefactors.—Yours truly,

B. L. Gupta, Judge of the Calcutta High Court.

LITERATURE.

THE CENTURY BIBLE.*

DISPENSERS aver that a pharmacopœia is antiquated in two years. We have no such precise information upon the period when a theological work of reference goes "out of date." Yet those who are engaged in the business of doling out doctrinal remedies for a system of "Faith" that is all sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought are rudely reminded now and again that too many of their medicines have "ceased to cure," and put to the alternative of retiring from business or making themselves familiar with later formulæ. Where therapeutics are in question the occasion generally points to its own solution; but in the great field of what, to preserve the analogy, one may call "theological prophylactics"—in the indoctrination of the young, of the uncultured, of the unspeculative—the old world recipes remain for the most part in application.

It would be—to put the matter at the lowest valuation—a wise economy of time to reduce to a minimum the necessity for the unlearnings of maturer experience, and to teach in the home-circle, the Sunday-school and the Bible-class outlines which, however elementary, are yet, at least, not inconsistent with the necessary deductions of further acquisitions. To bring such elementary instruction up to date needs the services of the "Populariser"—of the man, that is, equally versed in the languages of scholarly research and untechnical exposition, who may act as interpreter to the street of the voices within the walls. It is such an interpreter that we have here, and one who is more than an interpreter of others, being also a man with somewhat worth the hearing to impart in his own right.

We heartily welcome the "Century Bible," and therein very warmly Professor Bartlet's edition of "Acts." In respect of the form, the best that can be said is that it is very cheap. For popular purposes that the fruit of thet Tree of Knowledge may be plucked is of more importance to be known than that it is pleasant to the eyes and a thing to be desired to make one wise. To this we may add that it is a small 8vo., clearly printed on thin but serviceable paper, and arranged upon the principles of a "commentary." It consists of (1) an "Introduction" reviewing the character and contents of the Book of the Acts in all the light that the writer can command from the sources familiar to him. Were criticism our business, it were easy to indicate a certain want of adequacy in the realisation of the influence upon one's use of light of the direction of attention. But here it suffices to say that so far as this introduction goes, it is a piece of work that may be commended in good conscience as a genuine and strong lead in the right direction.

(2) The Text of the Authorised Version is reproduced in full with marginal analysis. This one regrets as involving an expenditure of money and space that might have been better utilised to the advantage of purchasers, none of whom, it is safe to assume, will be without ready access to some copy of this version. It has, at least, the advantage of making the work self-contained; with the defect which belongs to this quality of rather encouraging than otherwise the tendency of students to do per alium what were better done per se.

(3) The main body of the work; which is the Revised Version with annotations.

No reference to this, however brief, would be sufficient without mention of Professor Ramsay's influence, which our author admirably reflects without any obscuration of his own individuality as a factor in the work of elucidation.

There follows an appendix of more elaborate notes, and that invaluable commonplace—the Index, while an exceptionally well-delineated map occupies two pages as a frontispiece. To those who have more than a dilettante interest in the relation of knowledge to education—and there are some who realise that "mental gymnastic" is not the be-all of learning—and who want a sound, up-to-date, intelligible, instructive manual upon the Book of the Acts of the Apostles, we can cordially commend this little commentary.

THE EDUCATIONAL MENACE.

SIR,—As one among many may I thank you for your timely leader of the 15th inst. This is a day of reaction, stealthy footsteps throng the outposts of progress, and it becomes necessary to challenge every tendency that approaches legislation, and rigidly to bar the way if the password does not ring out clear and unmistakeable.

The present educational reaction aims indirectly at the repeal of the Cowper-Temple Clause by insinuating into the public mind a desire for administrative reform, and here, under the thin disguise of specious proposals, the old foe, clerical interest, is once more visible.

The reaction throws an instructive light upon the compromise on which our present educational system is based. In 1870 it was resolved to effect a compromise between the alternatives of purely denominational, and purely secular education. Apart from voluntary schools, at liberty to give instruction in their own tenets, in schools wholly maintained by public funds, it was decided that scriptural and moral instruction, exclusive of denominational tenets, might be given. This arrangement was thought to be more suited to the national character and needs than either of the alternative courses. Could anything be fairer? Not only have the denominations their option, but—a fact overlooked by the reactionaries—the Board-schools have maintained a highly efficient system of moral instruction. Those who remember Professor Huxley's splendid plea in 1870 for the use of the Bible in these schools (vide "Critiques and Addresses," p. 51) may profitably place side by side with it the following quotation from Sir Joshua Fitch's article in last month's Nineteenth Century and After:—

> During thirty years we have seen several generations of English school children made familiar with the Bible story, with the language of apostles and prophets, with the psalms and parables, and with the ennobling poetry and literature of the Old and New Testaments.

But the compromise, in this and other respects so effective, has failed, as every compromise sooner or later must; failed, because of those to whom "the poetry and literature of the Old and New Testaments" are subsidiary to their own narrow and archaic interpretation of them, and who will be satisfied with nothing less than the ecclesiastical control of education.

The several objections to such an exploitation are too well known to need citing here, but the weightiest is not so clearly before us as it might be—namely, that the persons whom Clause 14 most nearly concerns, the parents, are perfectly content with it.

Who are they who would set it aside? Solely those who are interested in enlarging and strengthening the "Established" Church, who desire to avert disestablishment, or want the State to aid them in propagating Anglican Romanism. No other religious body asks leave to send its ministers into Board-schools with a view to teaching the children of its communion its particular tenets. Romanists, Wesleyan, and the Evangelical Nonconformists generally are quite content to confine their denominational influence to their own schools; only the clergy of the Established sect and, perhaps even more, the "clerically minded laymen" wish us to be rid of that inconvenient Clause 14.

And why? They raise the plea—plausible enough at first sight—that every child ought to be brought up in the faith of his parents, and therefore every parent has a right to demand in the public day school instruction in his own creed. Had it not been for the compromise which underlies our system, such a plea would not even possess superficial cogency; but apart from that it stands condemned by every educational analogy. No such right is recognised in our public or intermediate schools, nor by any national system of public elementary education; and as Sir J. Fitch points out (vide supra) it is rendered impracticable in England by the difficulty of denominationally classifying the population.

The plea falls to the ground, but the policy underlying it will be strenuously pursued. What then? Our only course, if the Cowper-Temple Clause is threatened, is to follow the example of the United States—the nation most nearly resembling our own in the mixed religious character of its population—and make our education entirely secular. If the compromise is to be abolished it must be in the interest, not of the clerical faction, but of Liberty and Progress.

Further, in order to achieve their end, the clerical party aim at lowering the efficiency of educational administration. In this they are augmented by a considerable class who regard education as a public nuisance. Here priestcraft and influential ignorance join forces as of old.

One result of this alliance is already seen in a diminution during last year of upwards of 20,000 in the number of evening scholars. If these things be done in the green tree, what is likely to happen when (1) the whole local conduct of educational affairs is transferred to existing county councils, when (2) new authorities are constituted for secondary and technical education, and (3) when Clause 14 is superseded and denominational education is paid for out of the public funds?

Could anything be more reactionary than such proposals? The objections to them lie on the surface. All the splendid efficiency of the School Board, its enterprising spirit, its buildings, equipment, and organisation, its rational and effective methods are to be set aside, and functions as highly specialised as any that exist are to be deputed to bodies of persons potentially and in many cases actually inferior to the present administration; and the results of thirty years' hard work degraded into a means of increasing the power of sectarian religion.

No, Sir, in the face of such menace we need to direct our policy more and more by measures calculated to further the scope and efficiency of the existing Boards; to invest them with responsibility of the primary and secondary education of their districts; and to see to it that their members are, if not educational experts, at any rate men and women keenly alive to educational interests, and intimately acquainted with local resources and needs.

There never was a time when we stood in greater need of alertness than now. But none of the lessons we have learned during the last few years will equal in disaster the adoption of some of the educational measures at present being brought before the public notice.

THOMAS J. HARDY.

THE CONFERENCE AND THE CHURCHES.

SIR,—Will you, of your courtesy, allow me a brief rejoinder to your notice of Newington Green letter? As this was a reply, three months after date, to the circular of the National Conference Committee, we can hardly be said to have been in a hurry to unburden our soul. Moreover, as the second circular, assuming our acceptance of the scheme of the former, only promised information for which we had not asked, and which had no bearing on the contention of our letter, it could not claim to arrest our judgment, nor could our action, therefore, be fitly characterised as previous.

I would further direct the attention of your aide-de-camp to the extract which you so kindly supplied from the Seed Sower, and which, as representing the other side of the question raised, you so impartially set side by side with our letter. That extract contains what is called an object-lesson, drawn from the new unionism of the Congregational and Baptist Churches. After speaking of the liberties to be left to the individual churches, it proceeds:—"Such questions as the recognition by the denomination of each minister elected, the introduction into the ministry of suitable men . . . the assistance given to smaller churches, the administration of congregational funds, old age pensions for ministers, the conduct of missions, &c., might, it is suggested, be under the control of the church as a whole, instead of resting in the hands of separate independent committees." I need not say that this object-lesson, which, notwithstanding its presently-expected failure, we are called upon to admire and imitate, coupled with the instances of coercive discipline which the history of three separate unions records, is a very complete answer to your friend, and most amply justifies our distrust.

Heretofore we have gladly joined in a national conference; henceforth we are required to acquiesce in something more, less, and other. These conferences sprang from the initiative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and if they did not quite reach to the dignity of national importance they were really open and intentionally Catholic. They have long ceased to be this, and to call them national is preposterous. Their ecclesiastical aim—apparently looking towards Presbyterianism—is openly confessed, and there needs no prophetic inspiration to foresee that when this National Conference shall have become endowed with powers of patronage and discipline all that lies within the scope of the Seed Sower's object-lesson will be in a fair way of becoming realised.

NON-SUBSCRIPTION.

SIR,—The following passage in Benjamin Franklin's "Autobiography," referring to matters that took place in America, apparently soon after 1742, may interest those of your readers who care for the principle of non-subscription in religion, as it did me greatly the other day when I came upon it.

Those embarrassments that the Quakers suffered from having established and published it as one of their principles that no kind of war was lawful, and which (sic) being once published they could not afterwards, however they might change their minds, easily get rid of, reminds me of what I think a more prudent conduct in another sect among us—that of the Dunkers. I was acquainted with one of its founders, Michael Weffare, soon after it appeared. He complained to me that they were grievously calumniated by the zealots of other persuasions, and charged with abominable principles and practices to which they were utter strangers. I told him this had always been the case with new sects, and that to put a stop to such abuse I imagined it might be well to publish the articles of their belief and the rules of their discipline. He said that it had been proposed among them, but not agreed to for this reason: "When we were first drawn together as a Society," said he, "it had pleased God to enlighten our minds so far as to see that some doctrines which were esteemed truths were errors, and that others which we had esteemed errors were real truths. From time to time He has been pleased to afford us further light, and our principles have been improving and our errors diminishing. Now we are not sure that we are arrived at the end of this progression and at the perfection of spiritual or theological knowledge, and we fear that if we should once print our confession of faith, we should feel ourselves as if bound and confined by it, and perhaps be unwilling to receive further improvement; and our successors still more so, as conceiving what their elders and founders had done to be something sacred—never to be departed from." This modesty in a sect is, perhaps, a single instance in the history of mankind, every other sect supposing itself in possession of all truth, and that those who differ are so far in the wrong: like a man travelling in foggy weather, those at some distance before him on the road he sees wrapped up in the fog as well as those behind him, and also the people in the fields on each side; but near him all appears clear, though, in truth, he is as much in the fog as any of them.

To suggest that those among us who are doing their best to fasten their Unitarianism upon our Free Churches are wrapt in any fog will, no doubt, be considered in me heretical and eccentric; but, with respect, I think they might take an idea or two from the Dunkers. Franklin was not aware that in this country, at any rate, were a number of churches based on this identical principle. Can any of your readers tell us what became of this kindred movement across the Atlantic?

LIVERPOOL DISTRICT MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—Circumstances for which the Rev. R. S. Redfern has been in no way responsible having compelled the Liverpool District Missionary Association to adopt certain steps affecting the Free Christian Church at Crewe, and having also led to Mr. Redfern relinquishing his ministry there, the officers of the Association desire to make known their earnest regard and esteem for Mr. Redfern, and heartily to commend him to our churches as a minister of high character, while placing on record the excellent work done by him in connection with the Liverpool District Missionary Association.

Liverpool, Feb. 18.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

ON Saturday last the annual meeting of the above Union was held at Ashton-under-Lyne. At the business meeting a change was very reluctantly made in the presidency of the Union, for the first time within the last quarter of a century, the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., of Gee Cross, declining to be re-elected, on the ground that he considered it would be to the interest of the Union to have a change of president. Consequently, Mr. R. T. Heys, of Stockport, a member of the Executive Committee, was elected to that office in his place. The Rev. H. E. Dowson, Messrs. J. R. Beard, H. P. Greg, and E. W. Smith, were elected vice-presidents; Mr. W. Hudson was re-elected treasurer, Rev. B. C. Constable, hon. secretary, Mr. J. Wells, assistant secretary, and Mr. M. C. Rogers, hon. auditor.

The annual report showed that of the assisted congregations Ashton and Denton were full of life and activity; that Macclesfield was hoping great things from the settlement of the Rev. W. G. Cadman in March; and that Mottram and Congleton were continuing about as before. It referred to a bazaar at Denton, which resulted in a clear gain of £1,110; to one at Glossop, which cleared over £440; to the re-opening services at Stockport, after extensive repairs and decorations; to the settlement of the Rev. A. R. Andreae, B.A., as assistant minister to the Rev. H. E. Dowson; and to a "Forward Movement," which had been carried on in connection with nine of the churches.

The balance-sheet showed a deficit of over £100, partly owing to an alteration in the financial year, whereby the expenditure was for fifteen months, and partly owing to a slightly decreased income and slightly increased expenditure.

A constitution of the Union, as drafted by the Executive Committee, was unanimously adopted.

An important decision was arrived at to hold a grand East Cheshire Bazaar in 1903 or 1904 to raise £5,000 for the purpose of investing one-half of it to produce an annual income for the benefit of the Union's funds, and of using the other half to assist congregations in building churches, or paying off building debts, or otherwise, as the Union may direct.

In the afternoon a religious service was held in the chapel, the sermon being preached by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, the Secretary of the Association which has so generously assisted the churches in the Union. It was a thoughtful, practical sermon, based on the text, "They were astonished at his teaching."

The collection amounted to £5 5s. 9d.

In the evening a public meeting was held, presided over by the minister of the Ashton Church, the Rev. W. C. HALL, M.A.

Addresses were delivered by the Chairman, the Revs. H. E. Dowson, E. L. H. Thomas, B.A., B. C. Constable, and Mr. H. P. Greg.

MR. H. P. GREG'S ADDRESS.

Over the gate-way to Manchester College we have an intimation that those who study there shall be guided by the principles of Truth, Liberty, and Religion. Well indeed is it that Truth is put first, for Liberty without Truth is license, and Religion without Truth is superstition. But though we recognise the importance of truth over the portal of Manchester College, do we recognise it in our daily life? Do we to-day speak the truth, think the truth, act the truth? I fear we all recognise that our practice often falls short of our pretensions. Do we speak the truth? I fear often not. I do not mean we intentionally tell lies to deceive, but maybe we think the issue immaterial, and if we do not tell the exact truth we think we may save somebody's feelings. Let me say that truth requires no adjectives; unless we tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, we are not telling the truth. It may be something near it, but it is not the truth. Am I overstating the case? We all know among the so-called upper classes if the lady of the house does not wish to see a visitor she tells her servant to say she is not at home. So universal is this that it is defended on the ground that it deceives no one. Granted. But a lie is no less a lie because it deceives no one. True it may have no evil effect on the person spoken to, but to the speaker, perhaps, insensibly the lie dulls the edge of conscience. To children, I fear, we often do not speak the truth. Indeed, our whole conception of truth in connection with child-life is wrong. We are told of the importance of teaching a child to tell the truth. A child requires no such teaching. A child naturally tells the truth. We ought constantly to bear in mind the importance of not teaching a child to tell lies. How constantly is a child told lies by parent and nurse. A child cries and is told unless the cry is stopped the Prince Rupert will come. But far more innocent lies are told. A child runs to a fond father and says, Do you know what mother has given me? and the fond father knowing full well what the gift is, but not wishing to deprive the child of the pleasure of telling, answers no. Need I multiply instances. Each one of you watch closely and see how often parents, relatives, and nurses think that the child does not understand, and, therefore, it does not matter what is said to it. Do not think I am condemning all the wonderful child fancies which constitute the charm of child-life. But let all that come under the "pretend to be," and openly be stated as such. A child has a far higher conception of truth than many parents, as the latter have often found out to their cost.

But if thus in speaking the truth there is room for a higher standard, what are we to say about thinking the truth? For in speaking there is always a chance of being found out, and an immense amount of truth is spoken where the fear of detection rather than the love of God is the actuating power.

This indifference to thinking the truth leads to every form of self-deception, from the schoolboy who imagines the pain in his big toe is sufficient to justify a day of happy idleness at home to the Bishop who thinks that the day has not yet come to inform the ignorant masses that the infallibility of the Bible has been shattered by modern criticism, from the servant who manages to scamp work just so as not to incur the wrath of the master to the politician who imagines he adds to the glory of his country by denouncing as traitors those who happen to differ from him, from the casuist who urges that all is fair in love and war to the canon who preaches that bloodstained battlefields are fruitful soil for Christian virtues to breed in. Many instances of not thinking the truth will probably occur, if suddenly we analyse our thought on a particular subject at a particular moment—that is to say, if we particularise our sentiment, not generalise our sentiments. Are our thoughts running on the noblest, purest, truest lines? Then a word about acting the truth. Sometimes so much stress is put on speaking the truth that a child thinks, provided that is done, nothing more is required. It knows it may not go to the store cupboard and take a lump of sugar without leave, but when no one is looking the deed is done, and if inquiry is made the truth is told, but if no inquiry is made solace is obtained by the reflection that no lie has been told. How often a lie is acted is proved in endless cases in the police courts, but how many never obtain such notoriety? Are we not almost forced to ask, Is it possible to speak the truth, think the truth, act the truth? Well, it wants a deal of practice, but practice makes perfect.

You know something about cotton spinning in Ashton. Have you ever watched a young piecer learning to piece up on a mule? How clumsy he is at first. Maybe the mule makes four or five draws before he gets the thread in exactly that place where it will join up to the sliver, and he takes such trouble over it and looks so carefully to see that he is doing it right. But watch that same lad six months later. He pieces up four or five ends in one draw. He does it so easily, he seems hardly to look, his fingers go deftly and unerringly from the spindle point to the front roller, we say he does it mechanically. What has happened? The communication between eye and brain and brain and finger was very slow at first, but practice has made it so quick that the action is performed without the lad being aware of the communication, but the communication is just the same. So with regard to truth, the novice finds it difficult. He has got to submit every word, every thought, every action to the brain, and to ask whether that word, thought, and action is governed by the highest principles of which his nature is cognisant, and in every human being is implanted—what we call conscience, which tells unerringly the yes or no to such questioning. The communication of thought to brain, of brain to conscience, is at first slow and troublesome, and requires care to make sure that the communication is made, but with practice it is done swiftly, unerringly, we may almost say mechanically.

But why do I thus address the East Cheshire Christian Union? Do I think we are specially deficient in the perception of Truth? No, on the contrary I consider that we have a higher perception of Truth, because, on account of our isolated position, we are obliged to use our thinking and reasoning powers to a greater extent than other Churches. But I sometimes wonder whether we Unitarians realise the importance of Truth as keenly as our forefathers, or whether a dulled perception of its importance will cause our body in the coming generation to produce not so many or such strenuous champions of Truth as it did in the generations that are passed. Other Churches may give Truth a secondary place, may regard faith, hope, love, discipline, humility, gratitude, self-sacrifice, as the saving graces, but to us Unitarians the seeking after truth is the breath of life; if we give up the search we are no longer a living Church. And we have a special responsibility in this matter, for we alone of the recognised Christian Churches are free to follow it. We are not bound to ecclesiastical standards of truth as recognised 300 years ago. We do not expect people to repeat a belief in the resurrection of the body, which nine out of ten can only reconcile with their standard of truth by a process unknown to me; we do not violate our notions of the mercy of God by teaching that should a baby die before some water is sprinkled on its head by human hands, that baby dies in sin, knowing that if all the bishops, deans, and canons commit no more sins after baptism than they do before, they need have no great fear of the day of judgment. Being thus free, the responsibility with us is great to live up to the highest standard of which our minds are cognisant. And I feel, perhaps, sometimes in a charitable frame of mind, in a desire to live at peace with our neighbours, we may unintentionally fall short of the highest standards. We praise the tolerance and broadmindedness of many in the Church, when perhaps we ought to deplore a want of honesty in their still remaining members of, and receiving benefits from, an organisation whose shortcomings their vision is clear enough to perceive. I plead for truth in every place, at home, abroad, in the cottage, in the palace, in the pulpit, on the platform, in the city, in the nation; in everybody, in the parent, in the child, in the politician, in the diplomatist, in the orator, in the auditor, in the preacher, in the teacher, in the man of business, in the man of leisure, in the man who works for a weekly wage, in the man who amasses millions, in the educationalist, in the philanthropist; at every time, in trouble, in prosperity, in sickness, in health, in doubt and anxiety, in happiness and exultation, in peace and in war.

I plead for Truth not judged by political, social, ecclesiastical standards, but judged by the spirit in which Christ said "I am the way, the life, the truth." To gain this spirit the individual must, above all, to his own self be true.

> Thou must be true thyself,
> If thou the Truth wouldst teach;
> Thy soul must overflow,
> If thou another soul wouldst reach;
> It needs the overflowing heart
> To give the lips full speech.
> Think truly, and thy thought
> Shall the world's famine feed;
> Speak truly, and thy word
> Shall be a fruitful seed;
> Live truly, and thy life shall be
> A great and noble creed.

The new Jerusalem Church showed a fraternal spirit by granting the use of its building for the public tea. The meetings were fairly well attended, considering the severity of the weather, and were generally considered hopeful and successful.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTH AND EAST LANCASHIRE.

To say that in the churches of this district "all things continue as they were" would not be true, except in so far as there is no striking change to record. More than half the winter has gone, in the usual activities of chapel and Sunday-school, which strengthen and build up congregations, and furnish but slight material for history.

Some changes there have been of the kind which must take place in the space of a year in a busy district—changes amongst the workers. The pulpit at Burnley is again vacant, the Rev. E. A. Voysey leaving the town at the end of the present month. His stay has not been a long one, but there are many who will regret his departure, and will hope that he may soon find some more congenial field of work. His ability and earnestness will be missed, and his comradeship, in a district where our churches are at rather long distances from each other. It is to be hoped that the pulpit at Burnley will not long remain vacant. There is a fine opportunity there for the right sort of man, and a great need of such a man.

It is no long journey from Burnley to Colne, and a former minister at Burnley, Rev. T. Leyland, under whose leadership the congregation there became self-supporting in 1886, has for several years worked hard at Colne. Mr. Leyland has been compelled, by failing health and impaired eyesight, to lay down his work for a while. In the hope that a long rest may restore his health, it has been arranged by his brother ministers and others to supply his place in the pulpit at Colne for six months. And the readiness with which the suggestion was taken up, when first made, is a proof of the warm regard felt towards Mr. Leyland by those amongst whom he has long been a fellow-worker and brother-in-arms.

While still surveying the northern part of the district, I may mention that a North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association has recently been formed, which will include the congregations of Preston and Lancaster, and perhaps some others. This seems a good move; for those congregations are too far distant to derive much sense of fellowship and support from their connection with the North and East Lancashire Mission. It is to be hoped, however—at all events by the officers of the Mission—that those congregations will not find it necessary to withdraw from its membership and thereby deprive it of their sympathy and support in its work.

The mention of Preston recalls the name of its late minister, the Rev. Joseph Harrison. Of his recent death, at a comparatively early age, most of your readers will be aware. At Accrington and at Preston he did good work, and left a deep impression of quiet earnestness. On the Committee of the N. and E. Lancashire Mission his legal knowledge and business ability enabled him to render very important services; and if the work of that institution is now conducted on sound principles, the credit of its re-organisation is due chiefly to him and to the late Mr. Hope, of Atherton. The long illness, which ended only with his death, rendered it impossible for Mr. Harrison to make adequate provision for his wife and children. An appeal on their behalf has been issued, supported by the names of many well-known men. I mention it here for the sake of reaching those of your readers who may not have seen the appeal. The case is one most deserving of help, and as a former colleague and friend of Mr. Harrison I commend it to public sympathy. The Rev. C. J. Street, of Bolton, is the treasurer of the fund, and will gladly receive any donations, however small.

Coming down southwards, I pause to say a word about Rawtenstall, as the position there is somewhat peculiar, and needs explanation. In the "Year Book" the pulpit is marked "vacant," and it has been vacant for more than two years. During most of that time the services have been conducted by Mr. F. W. Emms, not however as the minister duly appointed and recognised as such by the Mission Committee (Rawtenstall being one of their assisted congregations), but as a supply engaged by the congregation on their own responsibility. Into the reasons for this arrangement I cannot now enter. The Rawtenstall congregation, like the other six dependent ones in the Mission district, have been, and still are, making efforts to raise a fund, called an independence fund, with a view to becoming self-supporting. In this object they have the support and approval of the committee of the Mission. But in the methods they have adopted to carry out that object, they have not sought the advice or obtained the sanction of the committee, and, while acting in all good faith, have not gone quite the right way to effect their purpose. I think this explanation is due to those who have been somewhat surprised at receiving an appeal from Rawtenstall; but I would ask them not to think harshly of the Rawtenstall folk, especially as the chief cause of the mistake is no longer operative. It is due to Mr. Emms to say that his work at Rawtenstall was generally appreciated by those amongst whom and for whom it was done. There is now an opportunity for a fresh start at Rawtenstall, and it will be a pity if a wise use is not made of that opportunity.

I have little else to record. The congregations formed in recent years at Chesham (Bury), Horwich, and Leigh, seem to be making steady progress, as shown by the returns of membership, average attendance, and the like. Much that cannot be tabulated is known to those who know the faithful work that has been and is being done in those places. In Bolton, the movement at Halliwell-road, the third congregation in the town, only founded within the last two years, appears to be thriving under the energetic leadership of the two ministers of Bank-street Chapel. For the rest, we are busy in our chapels and schools, on the lines of the text (which I offer to all who have got to preach collection sermons on Mission Sunday), "Let our people also learn to maintain good works, for necessary uses, that they be not unfruitful." As they are familiar with their Bibles, they will not need to be told where that text occurs.

R. TRAVERS HERFORD.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Belfast: York-street.—The congregational soirée was held on Feb. 10, in the Lecture Hall, the Rev. Alexander Ashworth presiding. It was well attended in spite of a severe snowstorm. There was a very interesting programme of music and recitation. Songs, speeches, and instrumental music as well were reproduced on Edison's Grand Concert Phonograph. The entertainment, which lasted until a late hour, was much enjoyed by those present.

Billingshurst.—Thirty children connected with the Wisboro' Green Mission were entertained to tea on Tuesday. After tea the room was well filled by parents and friends at a miscellaneous entertainment, given by Mr. Charman, of Horsham. A social meeting of the congregation was held on Wednesday, when a number of friends came over from Horsham, and helped to make the evening most enjoyable.

Birmingham: Hurst-street Mission.—The sixty-second annual meeting of the subscribers and friends of this mission was held on Monday last, the 17th inst. The chapel was filled with a large and enthusiastic gathering of the mission friends and workers, the proceedings from first to last being of a very enthusiastic character. We copy the following extracts from the Birmingham Daily Post and the Birmingham Gazette:—Appreciative allusion was made to the services rendered by Mr. W. J. Clarke (missionary-in-charge), and to the work of Miss Newman, his assistant. In a voluminous report, Mr. Clarke gave particulars of the work accomplished by the religious services, Sunday-schools, classes for science, dressmaking, vocal and instrumental music, and scriptural study; the recreation room, cricket club, social gatherings, minstrel troupe, sewing guild, Band of Hope, magazine circulation, flower distribution, mothers' meeting, daily visits to and from the poor, guild of sympathy, special winter and summer treats for the poor, poor children's summer evening parties, sick and savings clubs, provident society, benevolent fund, and other agencies with which the mission is connected. During the year 16,532 visits had been paid to and received from the poor, and 2,848 medical notes, 1,816 garments, and a large number of parcels and books, magazines, and bunches of flowers had been distributed. These, together with the alms, weekly pensions, and gifts in clothing, food, fuel, and nourishments, involved an outlay of upwards of £1,250. Mention was also made of the Police-aided Association for Clothing Destitute Children, the Military Veterans Association, and the Court and Alley Concerts Association, on the ground that, though they were independent associations, Mr. W. J. Clarke acted as hon. secretary of each, and that the administrative work of all of them is mainly done by the mission staff. Reference was also made to the assistance rendered by the mission workers to the Travellers' Aid Society, the General Hospital Samaritan Fund, the Walliker Society, and the Daily Mail Reservists' Fund (Central Division). Alderman Cook, who expressed regret that illness prevented the Lord Mayor from presiding, proposed the adoption of the report and balance-sheet, and an expression of undiminished sympathy and appreciation of the continued and faithful labours of the missionary, Mr. W. J. Clarke, and congratulating him upon the completion of another year of thoroughly successful work. It was impossible to listen to the report without being struck with the vast amount of work of which that mission was the centre; the number and variety of its agencies were, to him, surprising. They covered a very wide area, and they were all alike in that they aimed at helping the poor and distressed. Birmingham was fortunate in possessing citizens who, in many ways, devoted time and thought in assisting those who were less fortunately placed than themselves. In the city, too, there were many centres of good work—more than many were aware of—but few with such a good record as that mission in Hurst-street. It deserved better financial support than it received, and he felt it would get it if people generally had a higher conception of their responsibilities. The sixty-second annual report of the committee was presented. It stated that in nearly all the numerous benevolent and other agencies of the mission there had been an increase of activity and work. The financial deficiency for the year amounted to more than was anticipated in the last report, being £172 18s. 6d. for the year. After the successful effort last year to pay off the accumulated deficiency, it was disheartening to find the adverse balance beginning to mount up so rapidly. The loss of subscribers during the year, by death and other causes, had been heavy ; an increase in the number of subscribers was the only remedy for the financial stress from which the mission suffered. The committee, therefore, appealed to friends to use their best efforts to secure new and increased subscriptions. In conclusion, the committee expressed their great appreciation of the valuable services rendered by Mr. W. J. Clarke, which have raised the mission to the high position which it now occupies, and of his beneficent labours on behalf of the poor and the suffering, which have made his name a household word in the city. The hearty singing of a hymn, followed by the benediction, brought a most successful and inspiring meeting to a close.

Bristol.—On Feb. 11, Mr. J. H. Leigh, M.A.. the distinguished Shakespearean reciter, gave a reading of The Merchant of Venice, in aid of the Lewins Mead Domestic Mission, at the Victoria Rooms, before a good audience. From first to last Mr. Leigh held his hearers spellbound by his skilful rendering of Shakespeare's great creation, his fine, carrying voice permitting no word to be lost. Not only has Mr. Leigh the art of individualising every one of the characters he is portraying, but he possesses the even rarer power of doing this without ever for a moment overstepping the invisible line which separates the reciter's from the actor's function—a distinction one sees constantly forgotten by reciters of lesser calibre. To his other gifts Mr. Leigh adds that of bringing out the essential poetry of the lines he is delivering, heightening the effect by the occasional introduction of appropriate music. From the opening to the closing scene the audience followed the reader with a depth of interest and a warmth of appreciation that were equally unmistakable. The heartiest thanks of all friends of the Mission are due to Mr. Leigh for his most welcome visit to Bristol, which resulted financially in the sum of £9 being handed to the Treasurer.

Burton-on-Trent.—The annual meeting of the Free Christian Church was held on Thursday week, and was fairly well attended. The report of the secretary, as slightly amended, was passed, and also the balance-sheet. Neither of them were very bright, there having been important changes in the year as well as many difficulties to contend with. There was a net loss of members, and the deficit at the end of the year had increased considerably. The latter, however, had been nearly wiped out by the profit on the successful New Year tea-party in January. The officers, generally, were re-elected, Mr. J. W. Belfield, however, taking the secretaryship, and Mr. Robinson, the late secretary, the treasurership. The Rev. Dr. Griffiths, minister-in-charge, was chairman, and the Rev. John Birks, of Derby, was also present. The spirit of the members was good, showing determination for more work and greater success in the coming year.

Chowbent.—On Sunday last the congregation had the pleasure of a visit from the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who conducted the morning service, and preached a most helpful sermon. On Ash Wednesday evening Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, in the large schoolroom, gave two hours' varied recitals, grave and gay, from half-a-dozen authors, to a delighted audience.

Kilmarnock.—On Monday evening the induction of Mr. A. Irvine Innes, as minister of the Clerk's-lane Church, took place. There was a large congregation, presided over by the Rev. James Forrest, M.A., of St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church, Glasgow, who preached an impressive sermon, and gave the charge to the minister. The Rev. E. T. Russell, of Glasgow, also assisted and gave the charge to the congregation. In response to Mr. Forrest's charge, Mr. Innes spoke as follows:—Praying for the strength which is of God, and hoping to have the full sympathy and support of the congregation, I humbly undertake the ministry of this church. My ideals in regard to the performance of ministerial duties are so high that I cannot expect to realise them ; but I will steadily walk with my face towards them, and my heart will be in the work I have to do. I preach the highest that I know of pure, earnest, and rational religion ; a religion of love and truth, founded in, and radiating from the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man ; a religion that shall stand the test of the reason which God has given us, yet not be in itself what is called the "cold light of reason," but have in it all the warmth of the heart and all the aspiration of the soul. The religion which enlists my willing service is not a thing of belief or profession, not a saying "Lord, Lord," but a life to be lived, ever higher and higher, nearer and nearer to the Father who "loved us into life." My soul's desire is that we may find communion with Him in prayer, and His salvation in the doing of His will. Living the love in truth, as well as "speaking the truth in love," walking as worthy children of God and enlightened disciples of Jesus, may we be able, in accord with the exhortation of the Master, to "let our light so shine before men that they, seeing our good works, may glorify our Father who is in Heaven."

Leigh : Lancashire.—On Sunday last the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie took the evening service, and preached a helpful missionary sermon on "Our Unitarian Message." A social party was held on Tuesday, when Mr. J. Battersby (one of the members of the congregation) presented the school with a large framed photograph of the pastor, the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, in the pulpit at the harvest festival.

Liverpool : Ullet-road.—On Sunday morning a service, in memory of the late Mr. Henry Tate, was held, conducted by the Rev. Dr. de Beaumont Klein, who had also conducted the funeral service in London on the previous Friday.

London and South-Eastern Provincial Assembly.—On Tuesday and Wednesday evenings united devotional services were held at Effra-road, Brixton, and Unity Church, Islington, respectively, for members of the churches in the South and North of London. In the service at Effra-road, the Revs. R. H. Greaves, F. W. Stanley, L. Jenkins Jones, W. G. Tarrant, W. W. Chynoweth Pope, and F. Allen took part ; at Unity Church, the Revs. F. K. Freeston, R. H. U. Bloor, W. Wooding, G. D. Hicks, and W. Wilson.

London : Stepney Green, E.—The Rev. George Critchley, B.A., late minister of Burnt Ash Congregational Church, Lee, has undertaken the pastorate of College Chapel for a time. It is a source of great encouragement to the small group of workers and worshippers there to have secured a minister again, and it is their earnest hope that during his stay something really effective may be done to build up this struggling congregation. Mr. Critchley will at first take the evening service only.

Manchester : Pendleton.—On Monday week the Rev. P. M. Higginson, M.A., gave a most interesting and instructive account of his recent trip up the Nile, before the members of the Literary and Debating Society. The lantern illustrations were much appreciated, and on the proposition of the President, the Rev. J. Thomas, a most hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Higginson. Mr. Wigley manipulated the lantern. A "Guild of Workers," and as an auxiliary a "Girls' Society," have been instituted in connection with the church and school.

Mottram.—On Monday evening, Feb. 3, Mr. and Mrs. Noble, who are leaving Mottram, gave a party in the schoolroom of the Christian Church, to about 130 members of the choir, officials, and the Misses Noble's Sunday-school class. After tea the Rev. N. Green took the chair, and a musical programme was rendered. Occasion was taken to present to Mrs. Noble a beautiful silver salver on behalf of the S S. sewing class.

Parkstone.—On Feb. 16 Mr. W. T. Bushrod, of Southampton, gave the first of a series of Sunday evening services in "Emerson" Hall, Constitution-hill, the subject of discourse being "The Army of Martyrs." Mr. Bushrod, who is an earnest religious and temperance worker, and a very effective speaker, was listened to with close attention and interest by a congregation of between forty and fifty in number.

Rotherham.—On Tuesday, Feb. 11, a large audience witnessed, and great success attended, the performance in the Church of Our Father Sunday-school of the operetta, Merryton Market. The performance, in which some fifty young people took part, was in aid of the Sunday-school Restoration Fund.

Shrewsbury.—On Sunday last the annual meeting of the High-street congregation was held, when the Committee's report and statement of accounts for year ending Dec. 31, 1901, was read by the secretary (Mr. R. Mansell). The report referred at some length to the valuable services rendered by the minister (the Rev. J. C. Street), and congratulated him on attaining his seventieth birthday. They rejoiced to find that, notwithstanding his many years of ministerial life, he was still full of vigour, and the hope of the meeting was, that he would still be spared many years to carry on his good and useful work. On the occasion of Mr. Street's birthday, the evening service was conducted by Mr. Street's two sons—the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., Bolton, and the Rev. S. H. Street, B.A., Great Hucklow, Mr. Street himself preaching the sermon to a large congregation.

South Shields.—A most successful Bazaar and Sale of Work was held at Unity Church on Wednesday, Feb. 12. The proceedings (in the unavoidable absence of Mr. S. A. Smith) were opened by the Rev. F. Wood, of Sunderland. During the afternoon and evening entertainments were given by some children of the Sunday-school, by a gramophone, kindly lent by Mr. Smith, and by a magic lantern.

Stourbridge (Appointment).—Mr. A. Hermann Thomas, B.A., at present a student of Manchester College, Oxford, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the congregation of the Presbyterian Chapel to be their minister. Mr. Thomas will take up the duties of his appointment about July next, and in the meantime the Rev. George St. Clair, F.G.S., has kindly consented to act as supply.

AKUREYRI RELIEF FUND.—In addition to the amount of £117 1s., acknowledged last week, the following additional contributions have been received :—W. R. Stevenson, £1 1s.; M. S., £1 1s.; Mrs. and Miss Spencer, £1; I. A. C. (Edinburgh), £1; S. T. W. £1; A Friend, per Rev. John Moore, 10s.; H. Blessley, 5s.; and E. D. G., 5s. This makes a total of £123 3s., which will be at once forwarded to Mr. Jochumsson at Akureyri. The Fund is now closed.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT published in Thursday's Daily News a form of petition of which he will send copies, as far as he can, to those wishing to address to Lord Salisbury a plea for the life of Commandant Kritzinger, a Burgher of the Orange Free State, who was captured, while making a fearless attempt to rescue a wounded comrade. Kritzinger was to be tried by court-martial, and news comes through so slowly, that possibly he has already, like Scheepers, been condemned and shot. But in the hope that it may not be too late, a strong plea is being made that even should he have been condemned by the court-martial, such a "judicial murder," as it is characterised, of a brave foe, should be stayed, for the honour of England, and in the interest of future peace in South Africa. One of the weightiest expressions of this view is the following letter of Mr. George Meredith's :—

SIR,—One who is neither for the Boer nor against him, and who thinks that the case of each party in the South African conflict has not yet been fully stated, claims a short space in your columns to join his voice with those now crying for the discarded "quality of mercy." It is England's good name that interests me. I remember the days before the now well-beloved Emperor Franz Josef was taught by sharp experience the virtue residing in benevolent acts, when Austria was denounced by our country from end to end for the ruthless hangings and shootings of rebels. Italians and Hungarians, free of their yoke, remember our sympathy of that clouded time. They are amazed to see this England guilty of the fruitless butcheries which dealt their recoil blow upon Imperial Austria. Such insensate inhumanity must be stopped, or Englishmen will have to learn that apathy in the season of evil deeds is not only a crime, but perceptibly written by history as the cause of national disaster.—Yours, &c. GEORGE MEREDITH.

Box Hill, Dorking, Feb. 24.

THE Rev. Charles Gore, D.D., late Canon of Westminster, was consecrated Bishop of Worcester last Sunday, in Lambeth Palace Chapel, and on the following Wednesday was enthroned in Worcester Cathedral. At the consecration an impressive sermon was preached by Dr. Moberly, Canon of Christ Church, Oxford, in the course of which he insisted that for bishops they must have their best and wisest, their most spiritual, their true leaders and teachers.

"It is the true fatherly chief pastorate of souls, it is Episcopal wisdom in council, the best—because the most spiritual—guidance of the body of the Church, which the Church always needs, and cannot dispense with in her Bishops. She needs that which she cannot have, unless the wisest, the greatest, the most influential, the holiest of her sons are within, not without, the council and the responsibility of the Bishops. She needs them, and she needs them there."

Speaking towards the close of his sermon of the consecration, for which they were preparing, Dr. Moberly said :—

A scene of consecration? Yes; and we too, all of us, are to take our part in it. The effort of our spirits—responding in earnest, fervent desire to the Spirit of God within us—is to form part of the spiritual atmosphere—part of the Divine quiet and the Divine strength—which are to be, from this day forth and for ever, elements in the consecration of him whose consecration specially it is. Think, if you will, what the preparation must be, what the reflecting and ordering of heart, of one who comes to receive consecration as Bishop. Think—not that we may intrude—but that we may realise what it is with which we have to correspond, what it is to which we have to contribute our spiritual part. Think also of what we can conceive a Bishop, with his consecration upon him, as representing, wherever he goes, in his diocese. Think of the atmosphere of prayer, the realisation of peace, the gentleness of sympathy, the patience of love; think of him as a fountain to all the diocese, and to its thirsty places, of spiritual hope, and spiritual life; so that, wherever he goes, something is felt, in him, of the manifestation of the character of God. By his thoughts and his ways; by his aims and his method of working towards his aims; by his patience and fortitude; by his radiant cheeriness and kindliness, his inherent gladness of heart; by his wisdom and tact, his self-denial and self-devotion, men and women are to see glimpses—such glimpses as the heart can discern and thrill to—of the Spirit which is his life; and are to recognise and own that he has been with, that he has come from—nay, that he carries with him, in what they feel that he is—the very spirit of Jesus. For a consecration is upon him, a consecration abiding and effectual.

After his enthronement at Worcester the Bishop addressed both the clergy and laity. To the latter, he said, as reported in the Guardian, that the Church had great traditions of maintaining the message of God. That work was the vocation of them all, and not of the clergy only. They were all consecrated to it. It did not do to leave it to the clergy to run the business of religion. They were all responsible. They were all entrusted with the care of His Church. To all God gave His charge. If God was to fulfil among them in any adequate measure the greatness of His love and largeness of His purposes, it could not be through the energy and wisdom of one or a few officers of the body. It must be because the whole body co-operated, each contributing that which his position enabled him to do to the common work. If that spirit inspired them truly the energy and capacity of every one was multiplied tenfold by the sense of community in effort. The denial and restraint which they imposed for the sake of unity upon their own proclivities was rewarded ten times over by the greater largeness and richness of the result. Let them pray for the unity of the body; let them lay more and more aside the meannesses, pettinesses, smallnesses, and suspicions which belonged to cliques and views and parties, and labour with largeness of spirit for the common end.

ON Thursday week Mr. Stopford Brooke concluded the second series of his University College lectures on Poetry for the present session. In the last two lectures Mr. Brooke, having dealt with William Morris, reverted to the later poems of Robert Browning. One lecture was devoted to "The Ring and the Book," which occupies a central place in Browning's works. It was in June, 1862, just a year after his wife's death, when he himself was in his fiftieth year, that Browning picked up this old book in Florence, which gave him the subject for his masterpiece, in which he tells the same tragic story twelve times over, but without any monotony or repetition save of the facts. The poem was originally published in four volumes, beginning November, 1868, at intervals of a month, each volume containing three books, and to allow the poem to have its due effect Mr. Brooke advised that it should be read at such intervals as Browning had chosen in giving it to the world, taking four months, and reading each book at an interval of ten days. "The Ring and the Book" was described as a mixed book, the central arena of the struggle in Browning between prose and poetry. There are sections of the poem, notably the central books in which the story is told by Caponsacchi and Pompilia, where Browning's poetry is at its height; in others he is writing entirely from the intellect, and wit has quite extruded imagination. Where the lawyers take up the story poetry trembles on the verge of extinction. The one imaginative power which never failed in Browning was that of creating men and women into distinct individualities, a power in which Carlyle was nearly as remarkable as he, and which is not specially the mark of a poet.

In his concluding lecture Mr. Brooke dealt with the later poems of Browning, which followed "The Ring and the Book." In "Prince Hohenstiel-Schwangau," "Fifine at the Fair," "The Inn Album," and "Red Cotton Nightcap Country," he said, there is pleasure to be found only for the curious intellect, for these books are the work of wit sitting at the desk of poetry. He writes in verse, but poetry has left the room and taken high imagination away with her. Yet in "Fifine" there are gleams of poetry breaking through again. Those poems are intellectual, not imaginative. They must not be classed even with the work of Pope or Dryden; they are in a class apart, formless and discursive, not clear and concise like Pope and Dryden. The natural man is in them. Browning is in them wholly, indulging in himself. He amuses himself with himself, and makes the poems eminently human, but does not make them poetical. When he had finished those books, which dealt with side issues in human nature and left the questions where they were before, the poet in him began to revive. But though henceforth intellectual and imaginative elements were both present in his work, they were not perfectly blended as formerly in his finest poems, and he remained a divided man. In "La Saisiaz," Browning had recovered his noble way of treating a subject. He is no longer outside but in his subject, and it is steeped throughout with vital feeling. In "Asolando," his last book, there were poems written after Browning was eighty, showing that wonderful power in which his brother Tennyson had shared. The heroic temper of a good soldier for God and man, with faith in the divine conclusion of our life, never failed in Browning. The epilogue to "Asolando" delares it, and with those verses Mr. Brooke brought his lecture to a close.

Why make we moan
For loss that doth enrich us yet
With upward yearnings of regret?
As thrills of long-hushed tone
Live in the viol, so our souls grow fine
With keen vibrations from the touch divine
Of noble natures gone.

NON-SUBSCRIPTION AND UNITARIANISM.

Sir,—May I suggest, with reference to Mr. Fripp's letter in your issue of the 22nd inst., that the moral of Benjamin Franklin's parable of the fog appears to be not that every man must confess himself in a fog with the rest, but that every man should acknowledge that he and all others have "light enough to walk by"—if they will only make use of it.

Mr. Fripp would suggest—if it did not appear "heretical and eccentric"—that "those among us who are doing their best to fasten their Unitarianism upon our Free Churches" (terms on which I trust you will allow me a word of comment presently) "might take an idea or two from the Dunkers," and, according to Franklin's analogy, confess themselves in a fog with the rest.

Now, Sir, I know nothing of the Dunkers, except that, after some inquiry, their confession of obscurity seems to have been prophetic, and to such an extent that it would seem ill-advised for any earnest religious body to take an idea from them in their unprofitable recognition of universal fog.

On the contrary, rather let all, except those in the grossest "London particular" of Agnosticism—and even they have a certain wistful light in the region of West Kensington—take the other moral of Franklin's parable, and acknowledge that immediately around them, blurred as the distant view may be, there is light blessed and certain, and sufficient to guide them in the inevitable next step onward.

And is it not the recognition of this fact that Unitarianism claims and stands for? Is not its cardinal principle that every man has "light enough" for the conduct of life—yes, and more, for the interpretation of those "august anticipations, symbols, types," not only "of a dim splendour ever on before," but of the innate and precious mystery of Eternal Being that attends us at every step?

This, I take it—though I speak under correction as an inquirer in a new school of faith—is the positive and best significance of Unitarianism. The Unitarian, I imagine, feeling that ruling convictions are dependent, at least for expression, on the facts of knowledge, and must therefore undergo change, submits, not grudgingly but trustfully and gladly, to the modification which progress is constantly making in his convictions and their expression. He further recognises that conviction is an intensely individual matter, and does not expect that, except in its broadest and most self-evident aspect, conviction can find collective expression. Both these facts prevent his subscribing a creed. Both are inferences drawn from the very nature of Man, and he is therefore justified in maintaining an uncompromising attitude towards the votaries of "creed," especially as he finds that history proves by a kind of reductio ad absurdum the demonstration made directly from nature.

In this way he is differentiated from the Churches—Roman, Anglican, and Evangelical—recognised in this country. But there is a vast number of people also differentiated from those Churches—agnostics, ethicists, and a still larger number whose connection with the recognised Churches is scarcely even nominal, and who are indifferent to any outside influences; and from these again he (the Unitarian) is differentiated by a desire for spiritual communion and fellowship for collective worship, and by affinity of conviction and aim. His very objection to subscription prevents him formulating this conviction and aim, but that does not interfere with his knowing, and, as need arises, expressing very clearly what Unitarianism stands for, and checking any tendency he may detect within it to that limp comprehensiveness the ultimate goal of which is: Does it matter?

In an age of transition such as this, must not this phase of religious aspiration and effort commend itself, both on the side of its non-subscription and on the side of its uncompromising attitude, to every soul at once seeking emancipation from creed, and earnest for all the best that creed typified?

The prospects of Unitarianism are great, and as a positive, progressive, and—let it be added—hard-working faith it pierces with direct Divine beam the chilly dimness of transition. In this sense its significance is probably far greater than anything in the visions of Lindsey, Priestley, and Belsham. In a day when few persons take the Trinity seriously, its doctrinal emphasis is towards far vaster conclusions than bare anti-Trinitarianism, but does it not—I mean the word itself—more fully and accurately express its present significance than it did its meaning in the days of Priestley? Surely there is no better word for expressing faith in the fundamental unity of God and Man, and in the uniformity of God's laws, and in the universality of His revelation, and in the brotherhood of the race, and in that ultimate participation in the Divine Love which is the inspiration of our lives! Let alone the fact that names are begotten rather than chosen, that they survive long after their original significance is popularly forgotten, and that nothing is more difficult than to change a name once familiar to the public ear, could the utmost ingenuity of philology devise a term that better befits the Unitarians than the term Unitarian? I am led to ask this because something in Mr. Fripp's letter seems to indicate that he girds at this term "Unitarian." Why? Is it misunderstanded of the people? All the better opportunity of explaining its real significance. Does it carry with it a certain obloquy? I cannot think that to Mr. Fripp or any other earnest man this would weigh for a moment. What would he substitute? The term "Free Church" is already annexed, and though those who have annexed it use it almost as anomalously as churchpeople when they speak of the "National" Church, it sticks conveniently to the Evangelical Churches, and is proportionately misleading as applied to Unitarians. I open my "Aids to Reflection," and there find Coleridge suggesting that the "simple and inoffensive" designation for Unitarianism would be Psilanthropism! Surely we are to be congratulated that this shared the fate of so many productions of that unwieldy mind from Pantisocracy onwards. No, Sir; let us, after all, take an idea from the Dunkers in their pathetic obscurity and keep the old name, and see that we have the real thing behind it.

THE STORY OF WALES.*

"Welsh land is abhorrent to me, and South Welsh land most of all. As to Welsh history I used to dabble in Celtic things long ago, but now one sees what far more interesting things there are, especially in Italy. I don't feel disposed to bother myself about those lying and unbreeched barbarians."

So wrote J. R. Green, the famous historian, in a letter to his friend Professor Freeman. Elsewhere he expresses his dislike of the Welsh in language which he would hardly have used but for his uncongenial surroundings as an undergraduate at Jesus College, Oxford, then, even more than now, almost exclusively resorted to by students from the Principality. But Welsh history was little known to English scholars in Green's early days; and the heroes of its long warfare for independence were but mere names, or as legendary as the Glendower of Shakespeare's Henry IV. The ordinary "Sassenach" duly admires the delightful scenery as he hurriedly passes through it, but knows little of the real life of its people. The upper classes have become Anglicised, the industrial districts are invaded by hosts of strangers who have no interest in the national history and poetic traditions; and until recent years Welshmen themselves had to go beyond the boundaries of their own land for their higher education.

If that picturesque country is not as much as Scotland and Ireland a land of poetry and romance, it is quia caret vate sacro—at least in language generally understood by English-speaking people. Mr. Bradley's "Life of Glyndwr," recently reviewed in these columns, showed that there were ample materials in the adventurous and mysterious career of that national hero for a romance rivalling the best of the Waverley series. And tourists of all nationalities have long ago discovered that the majestic mountains of North Wales, and the softer scenery of South Wales, have attractions that may be equalled but can hardly be surpassed in any other part of the United Kingdom.

The author of the "Story of Wales," Mr. Owen Edwards, of Lincoln College, Oxford, whose name sufficiently indicates his nationality, in proposing what he styles a first attempt at writing a continuous history of Wales, expresses his fear that a mass of details tends to obscure the outlines of the story of a very simple and definite development. Through a considerable portion of the earlier period he has had to depend upon legendary rather than historical material. And here he acknowledges the invaluable guidance he has had in the transcripts and catalogues of our friend Mr. Gwenogfryn Evans, D.Lit., a former student of Carmarthen College, the oldest institution of the kind in Wales. Out of a somewhat tangled skein he has managed to weave a clear, concise, and, in most of the periods, very interesting history. In the first half we have the rise and fall of the princely caste, of which the Llywelyns and Glyndwr were the heroes; and in the second half the rise of the self-educated and self-governed peasantry, which has, perhaps, higher claims to be called the finest in Europe than the "pisantry" to which that phrase is usually applied. The courtly tales of the Mabinogion and the exquisite artistic odes of Davydd ap Gwilym—the Welsh Chaucer—and his contemporaries were the literature of the Princes, the former now accessible to English scholars, the latter still enwrapped in the obscurity of a tongue known to but few outside the charmed circle.

Of Davydd ap Gwilym, it may be remarked in passing, a striking account is given in the Quarterly Review for October last, concluding with the expression of regret that no adequate edition of his poems has yet been produced.

The mountains of Wales explain its isolation, and its love of independence. Of their influence the author well remarks:—

> The mountains of Wales make political union difficult, they gave the inhabitants the same characteristics, and gave them community of ideas and of aims centuries before combined action became possible. The wild and rugged outlines of the mountains are mirrored as intense but broken purposes in the Welshman's character, always forming great ideals, but lacking in the steady perseverance of the people of the plain. The silent and energetic solitude of the mountains has sunk into the Welshman's character as the fatalism which is the basis of his life and thought. . . . His imagination makes him exceedingly impressionable—he has always loved poetry and theology; but this very imagination, while enabling him to see great ideals, makes him incapable of realising them: he is too impatient to be capable of organisation. . . . But we can trace a continuity of character from the warlike and rebellious Welshmen of the dawn of our history—the brood of the eagle and the wolf—to the peaceful Welshman of the present day, the best of subjects and the ideal colonist.

A land of mountains is almost everywhere the early home of patriotism and legend, so that the ancient history of Wales is perhaps even more legendary and poetic than that of its greater neighbour. Space fails us to follow the course of the narrative through a long succession of periods, but admiration is due to the author for the evident mastery of his materials, and the skill and lucidity with which he takes the reader through the tangled history of wars and rebellions; the raids of jealous neighbours on each other, and plots and internal dissensions without number. The period of the great Llewelyn is full of interest, as also that of the less heroic but more accomplished and sagacious Glyndwr. It is clear from the whole narrative that the Welsh lost the independence they so gallantly maintained on account of their own internal jealousies and dissensions, wars between kindred and rival princes, which made national unity and prosperity almost impossible until the rule of the stronger was finally established.

It is curious to note that the Welsh, who are now for the most part "the Protestants of the Protestant religion, and the Dissidents of Dissent," were strongly opposed to the Reformation, which was foreign to all their ancient traditions and imaginative sensibilities. It was forced upon them by Thomas Cromwell, who was represented in Wales by men who had all their master's energy, but "whose unscrupulous methods and grasping avarice could not open the eyes of an unwilling people to the moral grandeur of a great religious reformation." But when a religious revival came as a reaction from the deadness of the early part of the eighteenth century it awakened all the latent enthusiasm of the emotional Welsh character. Howel Harris preached to the conscience with a trumpet voice. He travelled from one end of Wales to the other, and his powerful eloquence and mystic visions "aroused a semi-superstitious people into a frenzied attempt at solving in a religious form the deepest problem in human life."

There are many points of this valuable work on which it would be interesting to dwell, but we can only add that the book is enriched by several illustrations of the picturesque castles, abbeys, and churches of Wales, with glimpses of majestic Snowdon and Cader Idris, and seven maps, rather too small for average eyes, to aid the reader in following the development of the history.

Will the "gentle reader"—to adopt the old-fashioned phrase which, of course, is peculiarly applicable to readers of THE INQUIRER—pardon in conclusion a personal reference? The present writer feels that he is under special obligation to Wales. During an almost uninterrupted succession of visits for more than forty years as secretary of the governing body of the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, he became warmly attached to the Welsh character, with its deep religious fervour, combined with great vigour of intellectual life and an ardent poetic imagination. In an address presented to him at the close of his career by representatives of the four prominent Nonconformist denominations he values most of all the words "he loveth our nation," and is glad to take this opportunity of acknowledging the ever-increasing delight of visiting scenes full of both legendary and historical lore, and forming friendships with leading representatives of the sturdy Nonconformist stock, which have in no degree been affected by some differences of theological opinion. If Wales is still the land of poetry and romance, it is no less in these latter days the land of material progress and increasing prosperity, and, what is still better, the land of deep-rooted attachment to religious and political freedom.

LUKE DELMEGE.*

THE Roman Catholic priest, Father Sheehan, is author of novels which belong, actually as well as nominally, to true literature. In the region of fiction he had already done good service before the production of "Luke Delmege,"—a story which now, a few weeks after publication, is entering its second edition. Father Sheehan's "Triumph of Failure" deserved the character of a successful book, if not of an eminently artistic novel. And in "My New Curate," the author entertained us with his humour, touched us with his pathos, and, from cover to cover, delighted us, with many indications of a richly furnished, thoughtful, and poetic mind. Above all, he taught us to know and love the central figure of the story, Father Dan, a large-hearted, generous, by no means faultless priest, certain "leaves" from whose "diary" introduced us to the "New Curate" and his typically Irish flock.

* "Luke Delmage." By Father Sheehan. Longmans, Green and Co. Price 6s.

In "Luke Delmege" we have a more ambitious story. The criticism which Father Sheehan's book arouses has, in some quarters, taken the form of hearty praise, in others of considerable censure; nowhere could the story be passed over in slighting silence. The Spectator regards the work as highly interesting, entertaining, and stimulating on every page. The Tablet, on the contrary, loftily disposes of it as an unsuccessful venture, consisting of vulgar and conventional scenes, linked together by no thread of essential connection. "Luke Delmege" is not dramatic—and perhaps it may be remarked, in passing, that its author is by no means so skilful in the weaving of a plot as in the sketching of character—but it deals powerfully and very systematically with phases in the life and character of a Roman Catholic priest.

Luke Delmege gained high honours at Maynooth; he emerged from college, buoyant, enthusiastic, a trifle too self-confident, ardently religious—a red-hot Irish patriot. It was with no small regret that he left the Fatherland behind him, when an Episcopal behest despatched him to a mission in London. In Babylon of the Nineteenth Century, modern philosophical thought, with which he came in contact, naturally affected his young, impressionable mind, which, however, remained true to its old allegiance, and unhesitatingly accepted the dogmas of an authoritative teaching Church. A brilliant speaker and preacher, endued with genuine Irish wit, Delmege devoted his best powers to the refutation of anti-Catholic arguments. He strenuously met Philosophy with Philosophy. The central policy of his campaign was to force an entrance into the arsenal of his enemies, and to use their own weapons against themselves. And the consequence of Delmege's chosen mode of warfare was that his own people failed to understand him; he did not escape suspicions of heresy. Misunderstandings sobered and saddened the enthusiastic young priest, and his greatest triumphs seemed, even to himself, to evolve no permanent results. "Converts," won by his eloquence, fell away, lapsing into schism, or, worse still, into sheer Agnosticism. Delmege lost touch with his own associates; he shrank into himself, a clever, and even a brilliant, but, at the same time, a reserved, disappointed, and somewhat unsociable, man. England and English freedom of thought had for awhile charmed and stimulated him, but in the end he willingly returned to Ireland, to end his life, in solitary fashion, among simple-minded peasants, to whom doubts and questionings concerning the infallibility of their Church were absolutely unknown. Spite of his peaceful surroundings, where intellectual progress was at a discount, his mind remained restless. "Poor Luke," exclaims his biographer, "he could never leave these turbulent questions alone. Why, and why, and why? As if there was any key to the mighty riddle, except that which is hidden away somewhere in the folds of God's garments, and which He never shows, until after He has unlocked the secrets of the grave."

Luke Delmege's life-story is well told, without exaggeration, with true insight, and without a trace of cant. The interest of the book is a genuinely human interest, and throughout the story it is well sustained. Most of the minor characters are ably sketched, but the "non-Catholic" reader, whatever his attempt to dismiss unworthy bias and prejudice, will hardly be deeply interested in the heroine of the book, an Irish girl—niece of the Canon, who presides over the village, which is Luke's native place—who, in her absorbing anxiety for the salvation of the soul of her ne'er-do-weel brother, believes herself divinely commanded to enter—as a vicarious act of reparation—a religious order, not of nuns, pure and simple, but of fallen "penitents." Her religion, pure, deep and sincere though it is, has not led her to a recognition of the sublime truth that the heart of the All Father goes out, in His infinite tenderness to His erring children, and that He asks no sacrifice to win them over to the side of those who, by reason of their sins and grievous failures, stand most sorely in need of His all-achieving, all-subduing Love.

The Tablet's broad hint that Father Sheehan is somewhat lacking in the dramatic force which is required for the production of an ingenious plot is not, as has already been indicated, quite devoid of foundation in fact. But the author's defect, if defect it be, is shared by one of the greatest masters of fiction, Charles Dickens. And it would be strange, and even difficult, to read his record of Luke Delmege's experiences without grateful realisation of his broad sense of humanity, his insight into character, and his artistic and poetic skill in word-painting and word-portraiture.

With our author's dogmatic religion we are often out of accord, but that circumstance does not, of course, detract from the merit of a novel, which is adapted mainly for Roman Catholics. "The loneliness of God in His London tabernacles," writes Father Sheehan (and the words apply, as we know, to the sacramental presence in the Host) "invariably led Luke to the cognate reflection of the loneliness of God, and His hiddenness in His universe." "Lord, Lord, how lonely and silent, how hidden and neglected Thou art. Of all the millions in this hideous city, how many, how few are aware of Thy awful presence." Another book than Father Sheehan's—an ancient book—a storehouse of Immortal Literature—contains the words: "The Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands." And Thought, which is none the less reverent because it is "modern" and free, has more and more tended to the conviction of the Immanence of God in all His universe. And it must surely be a sublime reflection that just as words are expressions of human thought, so humanity is an expression of the thought of the vast creative force, manifested in phenomena. Of one supreme expression of the Thought of the Infinite, we read "The Word" (the Utterance) "was made flesh." To those who hold this glorious creed of the immanence of the Divine in all the works of His hand, such a phrase as "the loneliness of God in His London tabernacles" seems almost meaningless, or, at best, inadequate and misleading.

But we do not read "Delmege" to study theology, but rather to enjoy fiction. Reading with this purpose, our satisfaction is secure. Annette Calthorp.

This book is now translated into English for the first time. Some of the educational works of Komensky (Comenius) have been translated many times, and have made his name honourably familiar at least among teachers. But here we have a book of another order. Its subject is more general and popular. It is said by the translator to be a great favourite with the Moravian people. He also describes it as the author's masterpiece.

One is, therefore, disappointed to find oneself closing it with the feeling that it has an historical rather than a living interest. In its general idea, the journey through the "Labyrinth of the World" has some resemblance to the "Pilgrim's Progress." But instead of Bunyan's plentiful variety of symbolic illustration, crisp dialogue, and dramatic incident, we have in the story of Komensky little but a panoramic show with a running comment of unrelieved lament and denunciation. When he wrote this book (1623) there was for Komensky no such thing as natural goodness or happiness in the world. He became afterwards a most successful instructor of youth, but in the "Labyrinth" he speaks as though even from children he could receive no joy. "Thus, then, did I understand that to have and not to have offspring is misery" (p. 94). He reviews all the callings and conditions of men, and the prospect is everywhere one of ugliness and gloom.

Only in the "Paradise of the Heart" can he find any solace and hope. It is in the closing chapters that he speaks of this, and very true and eloquent are many of his words. One is often reminded of the "Imitation" and of the "Thoughts of Marcus Aurelius." And nothing could give a better idea of the spirit of the Moravian Brethren—so like to that of the Quakers. But we find that strain of extravagance which is characteristic of the extremist mysticism, and which is only saved from being fatal in its consequences if it is taken in connection with contradictory passages.

He who desired to enter there had to forsake all his goods, his eyes and ears, his mind and heart; for it was said that he who would be wise before God must become simple of mind; he who wished to know God must forget everything else; he who wished to possess God must desert everything else.—(297).

Many such passages stand in dangerous isolation. Now and then a corrective is supplied, as on p. 300.

Although those who enter must put away and renounce their reason, yet the Holy Ghost returns it to them, purified and refined, so that they are, as it were, full of eyes, wherever they go in the world, whatever they see, hear, smell, taste, above them, under them, around them, everywhere they see the footsteps of God, and they know how to turn everything to piety.

But if that is true, why should the question be asked—"Hast thou seen how the leeches contrive divers remedies to defend and prolong life? But for what purpose shouldst thou trouble about the length of thy life?"—(286). And why should it be said—"Companionship is but an aid to sin, or to senseless fooling, or waste of time"?—(289). In reading such passages, it is not easy to realise that their author became a powerful advocate of natural methods in the teaching of children.

The "Labyrinth of the World" was an early work. The Thirty Years' War was raging and had driven Komensky from home and country. This may partly account for his pessimistic tone. But the severely pietistic type of his inherited religion also moulded his language about "the world." One cannot help wondering whether he thought as well of his "Labyrinth" as his followers continued to do, when, on the one hand, he had become Bishop of the Unity (1648), and, on the other hand, had adopted the Baconian aim to make knowledge a mirror of the universe.

H. Rawlings.

The centenary of the birth of Victor Hugo was celebrated in France on Wednesday as a national occasion, the President of the Republic taking part in the observances at the Pantheon in Paris. M. Georges Leygues, Minister of Education, delivered an eloquent oration, in which he spoke of Hugo as one who "clothed the French language with an incomparable splendour, and as a citizen who had given one of the loftiest examples of civic virtue that history had known." "A great poet, his life had been a long struggle for liberty and right." "He gave voice to the enthusiasms, the revolts, and the hopes of the fatherland." M. Hanotaux, Director of the French Academy, also added a eulogy, and some eloquent passages from Hugo were afterwards recited.

At the beginning of the year we acknowledged the kindness of a number of friends in subscribing for copies of The Inquirer, which are sent to Free Public Libraries in different parts of the country. The subscriptions so received for the present year do not, however, by any means yet cover the cost of the library copies at present sent out, there being still twenty-one copies unprovided for, and another appeal has recently come in, on behalf of a new Branch Library in Bermondsey, which we should find it very hard to refuse. There are also six copies, which have hitherto been sent to representative Theological Colleges, through the generosity of a friend whose loss we have recently had to mourn. We should be thankful if there were friends willing, of their kindness, to meet these needs.

The annual meeting of subscribers and friends of the Mansford-street Church and Mission is to be held in the church on Thursday evening next, when the Rev. Joseph Wood, of the Old Meeting, Birmingham, has kindly promised to take the chair. This will be the last annual meeting at which the Rev. W. G. Cadman will be present as missionary, prior to his removal to Macclesfield, and the committee trust that there will be a large attendance to mark the general and high appreciation of the untiring efforts of Mr. Cadman and his family on behalf of the Church and Mission. The report to be presented will give an account of work not unworthy of the traditions of the Old Spicer-street Mission and the late Rev. C. L. Corkran.

OBITUARY.

MISS C. A. MARTINEAU.

Miss Caroline A. Martineau was the second daughter of Mr. Richard Martineau, a first cousin of Dr. James Martineau. She was born in London in 1843, and when only ten years old had her only experience of foreign travel—in Switzerland and North Italy. She went to school at Nottingham, where Miss Werz and Miss Buob were carrying on the school founded by Mrs. Turner.

She was about seventeen when her taste for scientific study began to develop itself, especially under the influence of Faraday and Tyndall, whose lectures at the Royal Institution she used to attend; and science remained her chief intellectual interest to the end of her life. But it was also more than this. It was a great part of the poetry and no small part of the devotion, as well as a constant support and solace of her life. For the idea of a conflict between religion and science was very remote from her mind and alien to her experience. It was a grief to her to think that anyone could regard Darwinianism, of which she was an ardent disciple, as antagonistic to religion, and she gave earnest thought to the task of presenting to children and others the religious aspects of the doctrine of evolution in their simplest form. This, for instance, was the object of some papers that she contributed to the "Teachers' Notes," edited by Mr. Millson and others. In these and in her other writings there were none of the vices of apologetics, no straining of a point for argumentative purposes, but the secure and loving exposition of a harmony that was a matter of experience to herself. Her popular books, "Letters on Water and Air," "Chapters on Sound," "Earth, Air, and Water," &c., are well known amongst us. Of the new edition of her "Voices of Nature" we published a review only last December.

But deep and abiding as her love of science was, all special study was ultimately thrown into the background by other interests. When in 1854 her father bought a house in Suffolk, and the family began to spend the summer regularly in the country, Miss Caroline Martineau began to take a deep personal interest in her poorer neighbours. The human side of all the ordinary relationships of life is more easily grasped, and human beings are more easily individualised and realised in the conditions of country than of town life; but the keen interests and deep affections wakened in the country could not sleep in the town, and though she never lost her devoted interest in the welfare of her Suffolk friends, Miss Martineau became known to a wider circle for her untiring devotion to the beneficent work in London associated especially with the names of Miss Octavia Hill and Miss Cons. Her first connection with this work was established in 1872, when she became one of Miss Hill's rent-collectors. Her gentle and even timid nature, her shrinking from everything sordid, her difficulty in realising or believing in things evil, her total lack of the more strikingly aggressive and commanding powers of enterprise which we usually associate with practical success, made her appear singularly unsuited for the task she had undertaken; and, indeed, it was up-hill work, and at first sorely disheartening. Month after month she felt her unfitness and her utter lack of success or of usefulness. But she persevered and triumphed. At last she came to be regarded by her fellow workers as the one to be appealed to in special crises; and her younger friends never knew what had gone to the making of the unbroken serenity and the quiet effectiveness which they admired. She had the persistence of absolute singleness of purpose, the strength of gentleness and complete self-devotion, and presently something of that wonderful shrewdness—unattainable by the man of the world—that waits upon perfect innocence and enables it to walk securely and judge soundly where Mr. Wordly-Wiseman is at fault.

In 1881 Miss Martineau formed a friendship with Miss Cons, fruitful in work for the public good and a deep and unfailing source of strength to the two friends themselves. Henceforth the "Vic" was the centre of Miss Martineau's public work, though nothing seems to have been dropped for it. At the "Vic," or, as we ought to call it, "The Royal Victoria Hall," in the Waterloo-road, Miss Martineau's duties were varied in the extreme. Those to whom she appeared as a silent and prim seventeenth-century Puritan or Quakeress who had strayed into a wrong century would have opened their eyes if they had seen her behind the scenes of the Victoria Music Hall stage, quietly sitting in judgment on the variety entertainment of a popular clown, or legislating firmly, but not too severely, on the costume of a danseuse; but it will be readily believed that though she performed such functions with a perfect good grace and humanity, her chosen field was on the educational side of the enterprise. She instituted weekly science lectures; and, with the help of Dr. W. L. Carpenter, supplemented them by science classes held at first in the back rooms of the hall; and this led ultimately to the foundation of the Morley Memorial College, of which Miss Martineau became principal. After her mother's death in 1887, Miss Caroline Martineau and her elder sister devoted themselves entirely to works of public and private beneficence, and their two houses in London and in Suffolk were known and blessed for their unostentatious and seemingly unlimited hospitalities by friends of every rank and every character.

Miss Caroline Martineau's last illness, though tedious and distressing, was not acutely painful. She made no secret of her deep relief and thankfulness for this comparative immunity from pain; for she gave herself no credit for a heroic temperament, though all her friends knew that she had that strength which is made perfect in weakness.

Two stories we should like to tell in conclusion. As has been hinted, Miss Martineau's strength had latterly been given so completely to her public work that she had little energy left for study of any kind. She never lost touch with scientific thought, but the philanthropic work which had enabled her so marvellously to transcend the apparent limitations of her character in so many directions threatened to impose limitations in others; and the thought of the sacrifices she was making sometimes exercised the minds of her friends. One of them, who was of an Aristotelian turn of mind and thought that "virtue lies in the mean," was trying once to expound to her the doctrine that though most people are not self-sacrificing enough, some few are too self-sacrificing. He spoke in general terms, though he may have intended to convince Miss Martineau that she was herself in a "parlous state." If so, he failed; for she answered in a quite detached and quiet way, but with that air of finality which often made her friends abstain from pursuing a topic to which she was not responsive, "No! I don't see how anyone can be too unselfish." It was a characteristic remark; and what follows is a characteristic experience. A young woman living in the waste of London was deeply concerned for the future of a friend. The way to what promised to be a happy and innocent future seemed blocked for want of a helping hand. The way to misery and shame was open, and the one human being who should have barred it was urging the sorely tried girl to take it. Her friend was in an omnibus and casually heard two of her fellow-passengers, perfect strangers to her, talking of a certain Miss Martineau and her goodness. This was a ray of hope. There was a lady in the world who was good, and who helped people in trouble. The young woman sought her out and found her; got from her the sympathy, the advice, and the help that was needed. She saved her friend from her temptation and set her on the right path; and Miss Martineau lived to receive proofs of the good faith and the gratitude of all concerned.

As a fitting conclusion to this memorial notice we are glad to be allowed to add the following concluding passages from the last paper written by Miss Martineau on "Shapes and Sounds: An Account of Compound Pendulum Drawings and Musical Intervals":—

"Beauty and simplicity of sound, corresponding with beauty and simplicity of form, and both caused by simplicity of numerical relation! It is a connection of ideas which takes a strange hold on one. When first I made the acquaintance of the compound pendulum apparatus, I felt a sort of breathless excitement, and I have often watched it till my eyes were moist, I should have been puzzled to explain why. But I am not the only one who has found the production of these curves a strangely touching sight. One friend, quietly watching the pen at work, said 'I feel as if there were something religious in this.' Another said 'This instrument alone would go far to make one believe Atheists mistaken.' It is not easy at first sight to tell what it is that excites thought of this sort in very different people. I believe it is no mere coincidence but a half-conscious perception of the fact that Law and Order, when they have free play, result in Beauty. To most minds few things seem more dry than the relations of numbers to one another. Yet here we see that motions which are accurately governed by these relations produce beauty of form and the still more impalpable beauty of harmonious sound. In these diversities of operations we dimly perceive the same spirit. We have on the one hand simple beauty of form, which appeals to the eye, simple harmony of sound which is perceived by the ear, and the simple relations between numbers which the thinking brain can grasp and understand. On the other hand we have confused curves, discordant sounds, and arithmetical relations too complicated for the mind to follow.

"Does not this hint at another fact, that beauty is not a mere conventional idea invented by man? Of course I do not mean to deny that our ideas of beauty are apt to be led astray by fashion and other causes, so that we often for a time think of something as beautiful which we do not care for permanently. But surely the facts we have been considering seem to show that there is a true and lasting idea of beauty outside of us, besides the ideal within our own minds, which may go astray for a time but comes back in the long run to recognise the truly beautiful. It seems to me that what makes us take a delight in these curves is some dim, unrecognised perception, which is, perhaps, more emotional than intellectual. Here we have Order making for Beauty and Harmony in the physical world. Is not that a step towards perceiving that truth and duty tend to harmony in our own lives? We are very well aware of disorder and want of harmony and ugliness in our own lives and the lives we see around us. Do not these curves say to us, 'Go on struggling for the triumph of Law and Order till they reign over human life as they reign in the physical world. See what beauty and harmony they bring with them!'"

It was on Feb. 20 that release came to Miss Martineau after her long illness. On Sunday morning a Memorial Service was conducted at Clifton-place by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, prior to cremation at Woking on the following day, when the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter officiated. At Little Portland-street Chapel a Memorial Service was conducted on Sunday morning by the Rev. H. S. Perris, when Miss Cons and a number of men and women from the Morley Memorial College were among the congregation.

MR. P. W. CLAYDEN.

The funeral of Mr. P. W. Clayden took place on Monday, the service being held at the Free Christian Church, Kentish Town, where he had been minister from 1869 to 1883 The service, which was partly choral and included a rendering of "Oh, rest in the Lord," was conducted by the Revs. Edgar Daplyn and W. G. Tarrant, the latter of whom gave a brief address, which recalled the cheering, manly voice so often heard in that church, in comfort and inspiration, declaring his firm faith in God and the eternal life, and proceeded to speak of the characteristics of his life and work, so rich in activity, and fruitful in the fields of religion, journalism, literature, politics, and social reform. Yet best of all was the gift of the man himself. "It was the genuine gold of a true heart, a sincere as well as a gifted mind, that our friend cast into this treasury." The interment subsequently took place at Highgate Cemetery.

The service was very largely attended by representatives of public bodies and institutions with which Mr. Clayden had been connected, as well as by relatives and personal friends. Among those present were the Mayor, Aldermen, and several of the Councillors of the Borough of St. Pancras, wearing their robes of office; Sir John R. Robinson, the Rev. Dr. Clifford, Mr. and Mrs. E. T. Cook, Mr. David Edwards, Mr. W. Moy Thomas, Mr. Herbert Paul, and Mr. Alexander Paul. Owing to unavoidable circumstances, Mr. Richard Whiteing and several old colleagues on the Daily News were prevented from attending. Mr. Clayden's old congregation of the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, was represented by the Rev. James Harwood, also a former minister, and a wreath was sent by old members of the congregation. There were also wreaths from the Mayor and Corporation of St. Pancras, the Institute of Journalists, the Institute Orphan Fund, the new Reform Club, the Executive of the National Liberal Federation, the Committee of the Women's Local Government Society, and old colleagues of the Daily News. Dr. Williams' Trustees were represented by the Rev. F. H. Jones, the B. and F. U. A. by the Secretary.

In our memorial notice last week two errors in dates crept in. Mr. Clayden's ministry at Kentish Town began in 1869, as above stated, and not in 1871, as we said last week. The date of his second marriage was not 1887, but 1877.

IN ECCLES PARISH CHURCH.

The Lenten address given last Sunday after evening service, in the course arranged by Canon Cremer on "The Church of England and her daughters: the special contribution of each section of the Christian Church to the common life of the whole," was given by Professor Slater, of Didsbury College, on "The Wesleyan Movement." To the Manchester Guardian we are indebted for the following abstract of the address:—

"Professor Slater pointed out that the development of British Christianity which received the name of Methodism began at Oxford 160 years ago within a circle of loyal though rigid Churchmen. Wesley and his friends were at first called some hard names — Sacramentalists, Bible moths, and bigots—but the designation which undergraduate wit found for them —'Methodists'—had attached to their followers up to this day. Under this general term were now gathered a heterogeneous multitude of professing Christians, some with Episcopal, some with Congregational, and some with Presbyterian government. Most of them had adopted the Arminian teaching of Wesley and Fletcher, but a few still maintained the Calvinism of Whitfield. Professor Slater described the events which led the followers of Wesley after his death to place themselves outside the Anglican communion, and also briefly referred to the various bodies who have separated themselves from the Wesleyan Methodists. It would be strange, he continued, if the Established Church had not been affected by the zealous example of the Nonconformist Christians during the past century. In the latter half of the century the Church had advanced considerably—in the multiplication of churches and schools, of ministers and workers, in the increased order and reverence and attractiveness of its public services, in the extension of home and foreign missions, and in the institution of innumerable organisations for the social and religious improvement of the people. Churchmen now preached the Gospel in streets and slums; they had missions and revivals; they employed district visitors and Sunday-school teachers. But early in the last century many of those, even within the Church, who used such instrumentalities were called Methodists. It was not pretended that the enormous awakening of religious efforts within the Church had been produced by the rivalry of Nonconformists. Still, none could doubt that the Church had benefited by the stimulus, the incitement to effort, furnished by the existence of these independent agencies. Another feature of the present condition of Church life was that a large proportion of Church work was now assigned to the laity; and this was one of the advantages which Methodism and similar bodies had furnished to the general society. It might interest Churchmen to be reminded that the Methodist churches had usually avoided the complications of political affairs or party controversy, and had steadily adhered to their religious work. One happy effect of this had been that the Methodists had always been loyal to the national interest. Wherever they had had influence, loyalty to the Throne and the Constitution had been impressed on the popular mind and heart. A yet more important matter, from the Christian standpoint, was the adherence of Methodists everywhere to the orthodox creed of the Catholic Church. Surely it was interesting to all who valued the historic faith of Christianity that this modern development of religious activity had been used successfully in maintaining theological conformity with the standard creeds of Christendom. Methodism was divided into many sects, each having the utmost freedom in ecclesiastical arrangement, yet all abiding without constraint or authority, by instinct as it were, by the fundamental and vital teaching of the apostolic faith. After dwelling upon the prominence which has been given by Methodism to the idea of personal religion, Professor Slater spoke of the desire of Methodists to support the National Church in its conservation of the treasures of the Reformation. 'We think,' he said, 'that we have a share in these inestimable possessions. It is no secret that there are some who disparage and depreciate this great inheritance of your Church. They are ready to say, "Let the Nonconformists have it. We do not care much about it." Well, we Methodists shall stand by it—we stand or fall by it.' Nonconformists, he added, did not desire that they should have a monopoly of Protestantism in the twentieth century. They hoped that the Church would use her wealth and learning, her educational power and social influence, in defence of religious freedom. The open Bible, liberty of conscience, emancipation from the tyranny of superstitions which had sapped the faith of Continental nations in the realities of Christianity—these were matters about which they had a strong desire that the National Church should take the first place in the days that were coming."

The address to-morrow (Sunday) evening was to have been given by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, on "The Unitarian Movement," but the Vicar announced last Sunday that Mr. Gordon had asked to be relieved of the duty, and had expressed a desire that he should himself give the address. Finding that this coincided with the wish of his Bishop, Canon Cremer decided to follow this course.

The Times stated that this change was owing to strong criticism in various quarters of the inclusion of a Unitarian in the course, which led Mr. Gordon to make his request, "lest the Vicar's action in inviting him should be misconstrued by those whose position he is bound to respect." Our own conviction is that neither Canon Cremer nor Mr. Gordon would be turned by any popular clamour from the course on which they had agreed, but that possibly deference to the Bishop led to the change.

Many friends will have heard with heartfelt sympathy of the death of Mr. Gordon's wife, daughter of the late Swinton Boult, of Liverpool, which took place at Cheadle last Sunday.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Habits and Ideals.

SOME poor old horses that had served in a troop of cavalry during a long campaign on the Continent, were, at last, turned into a meadow to rest for the remainder of their lives. They had earned their holiday well. They were tired out with long service, and it is easy to guess how welcome their new surroundings were to them. One day they were grazing contentedly when a sudden storm arose. Thunder pealed and lightning flashed. What do you think happened? The good old horses fell at once into the habits to which they had been trained for battle. They gathered together, and formed into order almost as perfect as if their old masters were on their backs.

Here is another true story of a similar kind. After a terrible battle near ———, when the bodies of officers and men still lay unburied on the field, twilight closed in, and the usual evening call was sounded by the 1st Regiment of Dragoons of the Guard. To the astonishment of the beholders, 602 riderless horses, whose masters lay dead, answered the summons, some of them cruelly maimed, bleeding from the sword and gun wounds they had received; but true to the discipline and habits in which they had been trained.

What a lesson these horses teach us! Are we human beings as faithful to the good habits we have learned? And let us remember this: animals have to be trained; but we, even boys and girls, can do so much in training ourselves in good habits. Do you bear in mind how quickly habits, both good and bad, grow upon us and make our characters worthy or unworthy?

You have no doubt sometimes noticed the cart-ruts in country roads. Each time wheels pass down into those ruts the ruts are deepened, and the passage of the next wheels that come along the road is made easier in those tracks. So with our habits: repetition, whether of good or bad deeds, good or bad thoughts, makes it easier for us to think and act in similar ways.

I have read a story of a traveller who lay down to rest in a strange country inhabited by pigmies. As he lay there sleeping—a strong man—the tiny people came round him silently and spread little threads across him, fastening them to the ground. Tiny people and tiny threads! But the threads were so numerous and had been passed across him so often that even he, with all his strength, could not break them; and there he lay a helpless prisoner. So the little bad habits, often repeated, take possession of us and make us prisoners at last, and in their power. Think how easy it is to "get into the way" of saying cross words, of being idle, and of not being quite true; and, on the contrary, think how, as in the cases of the good horses we have been reading about, habits of faithfulness to duty can be formed in us, which, in time, it becomes far easier to keep than to break. It is by forming good habits and keeping firmly to them that we can make our every-day lives more like what they ought to be. We learn to be faithful in little things, and so ready for greater service when the call comes.

So much about habits. Now for something further. Pilgrims, who went to worship in old times in Jerusalem, used to see from afar, as they travelled towards the Holy City, the temple, which was the goal of their prilgrimage, shining white and golden in the sunshine on the hill, and they fixed their longing eyes upon it till they entered into its gates. So we who are pilgrims through life, whether children or grown-up travellers, need to keep some great aim in view, some ideal to live for, some noble character to grow like. There are many kinds of ideals, perhaps we none of us have quite the same; but if they lead us on and help us to strive towards what is right, they are all of them good. Do you know this simple little rhyme?—

If I were a cobbler I'd make it my pride
The best of all cobblers to be;
If I were a tinker, no tinker beside Should mend an old kettle like me.

Here is a true story about the wife of one who was afterwards a famous President of the United States. While she was still quite poor she wrote to her absent husband thus:—"This is the way I've been able to climb up higher. It came to me one morning when I was making bread. I said to myself 'Here I am compelled to make our bread this summer. Why not consider it a pleasant occupation, and make it so by trying to see what perfect bread I can make?' It seemed like an inspiration, and the whole of life grew higher. The very sunshine seemed flowing down through my spirit into the white loaves; and now I believe my table is furnished with better bread than ever before." See what a help it is to each of us to keep before us the aim of doing the work God sends to us to do, whatever it may be, as well as we possibly can. If we have pans to mend, to mend them well; if we have lessons to learn, to learn them thoroughly; if we have work in the house to do, to do it with all our hearts, to "sweep under the mats" and have a pride in keeping everything clean and bright. If we are true to such an ideal as this we shall not form bad habits, but good ones will take possession of us and grow quite natural to us in time.

Then there is one aim which is the same for all of us, and this is the end of this column. That aim is to grow more Christlike, more loving, more brave, and true and helpful; to try, in all we say and do and think, to carry His spirit into our daily lives. FRANCES E. COOKE.

LONDON, MARCH 1, 1902.

THE MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

Such is the title adopted for the new Fund at the first meeting of Donors and Subscribers to the "Ministers' Superannuation Fund" held at Essex Hall on Wednesday afternoon, to adopt a constitution and elect managers. Of the thousand and more donors and subscribers to the Fund not quite fifty attended this first meeting, but north and south, east and west, were represented, though it was, perhaps, inevitable that residents in London should be in a large majority. Yet though the meeting was small, it will be seen to have been thoroughly representative of the wide-spread generosity and devoted ability by which the movement for the establishment of such a Fund has been carried to a successful issue, while ministers, for whose benefit, in the first instance, the Fund is founded, were also represented. The small attendance may, perhaps, be taken as a mark of the absolute confidence reposed by the donors in that Committee of the National Conference, under the leadership of its President, the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, by whom this great work has been so far accomplished.

Those who were present at the meeting, however, showed themselves by no means ready simply to adopt the constitution drafted by the Committee, and one change, in particular, of the greatest significance was made in adopting its principal clauses. The President, who on the motion of Mr. Clephan was called to the chair, stated that after the issue of their draft, with the notice of that meeting, the Committee had received strong expressions of opinion of very divers character. It had been urged upon them that as the effort to establish that Fund had its origin in a vote of the National Conference at Leicester, and that it was a special Committee of the Conference which had appealed to the churches and had secured the establishment of the Fund, it ought to be not the donors, but the National Conference itself, as representing the churches, to which the draft constitution should be submitted, and by which the momentous step of its adoption should be taken.

While not accepting that view, but recognising that the original donors and subscribers to the Fund must have the determining voice in framing a constitution, the Committee yet strongly felt that the members of the National Conference, as representing the churches for whose benefit the Fund was established, ought to have a share in the management, and provision was therefore made in the rules, as drafted, that "all members of the National Conference, so long as it exists," should be among those entitled to vote at a general meeting. An opposite view was taken by a considerable number of those present at the meeting, whose desire, apparently, it was that the Conference should not be recognised as in any way directly concerned with the Fund. Ultimately, what may be regarded as a compromise was adopted, and it was decided that only those members of the Conference should have a vote who represented churches subscribing at least £1 annually to the Fund.

The meeting on Wednesday was unable to complete its consideration of the whole constitution and by-laws, and was obliged to adjourn; but the first seven clauses of the constitution were thoroughly discussed and, with amendments, adopted. Clause 7, which determines membership, including the points above alluded to, is as follows :—

> The following persons shall be entitled to vote at a general meeting :—
> (a) All donors of £5 or upwards to the Fund.
> (b) All annual subscribers of not less than 10s. to the Fund who became subscribers not less than six months before the date of the meeting.
> (c) The Managers, Trustees, and (if unpaid) Auditors for the time being of the Fund.
> (d) All members of the National Conference, so long as it exists, representing churches that subscribe to the Fund not less than £1 annually.
> (e) All persons receiving assistance from the Fund.

The other most important clause is the second. The first simply announces the name of the Fund as the "Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund," which was unanimously adopted, the President explaining that the term "Superannuation" had been abandoned, as it was found liable to misunderstanding, having been supposed in some quarters to imply the compulsory retirement of ministers at a given age, for which the Committee had no thought of making themselves responsible.

The second clause, defining who shall be eligible for the benefits of the Fund, was adopted in the following form :—

> The object of the Fund shall be to assist the ministers hereinafter mentioned to make provision for their old age and for their families after their death. The following ministers shall be entitled to make application for such assistance :—
> (a) Any minister for the time being of any church, society, or mission, on the roll of the National Conference (or should the National Conference cease to have a roll, of any Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, or other non-subscribing or kindred congregation in the British Isles), that regularly assembles for the public worship of God.
> (b) The minister-at-large, missionary, or ministerial secretary or agent, of any Association, Mission, Society, or Assembly mentioned in the rules of the National Conference adopted at Leicester in April, 1900.
> (c) Any Professor of the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, Manchester College, Oxford, or the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, who has at any time been minister of one of the congregations mentioned in (a), and who still occasionally preaches.
> (d) Any minister who has been the minister of any of the congregations mentioned in (a), and who is now the minister of any similar congregation in any colony or dependency of the United Kingdom.
> Provided that no person shall be entitled to apply to the Managers for such assistance until he has been such minister or held such a post or professorship for at least one year. The manner in which and the conditions on which such assistance shall be rendered shall be defined from time to time by the by-laws.

The other clauses adopted provide for a Board of Twelve Managers, to be periodically elected, the whole of the first Board to hold office until the general meeting to be held during the Triennial Conference in or next after the year 1906, when they shall all retire, but be re-eligible. After that date it is provided that four of the managers shall retire at the end of each triennial period, when the general meetings are to be held, all retiring managers to be eligible for re-election.

The rest of the constitution, with the necessary by-laws, remains to be considered at the adjourned meeting, which is to be held at Essex Hall on Wednesday afternoon, March 19, when the first Board of Managers and the officers are also to be elected; but so far as the essential points of the constitution are concerned, it will be seen that they are now settled, and that the Fund is definitely established. We have not attempted any report of the discussion on crucial points, the course of which will be sufficiently clear to those of our readers who are interested in the matter, by the result above recorded.

At the opening of the meeting, Mr. Cogan Conway, who has acted as secretary to the Special Committee, made a statement as to the progress of the movement, the possibility and desirability of which he had first mooted in a letter to The Inquirer towards the close of 1887, and to which his paper at the Leicester Conference had given definite form. Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, as Treasurer, announced that £21,800 had been promised to the Fund by nearly a thousand donors, of which £15,000 had been already received, while about a hundred annual subscribers promised an income of £317 16s. Of the total donations, ministers themselves had contributed practically £300. The President, in his opening address, pointed out that ministers and ex-ministers had really contributed three times that amount, the other donations not appearing in the separate list. He dwelt on the very wide-spread response which had been made to their appeal, and said that he attached special value to the congregational donations, and trusted that many churches would become regular subscribers to the Fund. The subsequent vote of the meeting as to membership will furnish a strong motive for such congregational subscriptions.

In urging the recognition of the Conference in the management of the Fund, Mr. Carpenter pointed out that the original donors must be a steadily diminishing body, and the time might come when annual subscriptions would be no longer needed, so that it was essential to have some recognised body in whose hands the responsibility of management would be secure. The National Conference, representative of the churches for whose benefit the Fund was established, was in his view clearly the body to hold that position of ultimate authority. How the meeting dealt with that contention, we have already recorded.

Clause 7 having been adopted in the form stated above, and presumably, therefore, being already operative, the question is suggested, whether it will govern the adjourned meeting on March 19. Who will have the right to vote at that meeting—all who were originally summoned to the first meeting, including donors of humble guineas, or only those defined by the new rule?

There were present at the meeting on Wednesday:—The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, in the chair; Mr. T. Cogan Conway, secretary of the Superannuation Committee; Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, acting treasurer; Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, Miss Preston, Miss Tagart, Miss Busk, Mrs. Bartram, the Misses E. J. and L. K. Garrett, Messrs. W. Colfox, F. Nettlefold, W. Blake Odgers, K.C., David Martineau, Edwin Clephan, J. T. Preston, John Harrison, F. Monks, Russell Scott, G. Carslake Thompson, Ion Pritchard, T. Grosvenor Lee, Alfred Clarke, H. Bakewell, C. THE IDEAL OF LIBERAL RELIGION.*

BY THE REV. DR. G. DAWES HICKS.

I propose to say a few words upon the ideal of liberal religion in general, and the object that should animate the individual in striving to live the undogmatic religious life. And I think I can best bring out the features of that ideal by speaking first of the conditions in the midst of which it has now to be realised, and of the forces against which it has now to contend.

It is reported of the late Henry Sidgwick, of Cambridge, that at the close of his long term of faithful service he felt himself under the shadow of a dark and dismal cloud. Throughout his brave and beautiful life he had been labouring for educational and social changes that seemed to him of great and vital moment for the good of mankind, and of some he had witnessed the success and the realisation of his hopes. But, as the end drew near, the sky was overcast and the outlook was cheerless and dreary. All the special objects he had cherished were suddenly checked in their advance, a period of reaction had intervened after an era of beneficent reform, and he could not be indifferent to this retrogression, especially in the University he loved so well. Consequently, he recognised the inevitable, and quietly withdrew from the arena of conflict, not in any spirit of pique or resentment, but under the impression that his own work was done, and that the future belonged to a newer generation, inspired by ideals different from his. Surveying, too, the wider questions of the time, he observed a corresponding process of degeneration. In earlier years he had thrown himself with enthusiasm into that effort after religious liberty which had ennobled the latter half of the nineteenth century—"absorbed," as he puts it, "in struggling for freedom of thought in the trammels of an historical religion." And in some degree he had lived to see the triumph of the cause to which he had devoted such splendid gifts. But now a new age had dawned, and its characteristics were not those which he had desired or expected. "Freedom is won," he declares, "and what does Freedom bring us to? It brings us face to face with atheistic science; the faith in God and Immortality, which we have been struggling to clear from superstition, suddenly seems to be in the air; and, in seeking for a firm basis for the fight, we find ourselves in the midst of 'the fight with death.'" Not of him, then, could it be written, as it was once written of the poet Sophocles, οὐδὲν ὑπομείνας κακόν, that he lingered here to witness no evil going on, as he put out to sea.

Am I not right in saying that there are hundreds and thousands of men and women, less richly endowed than he, who could tell, in these days, of a similar experience? After a period of high achievement and of far-reaching hopes, we, who have been humble workers in the cause of rational religion, are engulfed in a stream of tendencies, such as we had never anticipated, which appear to make directly against every aim upon which we had set our hearts. Look round upon the world at the present time, and even the most optimistic of us would be compelled to admit that the Zeitgeist, the Spirit of the Age, is exactly contradictory of that which, a generation or two ago, many a sincere and ardent believer in the power of moral and spiritual principles to win their widening way would have predicted. We are suffering from the recoil of a multitude of disappointments. In the larger sphere, where our activities have been linked to those of our fellowmen who are not members of our household of faith, it is manifestly so. Education has disappointed us, industrialism has disappointed us, political liberty has disappointed us, social reform has disappointed us; and we have witnessed the passing away of a century of immense promise, feeling ourselves in stagnant waters, with aspirations languid and expectation well-nigh dead. Our literature has become ephemeral, or worse; our poetry is tuned to no ideal note; our art is lifeless; our religion, in too many cases, is evaporating into unreality. The world is almost destitute of great names, and men who once marched to the service of large, unselfish ideals, have left behind them sons who care not for these things, and leave them often to be trampled in the dust. Think, for example, of the sacrifices that were made, some forty years ago, to open out the means of culture to the children of the humblest homes! An entire generation has now grown up with advantages and opportunities no other has ever enjoyed. But can the most sanguine of us pretend that the thirst for knowledge, the pure love of truth for its own sake, the desire for the best that has been thought and said in the world, has been thereby increased? Pleasure, the elaboration of pleasure, amusement, the demand for amusement—these are everywhere, these have multiplied tenfold, and, somehow, even the hardest worked of manual toilers can find time enough for them. But plain living and high thinking—the means we were looking forward to and trusting in thirty years ago to transform and to elevate the rank and file of our nation—where are they? What we find, alas! instead, is the depraved taste that satisfies itself with the smart paragraphs of the newspaper, that sneers at every serious treatment of any serious theme as heavy and dull and uninteresting, and feeds on the morbid fiction that dignifies itself with the misused name of realism. And within the comparatively tiny circle of the religious communion, where we are engaged, like phenomena are, I think, noticeable. Consider the strenuous attempts our fathers made to purify religion from the taint of superstition and to bring it into harmony with the light of reason. Do their children, who have had opportunities absolutely denied to them of gathering the fruits of science and philosophy and of dedicating them to the service of God—do their children feel, or care to feel, that the universe of Herschel is a sublimer temple in which to worship than the cosmos of Genesis, or that creation according to Darwin is a grander expression of infinite wisdom than creation according to Hebrew cosmogony? Why, the majority of our younger people, intelligent, trained, educated, in a sense, though they be, are wholly indifferent to these things, and expend no thought and no reflection upon them. There is a fatal sterility in our Israel; an incredible blight of spiritual apathy has fallen over it, and real moral devotion to truth—without which spiritual progress is never made—is becoming a rare and disregarded virtue.

And, meanwhile, see what is happening outside our little borders, and in the face of which we have got, in some way or another, to hold our own if we can. On every side of us there are forces arrayed, which have, indeed, little else in common, but are, at least, united in their thoroughgoing opposition to the cardinal principle of liberal thought. At heart they are sceptical to the very core, and utterly distrust the power of reason to find its way to eternal verities. On the one hand are the great orthodox communities, persistent in their insistence that the faculties of the human mind are by their very structure disqualified to reach the divine reality, that those faculties lie under a fatal disability with regard to heavenly things, and that only the acceptance of a miraculous attestation can save us from the mire of dreary Negation. And thus you have the curious spectacle of the most ardent defenders of philosophic doubt becoming the most credulous of religious believers, and glorying in the fact that supernatural revelation can unveil precisely what natural intelligence hides. So far as the normal human intellect is concerned they acknowledge themselves to be but as inmates of an asylum for the blind, but they hang their chandeliers upon its ceilings, and are confident that, though the daylight be useless, the brilliancy at night will be sure to tell. On the other hand are those who, accepting this plea of the impotence of the human mind to get beyond the realm of the material and the limited, persist that the ancient secret is a secret still, that man knows nothing of the Infinite and can know nothing, and that, knowing nothing, he had better not be dogmatic about his ignorance. "Trust your reason, we have been told till we are tired of the phrase, and you will become Atheists or Agnostics," they exclaim. "Very good," is their reply; "we take you at your word, and Agnostics we become." "Surely," writes one of the ablest of our younger thinkers, "surely it is wiser to give up the search for a God, whose existence you admit is and must remain undemonstrable, and to divert the feelings which religious people wish to spend on Him towards those of our own kind, whose help and sympathy are much more certainly real. We might with advantage worship the real creature a little more, and his hypothetical Creator a good deal less."

Such, then, are the characteristics of the modern world, in the midst of which our ideal of liberal religion is either to be realised or to go under. Such are the agencies, strong, potent, influential, which are banded against it, and which are concentrating their fire upon our little citadel. And we—what are we doing to make good our position, and to maintain our footing in the realm of thought? Alas! the situation is, for the most part, pitiable in the extreme. Of what avail are our small wranglings over Trinity and Unity, over the metaphysical nature of Christ, over creeds and ritual and church government, confronted, as we are, with tendencies such as these? They are, as the greatest prophetic voice in our midst has warned us, "such stuff as dreams are made of," and we must "come out of them," if we are to be preserved from extinction. Why, the familiar notion of the Unity of the Godhead is, much more hopelessly at variance with the best scientific reflection than the conception of the Trinity, and the absolute separation of the Divine and human natures sets the profoundest philosophical speculation at open defiance. But, could we only rise to the height of our mission and calling, there lies before us a field of service indescribably great and noble. Ours it should be to proclaim, with no uncertain sound, that reason and conscience and imagination, in their pure and undefiled exercise, are as holy and sacred to us as church or priest or Bible have been to those who have rested their faith on their infallibility alone. Ours it should be to make manifest that the free unfettered intelligence of ordinary men is no godless instrument, that thought cannot truly think without arriving, along all its paths, at the divine foundation and rational source of all. Ours it should be to emphasise the truth that God is not unknowable, that He is not unthinkable, that He is not inconceivable, but that He is immanent in all matter and pervading all mind. Ours it should be to make clear that it is a mock humility to regard Him as beyond the apprehension of human consciousness, and to picture Him as too exalted to become incarnate in human flesh. For it is of the very essence of intelligence that to intelligence it can make itself known, that thought with thought can commune, and an unknowable God would imply incapacity on His part no less than blindness on ours, and render Him inferior to and not elevate Him above the friends with whom we can share ideas. Our ideal should lead us back to the original principles of Christianity and enable us to insist once more on the fundamental truth it won for the world. Let not us be guilty of making the spiritual world into a spectre, or of supposing that we can conjure up some mysterious consciousness of it, or men will soon cease to believe in our account of its existence. It is around us here on every side—here, in the ordinary, familiar, common ways of life, are we in the actual presence of that infinite life which enfolds and encircles these finite lives of ours. Oh, how poor seems our narrow, sectarian dogmatism in the presence of a conception such as this! The visible universe is the embodiment of God's thought; its growth and development tell the story of His purpose. Man in his onward progress is led by the hand Divine; in his thirst for knowledge, in his obedience to truth, in his aspiration after goodness, the Eternal Word is for ever becoming flesh.

A fire mist and a planet,
A crystal and a cell;
A jellyfish and a saurian,
And caves where the cavemen dwell;
Then a sense of law and beauty,
And a face turned from the clod,—
Some call it Evolution
And others call it God.

Like the tide on a crescent sea-beach,
When the moon is new and thin,
Into our hearts high yearnings
Come welling and surging in—
Come from the mystic ocean
Whose rim no foot has trod,—
Some of us call it Longing,
And others call it God.

A picket frozen on duty,
A mother starved for her brood,
Socrates drinking the hemlock,
And Jesus on the rood;
The million who, humble and nameless,
The straight, hard pathway trod,—
Some call it Consecration,
And others call it God.

THE CONFERENCES AND THE CHURCHES.

SIR,—My old friend Mr. Wooding, with whom I remember some pleasant arguments in London formerly, will, I hope, pardon me if I reply to his letter in last week's INQUIRER. What does he mean by suggesting that the later National Conferences themselves have been less "catholic" and less "national" than the former ones? I may be prejudiced as having had something to do with the Leicester Conference, but I am certainly astonished to learn that the Leicester or Sheffield Conferences were less catholic than the earlier meetings. "They have long ceased to be this," i.e. catholic, says Mr. Wooding. When did this disastrous change begin and in what does it consist? Mr. Wooding refers to an anonymous contributor as an "aide-de-camp" of your own, Mr. Editor. On what grounds does he do this? I suppose the columns of the INQUIRER are open to all sides. So far these columns have certainly presented as many arguments against Conference developments as for them, and I cannot see any truth in the implication that you are unduly favouring one side at the expense of the other.

When I ask myself what can be the reason of this undertone of irritation and suspicion, both in the letter from Stoke Newington and in Mr. Wooding's reply, I see, of course, that there must be very strong objections and fears in their minds with regard to the proposals of the Conference Committee. Considering their arguments, those objections may be classed under two heads:—(1) The Conference Committee is a representative committee chosen by delegates and ministers from all our churches, and therefore it is certain to be a despotic committee; (2) The Conference Committee is trying to do the work of the B. and F.U.A., and to drive that association out of the field.

The first proposition is an amazing one in churches which have always stood for liberty and popular government.

It implies that the only way to avoid a despotism is to allow your affairs to be managed by a non-representative body. It implies that directly you give any power to a representative body, they are bound to abuse it. A more astounding reversal of all liberal principles it would be difficult to imagine.

The argument appears to be, the B. and F.U.A. does not represent our churches, and therefore it may safely be allowed to look after their interests. The Conference Committee does represent our churches, and therefore it is at your peril that you allow them any power at all.

Now I gladly admit that the B. and F.U.A. Committee do not abuse their power; it is composed of men and women trained in the best traditions of our churches, men and women of high character and large tolerance, and, of course, they don't abuse their power. We have confidence in them and are grateful to them for all their work.

But they might abuse their power. They might give grants only to churches and ministers whose particular shade of Unitarianism happened to be acceptable to them. If they did, those churches could do nothing to prevent it, our churches at large could do nothing except decline to subscribe. It is absurd to maintain that because the B. and F.U.A. is not a representative body therefore it cannot possibly abuse its power.

But it is still more absurd to maintain that the Conference Committee, chosen by delegates and ministers from all our churches, would certainly abuse its power. Its members will be chosen by the churches and the district associations, and will be absolutely dependent upon their will. If the Committee attempted to do things of which the churches did not approve, it could be turned out. The Conference Committee would be under the absolute control of the churches. What possible reason is there then for suggesting, even in the abstract, that such a Committee is going to infringe the rights and liberties of the churches? Theoretically speaking the unrepresentative B. and F.U.A. is far more able to interfere with the liberty of our churches than the representative Conference Committee.

Practically speaking, there is no fear about either of them. Both Committees have been and will be composed of trusted leaders and earnest workers in our churches. Such men, whether on the B. and F.U.A. or on the Conference, are not going to set up a despotism and break with all the traditions of our past. The B. and F.U.A. would rightly repudiate with indignation such a charge if it were made, and the Conference Committee has at least a right to an equal indignation against so unworthy a suspicion.

The second objection of those who oppose any action on the part of the Conference Committee is that it is trying to do the work of the B. and F.U.A., and to drive that association out of the field. If this means that the objectors imagine that those who wish the Conference Committee to do some work are plotting in an underhand way against the legitimate work of the B. and F.U.A., it can only be met by an absolute denial and by the claim to be believed as gentlemen speaking to gentlemen. In denying the suggestion I can, of course, only speak for myself, but I cannot imagine that any supporter of Conference action on the Committee would give a different answer. The only thing which might lead to conflict would be successful action on the part of the supporters of the B. and F.U.A., in its supposed interests, to prevent all work on the Conference Committee. Then, indeed, there might be conflict, but it would not be underhand.

The real meaning of the objection, however, probably is simply a belief that there is not enough work for two bodies, that the B. and F.U.A. is doing admirable work and that there is no more to be done. That is, I believe, the really strong objection which prevails in the minds of many of our respected laymen. They don't want a multiplication of agencies and they are quite satisfied with the B. and F.U.A.

This objection is based on the tremendous assumption that our churches are in a perfectly satisfactory condition, and that there is nothing more to be done. For my part, I think that there is not only room but need of another body, and a representative one, working amongst our churches to-day. There is more than enough to do without touching any of the good work of the B. and F.U.A. We need to feel that we belong to a church, not to a set of churches, we want a corporate interest and a sense of corporate responsibility, and to this work an active Conference Committee would address itself. We want much more done in connection with finding and encouraging the right men to enter our ministry on the lines suggested by Mr. A. H. Worthington at the Leicester Conference. We want more done in connection with arranging curacies for them when they leave college. I should like to see Mr. Jacks' most important scheme of a further preparation for our young ministers leaving college discussed by the Conference Committee. I should like to see a detailed proposal considered and drawn up by them, and, if approved, laid before the next Triennial Conference. Upon the training and character of our ministers depends more than on all else the future of our churches. It is not only the right but the duty of the representatives of our churches on the Conference Committee to consider such questions, and to do what they can to promote the efficiency and cohesion of our churches.

My letter is already far too long, and I must not dwell on other work which the Conference might do. It is sufficient to feel that there is endless work to be done, and that there is room and to spare for all our organisations; not least, surely, for that organisation which is the one body which truly represents all our churches in all parts of the United Kingdom.

HENRY GOW.

GUILDS.

SIR,—In your last week's issue my friend the Rev. J. J. Wright takes exception to two sentences appearing in a condensed report of an address of mine on "The Religious Interests of Young People." They are:—(1) "With regard to Guilds Mr. Anderton expressed himself unfavourably." (2) "He especially disliked the type which encouraged young people to compare their religious experiences and conduct separate services of their own."

Now I am open to confess without any reservation that Mr. Wright's suspicions regarding my practical experience of Guilds are fully warranted. I am, to use a political phrase of Mr. Balfour's, "a child in these things"! But I am surprised that Mr. Wright should have set me up as the arch-enemy of Guilds on the strength of the sentence quoted above. May I remind him that a "condensed report" is not absolutely reliable for accuracy of impression or expression. I am really not so hopeless as might be imagined. In fact, perhaps I am as favourably disposed towards the "Guild Idea" in the abstract as Mr. Wright himself.

My address was given to a new association of Churches and Sunday-schools, and was intended to arouse discussion. I spoke about Guilds to elicit information as well as opinion. Imagining that my audience would be favourable to Guilds I laid myself out to excite criticism, and said things which I thought would be likely to meet with opposition. Even so, I was careful to preface my remarks with the recognition that the question of Guilds was a large one, and that they were so various in nature that it would be dangerous to criticise them without qualification. I did not set up for an authority on the subject by any means, but stated that I myself knew practically nothing about Guilds from experience. I said, further, that the matter was largely one of local traditions. That I knew that in many places Guilds were a great success, and so on. Now I am quite sure there is nothing in all this that I was not justified in saying—seeing that I made no pretence to practical knowledge. I think Mr. Wright should feel indebted to me for having introduced the subject. I regret that it was not taken up at the meeting. The only speaker who referred to that part of my address, as far as I remember, did so to express agreement with what I had said about young people "comparing their religious experiences."

And here I come to what appears to be a real difference between Mr. Wright and myself. I definitely expressed a dislike for the type of Guild which encouraged young people to compare their religious experiences and conduct separate services of their own. No doubt Mr. Wright's position, as disclosed in his letter, represents very fairly the considerations to be adduced in favour of this type of Guild. There is, however, another side to the question.

Mr. Wright asks if I "object to adults comparing their religious experiences if they be so inclined" (the emphasis is mine). Most certainly I do not—if they be so inclined. Nothing but good will result from the act if it is spontaneous and natural. But it is a different matter, is it not, to organise the expression of religious experience? Deliberately to hold meetings for public self-examination in religious sentiment is not conducive to the best interests of religion. In this opinion I am supported by the accepted custom of our churches. How many congregations are there among us where it is the custom to hold experience meetings? If such meetings are good for young people they are good for their elders, on Mr. Wright's principle that there is no distinction to be made between the religious experiences of young people and of adults. I shall certainly not contend that young people have no religious experiences. It is, however, a begging of the question when Mr. Wright asserts that there can be no possibility of priggishness or cant in the public comparing of such experiences—because they are "religious." The cant and hypocrisy of the Pharisees was also "religious." I think that what young people need is not to be seeing continually what is going on inside them—in public. It is rather to have positive religious influences brought to bear on them. "Reverent self-expression" may very well be left to take care of itself. "In none of our Guilds," says Mr. Wright, "as in none of our congregations, does religious expression anything like reach up to the religious experience at which many have evidently arrived." Let us be deeply thankful that this is so. May it never be otherwise! Intellectually young people need help in their difficulties. Spiritually they need fellowship, as we all do. I should be the last to deny young people the right to speak together concerning their religious experiences—if they be so minded. But I should shrink from bringing young people together on the initiative of their elders to express themselves about their inner religious state. Mr. Wright acknowledges that he was once prejudiced against Guilds. Could it be, I wonder, when he was a young man, at the very time when he ought to have felt the need for religious self-expression? If so, I can sympathise with him. When I was of Guild age, I should have found it impossible to express myself about my inner experiences. I should have shunned and avoided any society where I was expected to tell my experiences to others publicly.

Mr. Wright suggests that the point of my objection to the holding of separate religious services by young people is the old priestly idea that they must have a "'go-between' or something will go wrong." Nothing was further from my thought. But if young people at their religious services need no "go-between"—in the form of a minister, still less, one would think, do congregations. Yet we do not find them dispensing with "go-betweens." Perhaps in the golden future such a consummation may be arrived at. It is not yet. Meanwhile, does Mr. Wright deny to young people the right of having a trained religious leader to conduct their services? Is there anything inherently bad in the practice? Or anything wrong in principle?

I dislike the idea of separate religious services for young people, however, not from any deep feeling of principle involved. If they are so minded let our young people have separate religious services by all means. But I differ from Mr. Wright where he seems to think that the "unadulterated sincerity" of young people in religious matters is "spoiled" by association with their elders. Young people and adults equally have religious experiences. Let them unite in worship then. Why should they not?

I object to the "religious type" of Guild only, as above indicated. With the idea of young people's societies to unify and co-ordinate the various activities of the young people of our congregations I am fully in sympathy.

LIVERPOOL DISTRICT MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

Sir,—Circumstances for which the Rev. R. S. Redfern has been in no way responsible having compelled the Liverpool District Missionary Association to adopt certain steps affecting the Free Christian Church at Crewe, and having also led to Mr. Redfern relinquishing his ministry there, the officers of the Association desire to make known their earnest regard and esteem for Mr. Redfern, and heartily to commend him to our churches as a minister of high character, while placing on record the excellent work done by him in connection with the Liverpool District Missionary Association.

THE EDUCATIONAL MENACE.

Sir,—Your correspondent who addresses you under this heading fails to explain in what way education is menaced. He appears to be more concerned with the religious and sectarian side of the question than with the purely educational. He assumes an educational reaction; and says that it aims indirectly at the repeal of the Cowper-Temple Clause by insinuating into the public mind a desire for administrative reform. This may or may not be true, but it is clear that the writer has mainly religious considerations in his mind, and that he fears that the public may ignore these, and be tempted by the bait of administrative reform.

That is not unlikely, because many feel that too much has been made of sectarian questions, and that any step that will have the effect of freeing education from the incubus of those whose main interest is religious and denominational, will be a distinct gain. The School Board System at the time it was established undoubtedly met a public want, and the Boards have given the country a school establishment, for which every one should be profoundly grateful; but it must be confessed that School Boards have been and still are the battle-ground of the sects; and that members have most frequently been selected from their connection with particular religious bodies rather than for their business ability and general knowledge of affairs.

At present we do not know what form the Government Education Bill will take; but it may be surmised that it will not extend the powers of School Boards to secondary education; it further seems probable that it may pave the way to an ultimate absorption of School Boards, by giving to County, City, and Town Councils some controlling voice in their affairs. If this should be done it is a serious matter, but it will be unwise to rush at once into hostility to such a measure without full and careful consideration.

There are many arguments in favour of such a step, and some of them will appeal strongly to those interested in municipal government, whatever may be their political views. Some of such arguments may be indicated. Decentralisation.—A clear gain. The wants of different districts vary, greatly depending on manufactures, commerce, and local considerations. What may be a wise expenditure in one district might be foolish and improvident in another. Sectarian bitterness.—This would be largely reduced if we could get rid of the present system of School Board elections. Economy.—There is little doubt about the costliness of the School Board system; much money has been improvidently spent. County, City, and Town Councils being in closer touch with the electors, and having the control of the purse of the district for all purposes, are likely to prove wiser stewards than isolated Boards feeling no general responsibility.

It is not to be denied that there are many arguments on the other side, and that the School Board system has strong supporters, but surely it is a mistake to suppose that the gradual abandonment of the School Board system necessarily involves a menace to education.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

SOUTH EASTERN COUNTIES.

A short time since I received a very interesting letter from a lady who signed herself "An Outsider but a Well-wisher," into whose hands one of the Provincial reports had accidentally fallen, and on which she makes a few comments. "I notice that you say 'sowing much and reaping little is the record of the past,' and, judging from the Unitarian congregations I have seen in four large Provincial towns, averaging, I should think, about twenty members in each case, it would seem that Unitarianism is hopelessly dead; but so far from that being the case, I believe its doctrines never had so many adherents as at the present time—indeed, it may be questioned whether those who hold Unitarian doctrines do not outnumber any other sect. Whence then the paradox of miserably small congregations? Why does the Unitarian service fail to reach the people? I believe the reason is to be found in the fact that Unitarian ministers do not take sufficiently into account the complex and emotional nature of man. The services run too much in the old groove of past centuries—a time, perhaps, when people had more leisure for hard thinking, and more inclination for it, than have the overtaxed men of the present day. The charge of being 'cold' is often brought against Unitarians by the orthodox body, and not without some reason. The sermons are carefully prepared essays, intellectual treats to the few, but uninteresting to the many, and often lacking in practical teaching and fervour. There is something not to be despised in the old Puritan word 'unction.' Unitarianism needs a large leavening of the emotional element." She then enlarges upon the necessity of having hymn-books suited to present-day thought.

There are suggestions in this letter which we cannot afford to ignore. If there is any truth in them, we shall do well to amend our methods. In this age of business strain and anxiety men and women come to our services for inspiration and uplifting, and not to listen to essays on subjects which have no practical bearing whatever on their everyday life. Practical ethical teaching is very much needed nowadays, and will attract earnest-minded people. Our age has a peculiar reason for moral teaching, arising out of its own peculiar needs. Christianity is full of untouched ethical riches, its mines of moral teaching are almost unwrought. Let these be reached and applied to the questions that are evermore emerging, to conduct, to our class and caste hatred, to the questions between capital and labour; and Christianity as interpreted by Unitarians will become a greater power, by becoming a more practical and living teacher. This is what the Liberal orthodox teacher is doing, and is the secret of his success with the masses. He seldom or never touches on doctrines which are recognised as orthodox. He deals chiefly with the ethical side of religion, lays the whole stress on trying to make men better. He preaches for the world, seeking to build up society by endeavouring to make men honest, true, kind and helpful towards their fellows. He takes from the treasure-house of the Bible, not stories of miracles and dogmas, of Incarnation and substitution, but the great utterances of faith and charity, the sublime spiritual lessons of holiness and self-sacrifice. The old belief that the Church had no business in this great groaning world of human beings, except to attend to what are regarded as spiritual needs, has been "cast to the moles and the bats," and the social side of Christianity is assuming greater prominence. Men have turned away from Christianity because they thought it was a small, limited thing, a scheme with no large human interests to commend it to the great social age. But there is not one burning question, or one great want, with which Christianity cannot deal successfully. Wherever the poor are downtrodden and inequalities prevail, wherever the evils of the sweating-shop and the drinkshop, the pawnshop and the gambling-shop, are to be found; there the Christian Church must expend its energies and resources to bring about a better condition of things. In dealing with these great life problems plenty of opportunities will arise when the great principles for which we stand may be distinctly enunciated.

There is no doubt that the broadness of teaching in many orthodox churches has an appreciable influence upon the numerical strength of our own churches. The orthodox minister nowadays is none the worse for the reputation of being a little free and liberal in his theology, having a little spice of heterodoxy to flavour his sentiments and make them piquant, while the man who moves along the old lines is regarded as an interesting specimen of a rapidly-vanishing race which by the laws of development and the survival of the fittest must retire to make way for a higher type of theological humanity. Because the old theology has to a large extent given place to the new many of the advanced thinkers are able to find what they require in the churches where they have been accustomed to worship from early childhood. This keeps many whose sympathies are with us from joining our organisations.

The churches of the South Eastern Province, separated widely from each other by geographical distance, are with unfaltering faith bearing their witness for truth and freedom. We cannot speak too highly of the work these isolated churches are doing amid many discouragements. Where would some of the churches in our larger towns and cities be without the men and women who have been trained in our smaller towns and villages? All honour to the faithful pastors who are willing at no small personal sacrifice to spend their strength in maintaining these outposts of Liberal Religion.

During the past nine months the Rev. J. Felstead has been conducting the services at Lewes, and has now received a very cordial and unanimous invitation to the pastorate. The deep religious spirit which he has already infused into the congregation is one of the most hopeful signs for the future of this church. Bessell's Green has also been fortunate in the choice of a minister, the Rev. F. T. Reed, who has lately resigned his charge at Colyton. In South Devon he rendered good service in connection with the gathering of a new congregation at Newton Abbott, and he will have in his new sphere an opportunity of attempting something at Sevenoaks, which may strengthen the church at Bessell's Green. Although Reading is still without a pastor, the church has not allowed its energies to slumber. The long-felt need of a church room will soon be met. The structure is nearly finished, and will be formally opened in the course of two or three weeks. The friends are to be congratulated upon this achievement; and if generous hearts will enable them to open it free of debt, their joy will be full. Mr. O. A. Shrubsole, Craven-road, is the treasurer. At Hastings there has been steady progressive work. Sundry structural alterations are being effected to meet the growing needs of the congregation. About £90 are being expended, towards which the local friends have promised half that amount. The Rev. Gardner Preston will be glad to receive donations, so that no debt may hinder the good work that is being done. The church at Tunbridge Wells is growing in strength and influence. At no period in its history has there been a greater spirit of hopefulness as to its future. A building fund has been established, and an effort will be made at no distant date to obtain a suitable site for a permanent church. During the past six months the Rev. W. Rose has had charge of Walthamstow, which had suffered severe losses by removals. He has done excellent work, and arrangements are being made for him to continue his oversight for a more lengthened period. In December last an effort was made at Harlesden to deliver our message to the people, but they would not come to listen to it. The object we had in view failed, but we succeeded in bringing some Unitarians together, who had hitherto been strangers to each other, although living only a few hundred yards from each other. These mostly came from Acton. So that instead of making any further effort at Harlesden it was decided to try Acton. Here we have already received encouragement. The members of our household of faith have earnestly co-operated in this movement, and the attendances at the services have been fairly good. The small hall in which the services are conducted is very central, electric cars from Ealing and Shepherds Bush pass very near to it. Arrangements have been made with the Rev. T. J. Hardy, B.A., formerly a clergyman of the Established Church, to conduct the services during March and April, so that an attempt will be made to organise if possible a permanent congregation.

It is often said that Unitarians lay very little stress on religious services, and are practically indifferent to them. That they are often lax in their attendance, must be confessed. It is of course possible to maintain the religious life apart from religious ordinances, but it is exceptional. Into the brotherhood of worshipping and reverent souls, a man may enter and find the strength of holy association and the uplifting power of heavenward thought and purpose, which he cannot find elsewhere. It is easy to say that we can worship God alone, that we can commune with Him in the fields of nature, or by the seashore, and that we can live the godly life out of our own solitary impulse. This is undoubtedly possible, as it is possible to live among savages and not lose the gentle and courteous ways of civilised life. But to few is the strength given; and in cutting ourselves off from, or in neglecting religious communion with, our fellows, we not only quench the rational yearnings of the spirit, but separate ourselves from a great source of inward life and power. The Provincial Assembly has done well in seeking to develop and foster the devotional spirit by organising united special services at Brixton and Islington when the spiritual aspirations of Unitarians found expression. It is true the congregations were not so large or representative as they ought to have been, but those who were present felt it good to be there. In proportion to the spirituality of the church will be its power for usefulness. "Unto him that hath shall be given," and the spirituality of the church is its capacity to receive a copious baptism of divine life and beauty and glory.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Accrington.—On Feb. 19 a dramatic recital was given in the school by Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, before a good audience. Mr. Harwood gave an admirable rendering of selections from Shakespeare, Dickens, and modern humorists, greatly appreciated by the audience.

Atherton.—In Chowbent Chapel, on Saturday evening last, to a crowded congregation, some sixty members of the Hallé Choir of Manchester gave a fine rendering of Sullivan's "Golden Legend." The new organ was put to its grandest and sweetest uses by Mr. R. C. Wilson, Mus. Bac., Director of the Hallé Choruses; Mr. Joshua Knowles, of the Tottington Prize Choir, being the conductor; and Mr. Harold Wilde, of London, the leading tenor. The local papers give full accounts of this musical event in Atherton, and refer to an old window bill, dated 1786, from which it appears that as early as that year, as often since, selections from the great oratorios had been given in connection with the chapel.

Boston.—The date for the proposed Bazaar or Sale of Work for the renovation of Spain-lane Chapel has been fixed for the first week in June. It is hoped that arrangement will give time to friends to send their intended contributions. The Rev. W. Stoddart is giving a series of discourses on "The Story of Religion in England."

Bridport.—On Feb. 13, Mrs. T. A. Colfox opened a Sale of Work and Exhibition of Curios in the Unitarian schoolroom, to raise a fund for the renovation and redecoration of the schools. It was the first sale of the kind ever held in connection with that congregation. The Rev. H. S. Solly, in introducing Mrs. Colfox, said they had reason to be proud of the history of their Sunday-schools in Bridport. The original building was the first built for the purpose of a Sunday-school, and for many years a fine school was carried on in it. When that became outgrown, they knew to whom they were indebted for the building in which the school was now continued, and in which they were met that day—the late Mrs. Colfox, of Rax—and it was borne into their hearts to take care of, and properly keep up, what they had received from her generosity. It was for that special purpose they were met together that afternoon. Mrs. Colfox, in a brief address, then declared the sale open. The result was a profit of £36 5s. 1d.

Chatham.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Wednesday week, the Rev. G. S. Hitchcock, B.A., presiding. Satisfactory reports as to the Sunday-school and various societies and classes were presented, and Mr. Hitchcock, in moving their adoption, dwelt on the value of the hard work they were putting into their efforts and of their fearless witness for truth. Other earnest speeches followed, and a musical programme added to the enjoyment of the evening.

Cradley (Resignation).—The Rev. E. P. Hall has resigned the pastorate of the Park-lane Chapel, and the pulpit will be vacant in May.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The fourth meeting of the session was held at Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, on Saturday, the 22nd inst. About forty were present. A very excellent paper on "The Teacher's Aim: To raise the Scholars' Ideal," was given by Miss Marian Pritchard, and was followed by a helpful discussion.

Horwich.—Last Sunday was the sixth anniversary of the opening of the chapel. In the afternoon the cantata "Daniel" was very effectively rendered by an augmented choir, to a congregation that quite crowded the building. The attendance in the evening was also good. The Sunday-school gymnasium, recently started, promises well. The entire buildings will, very probably, soon be in the hands of the decorator.

Hull (Appointment).—The Rev. F. Herning Vaughan, B.A., has accepted an invitation to the pulpit at Park-street Church, and will commence his ministry early in September.

Ilkeston.—Mr. W. Shakspeare, eldest son of the Rev. W. Shakspeare, has just been elected a member of the Ilkeston Town Council, at a bye-election.

London: Kentish Town.—Preaching at the Free Christian Church on Sunday last, the Rev. George Critchley, B.A., made feeling reference to the death of Mr. P. W. Clayden, who was from 1869-1883 minister of this church. During the service the solo, "Be thou faithful unto death," from St. Paul, was sung by Mr. A. Savage Cooper, and at the conclusion "The Dead March" from Saul was impressively played by the organist, Mr. J. W. Scruton.

Maidstone.—The annual winter school treat took place in the Concert Hall on Wednesday, Feb. 19. A large company sat down to tea, after which Mr. F. W. Ruck took the chair, and gave an encouraging address, afterwards presenting the prizes and medals to the successful scholars. Mr. M. A. Ruck followed with an earnest appeal for funds, and the Rev. S. S. Brettell also addressed the meeting. An excellent programme was then gone through. An interesting feature of the entertainment was the performance of Chwatal's "Toy Symphony," a description of a lively sledging party, under the leadership of Miss Ellis, the superintendent of the Sunday-school. A Sale of Work, arranged by the Sewing Circle, was held during the evening with a satisfactory result.

Pontypridd.—A memorial service to the late Mr. William Gimblette, formerly of this town, who died at Coolgardie, Western Australia, on 1st inst., was held at the Old Town Hall on Tuesday, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham, a personal friend of the deceased, officiating.

Rawtenstall.—Sunday last, February 23, was Organist's Sunday, the preacher for the day being Mr. George G. Armstrong, of Bolton-le-Moors. In the morning a scholars' service was held. A musical service took place during the afternoon, the vocalists being the Church Choir. Councillor J. Bradley presided at the organ. At six in the evening a congregational service was held, and Mr. Armstrong delivered an eloquent discourse on the text, "Be ye therefore perfect even as your Father who is in heaven is perfect." On Sunday evening next an important congregational meeting will be held to consider the advisability of securing a suitable minister to take charge of the church.

Rochdale.—At the evening service last Sunday, the Rev. T. P. Spedding made a brief reference to the gift by Mr. Robert Taylor Heape of two finely-carved screens, to form a new baptistry in the church, as a memorial of Queen Victoria. The screens, which are carved of English-grown oak, are in the perpendicular style of Gothic and are a beautiful piece of workmanship, were placed in position last week. It was the donor's wish that no special service should mark the occasion, but Mr. Spedding said it was impossible to refrain from some expression of gratitude. Such public recognition, he added, was compatible with due respect for the wishes of those who had contributed to the enrichment of this place of worship by a series of gifts which was not yet completed. It was not unfitting that churches as well as other societies should perpetuate the memory of the great ruler whose reign was coterminous with the most remarkable period in our social annals, and whose influence for good was such that her name would stand to mark a new era and a new ideal in the life of England.

Rotherham.—On Wednesday week the Rev. C. Harvey Cook gave a lecture before the Church of Our Father Literary and Social Union on "English Idols and English Idolatry," beginning with primitive times and the religion of the Druids, and coming down through the Middle Ages to the present day, when the priest is still venerated. The Rev. W. Stephens presided.

Scarborough.—A concert and dramatic entertainment were successfully given on Wednesday and Thursday, Feb. 19 and 20, by members of the Young People's Guild.

Whitchurch.—On Wednesday evening, Feb. 19, Mr. Richard Robinson, of Liverpool, conducted a short service in the schoolroom of the Church of the Saviour, followed by a lecture, entitled "An Evening with Charles Dickens," which was greatly appreciated. The attendance was not large, due no doubt to the severity of the weather. Mr. Groom, in moving a vote of thanks (which was seconded by Mr. Dodd), spoke of the valuable assistance Mr. Robinson had rendered to the church for many years, and the pleasure it gave those present to renew their intercourse with one who took such a deep interest in their work.

Wick: Glamorgan.—A religious service was held on Thursday evening, Feb. 20, conducted by the Revs. D. Rees, of Pentre, and W. J. Phillips, of Nottage, the former of whom preached in Welsh and the latter in English. There were about forty people present, and the services were much appreciated.

Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The thirty-fourth Teachers' Conference took place in the Channing Hall, Chapel-lane Chapel, Bradford. There was an exceptionally large and encouraging attendance from the majority of the schools comprising the Union, the large gathering apparently recognising that such conferences are of real and permanent value to teachers and all engaged in the noble work of Sunday-school teaching. After tea Mrs. Rawlings, of York, read an able, interesting, and instructive paper, entitled "Pages from a Teacher's Autobiography." The chair was occupied by Mr. Councillor J. D. Conyers, the President. Connected in early life with the Lutheran Church, Mrs. Rawlings graphically described her adoption of the Unitarian faith, her connection with Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, and her initial efforts as a teacher in the Lower Mosley-street schools. Her work abroad, at Huddersfield, in London, and at present in York, were also briefly alluded to. Among the many essentials of Sunday-school work, Mrs. Rawlings advised that reverence and Bible teaching should be incorporated in the lessons, the former being somewhat neglected. The discussion evoked was of a bright, helpful character. Mrs. Rawlings was thanked for her paper. At intervals several sacred songs were admirably sung by members of the Chapel-lane choir.

On Tuesday evening, at the Kensington Town Hall, Mr. Stopford Brooke gave the first of his five lectures upon the poetry of Rossetti and of Wm. Morris, recently delivered at University College. It was listened to with close and appreciative attention by an audience of between 400 and 500 people, many of whom were inhabitants of the neighbourhood, though some had come from the remotest suburbs. Mr. Edmund Gosse, as chairman, made an interesting little speech upon the need of a rightful appreciation of poetry, and in introducing the lecturer said that "there is no one in this city who less than Mr. Brooke needs an introduction to a cultivated audience." In opening his lecture Mr. Brooke remarked that it was forty years since he had addressed a Kensington audience, in the days of his curacy at the church close by, and he felt a "sentimental" interest in this course of lectures in his old parish.

ABERYSTWYTH

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE annual meetings of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, held March 4; the Liverpool District Missionary Association, March 5; and the Mansford-street Church and Mission, March 6, we hope to report next week. On Monday the annual meeting of the Midland Christian Union is to be held in the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham.

A MEMORIAL service was held on Sunday, Feb. 23, in the High Pavement Chapel, at Nottingham, for the late Mr. P. W. Clayden, formerly minister of the chapel. The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, and gave a vivid account of Mr. Clayden's life and work, concluding with the following sentences :—

"His great and brilliant gifts, coupled with an intense faith in the working man, made him, in the best sense, a popular preacher, so that the old chapel was crowded almost to suffocation with enthusiastic admirers. It scarcely needed to be said that he was, in politics, a strong and sturdy Radical and he never hesitated when he felt that truth and right called him to take the unpopular side. He was a man of unflinching rectitude and integrity of character and, above all, a deeply religious man. He carried his Unitarian faith into every detail of his life, and there was no sense of incongruity in his passing from the Sunday pulpit to the Monday editorial work. It was reassuring to know that English journalism and English Liberal religion were not incompatible occupations for such a man. He was fond of quoting lines which might now well be taken up and applied to him :—

To me the thought of death is terrible,
Having such hold on life. To thee 'tis not
So much as even the lifting of a latch ;
Only a step into the open air
Out of a tent already luminous
With light that shines through its transparent walls.

Might they be taught to practise his doctrine, to imitate his life, and to follow his example, as he had followed Christ and God." With the congregation upstanding, the organist then played the 'Dead March' in Saul.

On the following Sunday morning the congregation remained after service and passed the following memorial resolution :—

The congregation of the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, desire to place on record their sense of the great loss which they have sustained by the death of Mr. P. W. Clayden, their former and most beloved minister, and to convey to his family in their bereavement their sincere and heartfelt sympathy. Particularly do they desire to recal at this time the warm attachment that always existed between him and them—an attachment which a separation of upwards of thirty years had not lessened, and their appreciation of the generous kindness of his recent ministrations among them.

THE Seed Sower for this month contains a sermon by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, on "The Things that Cannot be Shaken," and besides other interesting matter a second and concluding instalment of passages from Martineau and others, under the title, "Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers on the Incarnation." In the Unitarian World will be found an interesting account by Mr. Z. Toyosaki, the Japanese student at present at Manchester College, Oxford, of how he became a Unitarian. Of his early history Mr. Toyosaki writes :—

I was born a Buddhist. I can still remember, when very young, going to the Buddhist temples with my grandmother, when I worshipped the image of Buddha, and felt the mystery of the idols and ornaments of the temple as I gazed upon them in childish wonder. When I was ten years old, my father ceased to worship Buddha, and began to study Confucianism. Naturally, his great change in religious thought also influenced me. A few years later, my father and myself were baptised as Christians in a Congregational Church.

I became a student in a mission school established by the Methodist Episcopal Church. After completing the academic course, I entered the theological department, with the view of preparing myself for the ministry. On leaving the theological school, I was appointed the pastor of a Methodist Church, where I remained two years. During this period, I first came under the influence of the "New Theology" movement in Japan. I could not rest satisfied with what my fellow-workers, the Methodist missionaries, were preaching; for I could not find any satisfactory solution of my theological difficulties. In fact, I was drifting towards Liberal Christianity.

How Mr. Toyosaki came finally to identify himself with the Japanese Unitarians in Tokyo we must leave our readers to see for themselves in the Unitarian World, or in its Northern edition, the New Kingdom. There they will also find a paper by the late Rev. John Dendy, B.A., on "Unitarian Christianity and Citizenship," and something about Unitarian beliefs.

THOUGH the weather was most uninviting on Thursday evening last week a fairly good audience assembled at Steinway Hall to hear Mr. J. H. Leigh continue his Shakespeare recitals by a reading from Macbeth. Mr. Leigh's renderings of Shakespeare are too well known to need description, but we may be allowed to remark that while all the scenes chosen from the tragedy were most excellently given on Thursday, the speeches of Macbeth himself, and especially in the banquet scene, were the most remarkable. Mr. Leigh held his audience spell-bound as he personated the soul-tortured and affrighted King when Banquo's haunting ghost usurps his seat. The reader for the time was Macbeth himself. The conversation of the witches was also given with especial force and originality.

A HIGHLY successful celebration of St. David's Day was held in the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, on the eve of that day. Principal Evans entertained the students and a number of other guests at tea, and the subsequent proceedings were conducted mainly in Welsh, with some portions of the speeches in English for the benefit of the English guests. Sir Lewis Morris testified that the character of St. David could stand critical examination, and emerge therefrom satisfactorily, which was more than could be truly said of the patron saints of some other countries—St. George of England for example. In an address which was received with much enthusiasm, Sir Lewis dwelt on the revival of the national sentiment in recent years, and its healthy reaction on progressive national education. A discourse on the life of St. David was delivered by the Rev. David Evans, of Blaenconnin, and proved to be both entertaining and instructive. Other speakers included the Principal, Professors Jones, Keri Evans, and Weatherall, the Revs. A. Fuller Mills, D. J. Thomas, and Edward Davies. Several contributions to the biography of St. David were offered during the course of the evening, which seemed to have escaped the notice of the historians of his period. The students contributed musical items, and some complimentary pennillion composed and recited by "Dewi Gwendraeth" (who is the senior student of the college) met with a great reception.

This celebration at the Carmarthen Presbyterian College, a contemporary remarks, "brought about quite a re-union of the religious sects. The chairman (Principal Evans) is a Unitarian, and the speakers included a Churchman (Sir Lewis Morris), two Baptists (the Revs. Fuller Mills and David Evans), three Congregationalists (the Revs. D. J. Thomas and Professors D. E. Jones and Keri Evans), another Unitarian (Professor Weatherall), and a Calvinistic Methodist (the Rev. Edward Davies). For a theological college this is an achievement."

PRAYER OF THE BOND AND FREE.

A CONTRAST.

The two following contrasted poems have come to us from a friend in far-away Bolivia, who has been for nearly forty years in Spanish-speaking countries, and is now in the midst of a fanatically Roman Catholic population, with a priesthood of the least enlightened type. There the Postal Mission (through an advertisement in the New Age) found our friend, and wakened in him a cordial response of sympathy with Unitarians. He has ordered a copy of the International Council volume, and by the translation of some of the papers hopes to persuade the Bolivians of the possibility of a reasonable faith in religion. In the first of these two poems it will be seen that the serf is in bondage also to the ancient superstitions of the Roman Catholic Church.

THE SERF'S PRAYER.

Thank God, the night is come, the task is done;
We two, as best we may, our aching limbs
May drag into our hut; perchance our babes,
Poor wretches born in sin and swathed in rags,
May smile to see us home. Thy mercy, Lord,
Has given to us and them enough of food,
(Food even as good as that of innocent beasts
Who ne'er have sinned against Thy Son and Thee,
Nor merit the fierce hell that burns for men,)
To warm the unclean blood in sinful limbs,
And give us strength, after our rest, to rise
The livelong day to moil; until once more
The welcome night may bring forgetfulness.
That we may sleep and not awake in hell
We owe to Thee, Mother and Spouse of God,*

Who pitiest us, who fannest the pure flame
Of love that glows in Holy Jesu's breast,
Who paid to God the price of endless bale
That we before our birth had well deserved.

And we, poor wretches, with wrinkled, sunburnt masks,
And bony hands covered with tactless horn,
Tools fit to handle stone and soil and mire,
In this share with our betters; them whose skin
Is milk and rose, whose hands are smooth as babes';
Who own the land we till for them, and deign
To pay us wages that we may not die.
God, Thou art very merciful to us men,
Whose very birth an outrage is to Thee,—
Conceived in sin, sinful in life and death!

Keep us, sweet Mary, from darksome death this night!
And when our shrunken limbs shall lie supine,
And the grey mist steal o'er our weary eyes,
Leave us a little space, to tell once more
Our foul and evil lives to the good priest
Who in God's place may speak the blessèd words
Of pardon; otherwise, O Mary, pure
And pitiful unto us all foul and base,
We may awake in ever-burning hell!

* This poem was suggested by an engraving of Millet's "Angelus," representing the devout Catholic's evening prayer to the Virgin Mary.

Again we thank Thee, Lord, for this good food,
Almost enough to make us hale and strong;
And for the dreamless sleep, that some short hours
Brings us surcease from toil and care and pain!

THE FREE MAN'S PRAYER.

O Father, who hast made this wondrous world
And us Thy sons and daughters, to Thee we raise
Our hearts and voices ere the day be done.
We know that Thou, our Father, needest not
Our supplications, that Thou mayst bestow
Even as Thou bestowest, Thy choicest gifts
On us and all mankind. Our privilege
It is to think on Thee, to bring our souls
In touch one moment with the Infinite Love,
To feel anew our sonship, and obtain
A foretaste of the blessedness to come;
When our freed souls, unclothed of mortal flesh
Shall feel more near to Heaven, and Thee, whose Will Draws us for ever nearer to Thyself.

We thank Thee for the day; for health and strength
Blithely to labour for the commonweal;
We thank Thee for the rapturous gift of song
And poesy, that make our daily toil
Lightsome and joyous as our children's games.
We thank Thee for the sun; for the free winds;
For the sweet scents of woodland and of lea,
And flowers well nigh as lovely as our babes;
For the good rain that swells the throbbing veins
Of tree and shrub and plant with life renewed.
We thank Thee for the joy of bird and beast
Waking the avenues of lordly elms
And blossoming meads to cheerful life and song.
We thank Thee for our young men's supple grace;
Our children's beauty; and the loveliness
Of our dear maids and matrons, whose sweet care
Fills our fair homes with gladsome light and love.
O bounteous Lord, our Father and our Friend,
'Tis Thou who dwellest in this happy earth
And in our souls, fulfilling them with joy!

We thank Thee for the night; for the silences
Of earth and heaven; for the infinite spread
Of countless worlds, wherein Thou too abidest
Even as with us. We thank Thee for the rest
Thou givest to mind and body in peaceful sleep:—
Else, with the joy of rapturous bounding life
Our human hearts o'erflowing with bliss, might break
Ere comes the day, when earthly duties done
We need to lay this bodily clothing by!

ENGLAND AND CHINA.*

BY THE REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A.

"God hath made of one every nation of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth."—Acts xvii. 26.

"That there should be no schism in the body, but that the members should have the same care one for another."—1 Corinthians xii. 25.

A FORTNIGHT ago we were invited by the Principal of this College to consider the meaning of Christian patriotism. In the spirit (I hope) of that discourse I would ask leave this morning to carry the subject a stage further into a field of the utmost difficulty and confusion, where moralists grope for light, and statesmen act from day to day without any fixed methods according to the moment's needs —namely, the relations of the great Powers to the peoples of alien culture. Year after year young men go forth from Oxford to undertake the government of various races in different parts of the world. What principles exist for their guidance? What ideals dwell in the background of their minds? Are they those only of arrogance and scorn, such as was unhappily betrayed by the Chancellor of this University when, in a fit of political spleen, he designated a cultivated Parsee gentleman, whose services to his native land justly entitled him to honour, and whose lineage was far older than that of any Elizabethan statesman, by the contemptuous epithet "Black Man"? Or are they based, if not on knowledge, yet at least on sympathy and a desire for mutual comprehension and, if possible, respect? Those who have heard in recent years the notable utterances of Miss Colenso at Somerville, or, in this College, of the lamented Mary Kingsley, will be at no loss to understand what I mean.

It has sometimes been made a reproach against the Bible, particularly against the New Testament—for instance by the late Francis William Newman, brother of the Cardinal and formerly lecturer of this College—that it contains no teaching on the principles of what may be called international morality. If the New Testament offered itself as a complete guide to life, a code of laws providing for all possible human relations, such a criticism might have some validity. But we have long recognised that such a claim, if it was ever made on its behalf, has no foundation, and that to condemn its deficiencies from that point of view is most unfairly to misjudge it. Rather is it to the Old Testament, with its pictures of the distribution of peoples, of national migrations and the rise and fall of Empires, that we should look for suggestion. But in the prophetic interpretation of life international relations are presented almost solely as they affect Israel. The Assyrian invader who besieges cities and overthrows kingdoms, is justified as the staff of Yahweh's anger, the rod of his indignation, against a faithless people; and Babylon falls before Cyrus that an act of Divine Grace may be performed, and, as Yahweh's Messiah, he may let the captives of Judah go free. One imperishable ideal has descended to us from these ancient seers, an ideal unapproached by any other teachers of the past, an ideal so lofty that it still shines above us only as a star of hope—the vision of the nations of the earth bound in peaceful-community of worship and blending their former rivalries in homage to a common Lord. It was the corollary of the sublime conception that the Maker of the world, the Creator of humanity, was one. The peoples of divers lands might differ in colour from dark to fair, but they were the same in soul; and the purpose of the Eternal would at last be realised by all.

It was with this hope in their minds that the first Christians addressed themselves to the conversion of the Gentiles. They, too, grasped the doctrine of the Unity of the human race. The world as they knew it, though it might contain (as we now see) different types of civilisation, and the Greek might proudly hug his culture against the Asiatic Barbarian, was not for them divided by deep cleavages of mental habit and moral tradition, to say nothing of external command over the gifts and forces of nature. Ideas of common citizenship, common law, even common religion, were made possible, because the races embraced within the Empire were not too far apart from each other in the several stages of their social advance.

But we are confronted with a very different problem. Science has indeed established beyond doubt the fundamental conception expressed in the words "God hath made of one all nations of men on all the face of the earth"; but it has in other respects profoundly modified our ideas. Our world is far vaster than that known to the writers of the Bible; and our Empire deals with races, whether within or without its pale, far more diversified than those which came within the vision of Isaiah or Paul. And we ourselves are living in the midst of changes of ideas upon this subject so swift and far-reaching that the old principles have been torn to shreds, and no new ones have yet emerged out of the chaos in which we have been plunged. In what may be called the Pre-Darwinian Period between the Great Reform Bill and the Indian Mutiny, two factors were dominant, the conceptions of natural rights inherited from the French Revolution and the great humanitarian ideas due to Evangelical Christianity which triumphed in the abolition of slavery. In the remarkable address delivered last summer by the Dunkin lecturer of this College on "Religion and Empire," he told us that the latest occasion when the British Parliament laid down any principle whatever as to the relation between the stronger and the weaker races in the Empire was in the year which followed the Act of Emancipation. In 1834 the House of Commons unanimously resolved "That His Majesty's Commons are deeply impressed with the duty of affording to the native inhabitants of the Colonial settlements protection in the enjoyment of their civil rights, and of imparting to them that degree of civilisation and that religion with which Providence has blest this nation." As a result of this resolution a committee was formed, the Colonial Secretary of that day (Sir George Grey) being a member. It sat for two sessions and finally laid down in its report these two principles:—First, "we are at least bound to do to the inhabitants of other lands, whether enlightened or not, as we should in similar circumstances desire to be done by"; and secondly, "the native inhabitants of any land have an incontrovertible right to their own soil." It is not, I think, extravagant to claim that in our Indian Empire the spirit of these maxims has not been unrecognised, whatever defects may have marked our administration. A long series of statesmen has endeavoured to govern India for the benefit of its vast and varied multitudes. Our wisdom may have been limited, our sympathy imperfect, our control at home may often have been selfish, but on the spot the white man has sought to secure peace, to administer impartial justice, and to spread knowledge. Blunders there have necessarily been, but the welfare of India has been the first object of the solicitude of her rulers, and the men who guard its wonderful congeries of races are not permitted to own a single acre of their land. Turn to Africa and you will find that in the recently annexed Soudan the treatment of the black tribes is largely based on Indian precedents. Pass down to Rhodesia and contemplate the hapless fate of the Matabele, and you see how completely the principles of 1834 have been abandoned or defied. When the Prime Minister at the outset of the present war declared its object to be to secure equal rights for all men from the Cape to the Zambesi, he thought it needless to explain afterwards that he had negligently omitted the word "white"; and in the speech with which the Sovereign met his first Parliament after his accession a marked contrast was drawn between the equal rights which were to be secured for the white people, and the protection and justice which were to be given to the blacks.

That there are many reasons for this change is obvious. The evangelical conception no longer holds the field. Apart from the gradual decline of its influence in the religious thought and the public life of this country (itself a phenomenon due to manifold causes), the newly risen science of anthropology has completely altered our views concerning the peoples of the lower culture. Whilst we know now that some of them possess intricate social and religious institutions of their own, of which casual observers had at first no suspicion, we know also that these were the products of long ages of tribal development, and cannot be shaken, still less destroyed, without grave moral peril. We are learning that whilst it may be true to say that all nations of men are of one blood, there are, nevertheless, profound variations among them which make it impossible for one people to impart to another, even by resolution of the House of Commons, that degree of civilisation with which Providence has blessed them. These variations may not be permanent. The interfusion of races which is little by little taking place in so many parts of the world, particularly in Africa, may gradually after innumerable generations break them down, and the goal of science is to see one culture spreading round the globe, just as it is the goal of commerce to see all countries organised as one market, and the goal of religion to fold all races in one faith. But in the meantime we have to deal with the differences that actually exist. The unity which shall embrace and transcend them lies far far beyond our ken, and the statesman must recognise that he has to do with conditions which may not indeed be unalterable, but which can only be very very slowly changed.

But there are other causes which have been of late years no less potent. The rise of nations into military pre-eminence, schemes of financial ambition, the practical distribution of the hitherto unallotted portions of the globe among the few great Powers, the modern conception of Imperial sovereignty rather than Imperial obligation, the improved facilities of communication—all these have tended to widen the gap between the old ethical standards and our actual practice. They have increased enormously the complexity of the problem; they have revealed the manifoldness of the interests involved; and they have rendered it more and more difficult for the wisest statesman to "see life steadily and see it whole." But ever and anon there comes to us some voice which speaks in tones of warning or appeal, perhaps holds up to us an unfamiliar ideal, or invokes an acknowledged principle to support a definite line of action. Two such voices I have lately heard; let me ask you to hear them with me.

The first has long been known to the little band of students of the ancient history of India. But only quite recently have its remarkable utterances become accessible to English readers. The publication by the University Press of a volume on Asoka, in its series on the Rulers of India, presents to us in a singularly interesting form the same conflict between a religious ideal and a practical difficulty. Asoka succeeded (probably in 272 B.C.) to the Empire raised by the genius of his grandfather on the ruins of the power of Alexander the Great. From the mouths of the Ganges to Afghanistan and Kashmir, from the Himalayas to the twelfth parallel above the equator, he ruled over a vaster dominion than British India without Burmah. All over this immense area, graven on rocky cliffs, on blocks of quartz or granite, or on sacred pillars, are the remarkable edicts in which for the first time an Indian Sovereign addressed his people, and expounded to them the principles of his policy. It is as if Marcus Aurelius had inscribed some of his thoughts on tablets from Cadiz to Antioch, from the Danube to the Nile. In the ninth year of his reign Asoka was engaged in a terrible and bloody war with the Kalingas, a nation on the west coast, who were completely subjugated, their territory being incorporated in his dominions. The slaughter and suffering of this campaign made a deep impression on him. His compunction drove him into the arms of the Buddhists, and in memorable words in an edict of the thirteenth year of his reign he expressed his grief:—

In the ninth year of his reign His Majesty conquered the Kalingas, and 150,000 persons were thence carried away captive; 100,000 were slain, and many times that number perished. Ever since the annexation of the Kalingas, His Majesty has zealously protected the law of Piety, has been devoted to that law, and has proclaimed its precepts. His Majesty feels remorse on account of the conquest of the Kalingas, because, during the subjugation of a previously unconquered country, slaughter, death, and the taking captive of the people necessarily occur, whereat His Majesty feels profound sorrow and regret.

In moving terms he describes the suffering inflicted on the innocent, the breaking up of homes, the separation of relatives, the destruction of property, and the ravaging of the land. And he continues:—

Although a man should do him an injury, His Majesty holds that it must patiently be borne as far as it possibly can be borne. Even upon the fiercest tribes in his dominions His Majesty has compassion, though advised to destroy them in detail, and though the power to harry them is in His Majesty's hands. They are warned to this effect: "Shun evil-doing that ye may escape destruction."* For His Majesty desires for all beings security, control over the passions, peace of mind and joyousness. And this is the chiefest conquest in His Majesty's opinion, the conquest by the law of Piety.

That the law of Piety might be adequately known a ministry of public instruction was established, but the strictest orders were issued that all sects and creeds should be treated with equal consideration, and none should speak aught evil concerning his neighbour's faith. In the absence of any political philosophy, any theory of the State, any doctrine of rights, Asoka could only express himself through the patriarchal formula. In an edict addressed in his fourteenth year to the officials in charge of the wild Border tribes he wrote:—

All men are my children, and just as for my own children I desire that they should enjoy all happiness and prosperity in this world and the next, so for all men I desire the like happiness and prosperity, and my will concerning the Border tribes is that they should be convinced that the King desires them to be free from disquietude. I desire them to trust me and to be assured that they will receive from me happiness, not sorrow, and to be convinced that the King bears them goodwill. Understanding this, do your duty, and inspire these folk with trust, so that they may be convinced that the King is even unto them as a father, and that as he cares for himself so he cares for them who are as the King's chilren.

So the Sovereign set before his people an example of unremitting toil. "I am never satisfied," he proclaimed, "with the sufficiency of my exertions. Work I must for the public weal, and the object of all my endeavour is simply to acquit my duty to living beings, so that I may make some of them happy in this world, and that hereafter they may attain to heaven." So he passes from our view, but not till he has opened communications with five Greek kings around the Mediterranean, including the famous Ptolemy Philadelphus at Alexandria, and has founded the great Buddhist missions which never rested till the law of Piety was carried all through Asia, and became more or less formally, according to many estimates, the creed of four or five hundred millions of the human race.

And now from the further East the adherents of the same faith have recently made to us a definite appeal. Within the last few weeks we have seen an end, for the time being, of the hideous confusions engendered in the Chinese Empire. The Court has returned to Peking; order, at least upon the surface, has been restored. Normal relations with the foreign Powers have been resumed, and everyone is asking, "For how long?" The answer depends on the temper, the disposition, the principles—if they have any—of the great Christian States of Europe and America. Do they intend to follow the same methods, to enforce the same claims, to continue the same arrogant attitude of superiority, as heretofore? In words of grave and even passionate sincerity, the Buddhists of Japan, in the midst of the awful welter more than a year ago, issued an address to all the Churches of the world, a copy of which came but lately into my hands. The question is complicated to the last degree, but they put their finger, without hesitation, on what they believe to have been the main cause of the recent outbreak—the presence of the Christian missionaries, and the apprehensions which their conduct has again and again excited in the Chinese mind. With generous sympathy and appreciation they dwell on their self-denying labours, and recount the valuable educational and other agencies which they have introduced for the welfare of the people. And they contrast the resultant violence and cruelty—which they assert have known no bounds—with the singular tolerance displayed by the Chinese in former ages of their history. What is the reason of such a change? They trace it, without hesitation, to the unwisdom of missionaries who have again and again arrogated to themselves "the power of protecting the followers of their creed, in utter disregard of the latter's criminality, under the laws of the State," and have thus seemed to be interfering with the fundamental institutions of the land.*

The Chinese began to entertain the idea that the missionaries were intimately connected with the foreign policy of their own countries. . . . They saw with grave apprehension that the missionaries were the first to arrive, followed by consuls, with generals at their back; and they feared that behind the man who had come with a Bible in his hand, stood a warrior armed with a spear and a sword.

In the name, therefore, of all advanced forms of religion, which they assert to be based upon the principle of love for mankind, the Japanese Buddhists make two proposals. The first is that the great Churches of the world should exercise their influence in restraining the missionaries in China from proceedings which are likely to create suspicion on the part of the Chinese as to their secret connection with the foreign policy of their several countries; and they urge that as the great teachers of antiquity displayed no spirit of hostility or vengeance under persecution, but on the contrary prayed with compassion for the heavenly blessing on their persecutors, no demands should be made for compensation, still less should Governments be induced to carry out schemes of aggrandisement, on the plea of

* In the religious, not the political, sense.

* With this opinion one of the most distinguished American missionaries, Dr. A. H. Smith, himself practically concurs in his recent book entitled "China in Convulsions, 1901." He writes, Vol. I., p. 35:—"Our object is simply to make it clear that we recognise the present attitude of the Christian Church, Protestant and Catholic alike, as a great bar to the spread of the gospel in China, and perhaps the most potent single cause of Chinese hostility." In Chapters iii. and iv., on the Protestant and Roman Catholic Missions, Dr. Smith gives abundant illustration of this particular class of difficulties. An abstract of the memorandum of the Chinese Government on the subject, communicated through the Tsung-li Yamên to the French Chargé d'Affaires in 1871, will be found in the "History of China," by S. Wells Williams, 1897, p. 355 to 357.

injuries inflicted. It was with this aim that when a Japanese temple was burned some time ago at Amoy, the Buddhists dissuaded their home Government from pressing the Chinese authorities, and renounced all claims for damages. It was in this spirit that the late Professor of Chinese in this University, the revered and beloved Dr. Legge, acted in a similar danger. Urged upon one occasion to make a long and difficult journey to a neighbourhood where disturbances had broken out, which it was thought his influence might avail to quell, "I will go," he said, "but upon one condition. If I do not return, let not the Government send a gunboat after me to avenge my death." The second proposal is that the missionaries should be withheld from any line of conduct subversive of the ancient customs and manners of China, or derogatory to her laws. Then, it is confidently anticipated, "the honest people of China will at once lay aside all suspicion and apprehension; they will appreciate with delight the intrinsic virtues of religion; and the four hundred million souls, relieved from distress and affliction, will be able to enjoy the benefits of the teaching of universal love."

Such are the counsels of the men who have learned from their Master that "hatred does not cease by hatred at any time; hatred ceases by love." Does not the Buddha, like Paul, point to a more excellent way? Do they not show us that when men reach the higher outlook upon life, they tend to frame the same ideals and recognise the same obligations? Looking back on the recent conduct of affairs in China, it was said by a shrewd observer on the spot, an English professor of law in the University of Tientsin, that there were but three Christian Powers engaged in all that dire struggle—England, the United States, and Japan.

The task is hard, the way is long, the difficulties are manifold, the problems intricate, sometimes beyond apprehension. But we cannot abandon the labour which God has set before us. We have learned that the great body of humanity is "made of one," and we can never cease to strive and to aspire till, in that body, schism is no more, and the members have the same care one for another.

LITERATURE.

INTRODUCTION TO THE OLD TESTAMENT.*

This book is a multum in parvo. Within less than 250 pages it contains an immense amount of information, all strictly relevant and clearly arranged, and every page shows that the author knows what he is writing about. So far as I am aware, no attempt has hitherto been made to provide what is here given, an Introduction to the books of the Old Testament intended for those who do not read Hebrew and Greek, and have not access to the larger works on the subject. An Introduction, moreover, based upon a complete acceptance of the modern critical position associated with the names of Graf, Wellhausen and Kuenen. Professor Weatherall is quite at home here, and the reader soon learns to feel confidence in his guidance. To those who really desire to know the principles, methods and main results of the criticism of the Old Testament, apart from minute details and set forth in non-technical language, this book will be most helpful; and those who really wish to learn will not grudge the demand on their attention which such a book must necessarily make. A young friend of mine once expressed the opinion that "the Bible is a good book, but it is dry." And the same remark might be applied to this Introduction.

It is a book for reference and study rather than for continuous reading. It does not profess to deal with the contents of the several books except so far as they throw light upon the history of their origin. For the religious teaching of the Old Testament, the student must go to the commentaries on the several books, or to a work like the "Religion of Israel," by Knappert. Professor Weatherall undertakes to tell what is considered by the best scholars to be true concerning the age and authorship of the several books, so that the reader may know—if he is studying Genesis, e.g.—whether he has before him a writing of the ninth or the seventh, or some later century. The arrangement of the book makes the use of it very easy. An introductory chapter deals with such subjects as the Canon, the manuscripts, the language, the Massorah. It also contains an outline sketch of Jewish history to serve as a background for the literature. Then the treatment of the separate Old Testament writings begins, the six books Genesis to Joshua being, of course, taken together as the Hexateuch. A very clear sketch of the history of the critical study of the Hexateuch forms an important part of the chapter devoted to the so-called Mosaic literature. Following on the Hexateuch the remaining books of the Old Testament are treated in the order in which they stand in the English version, which differs in some respects from the Hebrew Bible. Probably the author has considered the point whether it would not have been well to adopt the Hebrew order, and has good reasons for deciding against so doing. It would at least have helped the English reader to a clearer idea of the growth of the Canon. In connection with each book is given a summary of contents, and a discussion of its date and authorship. This is a book not for the hasty reader who expects to have everything made easy, but for the reader who wants to know and who has little or no opportunity for original research. Such a reader will gratefully appreciate the patient thoroughness of Professor Weatherall's work. On one or two slight points there is room, perhaps, for correction. The synod of Jamnia (p. 5), for which the date A.D. 90-100 is given, was not exactly a synod in our sense of the term. It was not an assembly specially convened and then dissolved after its work was completed. Jamnia (Jabneh) was the headquarters of Judaism after the destruction of the Temple, and the Rabbis had a sort of permanent council there any time between A.D. 70 and 120, or even later. It is probable enough that the date of the discussions about the Canon was A.D. 90-100. On p. 18 I doubt whether the version of Aquila owed much to the teaching of Aqiba. In the Rabbinical tradition Aquila is associated with the preceding generation of teachers, and was rather contemporary with than influenced by Aqiba. But this is a question of Targum, so I will not pursue the subject.

Professor Weatherall will understand why it is a particular pleasure to me to commend his book to the reading public.

THE EDUCATIONAL MENACE.

Sir,—I fear I was so much occupied, in the letter you kindly published in your issue of the 22nd ult., with the motives responsible for measures so reactionary as the supersession of our School Board System by local councils, that I had no time to point out the "purely educational" menace with which such a prospect threatens us, and, indeed, I took it for granted that such menace was self-evident.

As, however, your correspondent in last week's issue seems to think that this is somewhat of an Ignoratio Elenchi, may I further trepass on your space with two or three considerations which, in the event of the policy of the Government taking this direction, would constitute it a menace to education pure and simple?

(1.) To merge an Educational Board, which during the past thirty years has justified its existence by such splendid work, in other bodies would create in the public mind an impression that Education was no longer a matter of national concern, but one of inferior and local importance, derogating it in fact very much to the level of "milk and water politics."

(2.) It would introduce complications when educational sub-committees recommended new departures and experiments, for which Councils might—very likely would—refuse to sanction the necessary rate. As experiment is likely rather to increase than diminish in the endeavour to arrive at a truly rational code, such obstruction arising out of local economy would be calamitous.

(3.) It would tend to separate still further the conduct of primary and secondary education, which the recent decision in the Cockerton case must show how desirable it is to unite.

(4.) It would prevent women from assisting in educational administration. Women cannot sit as members of County Councils. This would be an inestimable loss. Not only have lady-members of the Boards rendered invaluable services in the past, but the proportion of women and girls employed in teaching increases year by year, and renders the presence of women on educational Boards indispensable. Take the following figures from the Board of Education Report, 1900-1901:—

	1869.	1900-1901.
Girl P.T.'s	7,273	23,779
Boy "	5,569	5,614

Whereas in 1869 women and girls together numbered not quite 53 per cent. of the total teachers, they now amount to over 75 per cent.

(5.) It would tend to obscure the highly specialised class of capacity demanded in educational administration. Among the qualifications in candidates for posts on local councils, that of education would be only too likely to be neglected. Surely it would be most disadvantageous, e.g., to the administration of the Poor Law, if it were taken out of the control of the Guardians and placed under that of a local council; and education, I submit, is at least as highly-specialised a department as that of the Poor Law.

(6.) It would tend to do away with a central department, and this, in the future interests of the subject, is perhaps the most serious objection of all; for what we need is the very reverse—a centre that shall ultimately administer our entire educational system—primary, secondary, public-school, and university.

Your correspondent speaks of decentralisation as a "clear gain." Now there is no doubt that we require to take into account the peculiar needs of certain localities. In some counties technical committees have already succeeded admirably in meeting the requirements of local industries, in some few cases they have even revived local industries that had lapsed, but surely this result could be obtained by the co-operation of local councils with the Boards without such a revolution in the system as the absorption of the Boards by the Councils.

Your correspondent speaks of the Boards as having been "the battle-ground of the sects." True; and I tried to show in my previous letter that the thirty years' war had been well fought. By creating an establishment potentially counter to sectarian influence, the cause of liberal thought has at least been afforded a hearing. As long as there are differences of opinion in religion, education will be among the areas immediately affected, and I fail to see how "sectarian bitterness" would be removed by changing the battle-ground from a Board to a Council.

And as to expenditure, money may have been "improvidently spent"—it is rather good to see England occasionally breaking an alabaster-box over the feet of humanity, and even from an economical standpoint the costliness of educational experiments is more likely to pay than some other forms of extravagance we are acquainted with—but it seems to me very clear that local councils would be likely to err in the other direction and cripple education by false economy.

Therefore, while by no means thinking we have yet attained or are already perfect, it would seem very plain indeed that the future of educational efficiency lies along the lines of the School Board system (witness Scotland and the United States), and that the absorption of this system by other and local bodies does constitute a "menace" from a "purely educational" point of view. So far as one can gather the intentions of the Government from the speeches of Ministers, from the terms of the abortive Bill of 1901, and from the single-clause Bill of last Session, it is such a prospect that is occupying the minds of our legislators, and I repeat that it is inconceivable to me why such proposals should be mooted except in other interests than those of education, pure and simple—interests which I attempted to indicate in my former letter.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. GEORGE VANCE SMITH, B.A., Ph.D., D.D.

Dr. Vance Smith died at his residence, Cranwells, Bowdon, on Friday, Feb. 28, after four weeks' illness, in the 86th year of his age. His eminence as a Biblical scholar, and as a member of the New Testament Revision Company, reflected honour upon the denomination with which he was connected. The present writer regrets that he can only give an imperfect outline of an interesting and varied career.

Gerge Vance Smith belonged to a Lincolnshire family, but was born at Portarlington, Ireland. He was early destined for the law, and was for a year or two after leaving school in a lawyer's office in Leeds. Always of a studious and inquiring character, he very soon discarded the traditional orthodoxy in which he was educated, and became a Unitarian. He had a strong predilection for the ministry, and was enabled, by the assistance of friends—chief among whom was the Rev. Charles Wicksteed—and of trust funds, to enter Manchester College, York, in the year 1836. Here he fell under the influence of the Rev. Charles Wellbeloved and the Rev. John Kenrick, with both of whom he was closely associated to the end of their lives. From the former he acquired his marked taste for Biblical study, and Mr. Wellbeloved's instructions laid the foundation of that extensive learning which bore such fruit in after years. His immediate class-mates were Arthur Lupton, of the well-known Leeds family, and John Atkinson Briggs, whose only daughter in after years was married to Dr. Vance Smith's fourth son. Philip Carpenter and W. H. Herford were his juniors by one year, and both accompanied him to Manchester when the College was removed to that town. Vance Smith took the degree of B.A. at London University in 1841, in the first division. His career at York was so distinguished that on the retirement of the Rev. William Hincks, F.L.S., from the Tutorship of Mathematics and Mental and Moral Philosophy, he was appointed Assistant Mathematical Tutor 1839–40, the last session of the College at York. After studying for one session at Manchester Vance Smith became minister of the Chapel-lane Chapel at Bradford from 1841–43, and afterwards at Macclesfield, at the old Presbyterian Chapel, chiefly supported by the Brocklehurst family, from 1843–46 He had now become known as a Biblical scholar by an admirable work on the Sacrifice of Christ, in reply to Dr. Pye-Smith's "Scripture Testimony to the Messiah," and in 1846 was appointed Professor of Theology and Hebrew and Syriac at his old College in succession to the Rev. John Gooch Robberds. This office he retained until 1857, accompanying the College on its removal to University Hall, London, in 1853. His further connection with the College may be briefly summarised by the following dates. Vice-Principal 1846–50, and Principal 1850–53. The latter part of Vance Smith's connection with the College was somewhat embittered by the painful controversy respecting the appointment of Dr. Martineau, over which one would now gladly draw a veil. There were some unfortunate misunderstandings between friends, which are now alluded to simply in order to state that they were long afterwards cleared up by frank and friendly explanations on both sides. While resident in London Vance Smith became a Trustee of Dr. Williams's Library, a post he held until his appointment to the ministry of the ancient St. Saviour-gate Chapel at York, where for some years he enjoyed the eminently congenial society of his former tutor, the Rev. John Kenrick. While he was at York the Biblical Revision question became prominent, and the two companies of revisers were appointed. Mainly through Dean Stanley's courageous advocacy it was agreed that a Unitarian should be placed on the New Testament Company. Mr. Kenrick, who was our foremost scholar, was compelled to decline on account of age and infirmity, and recommended Vance Smith, who was duly appointed, and was a constant and most regular atteudant at the meetings of the revisers from his distant home at York and afterwards at Carmarthen. The present writer has reason to know that he rendered very efficient service, sometimes sending round printed statements of the critical evidence for particular readings which he urged upon the attention of his colleagues with success. His connection with this work led to some valuable friendships, especially with Bishop Ellicott and other distinguished scholars.

On the suggestion of Dean Stanley the New Testament Revisers partook of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper together in one of the chapels of Westminster Abbey as a fitting inauguration of their great enterprise, and, with the express sanction of the Dean, Dr. Vance Smith also partook. This simple act of Christian fellowship, which not one of the Revisers objected to, gave rise to vehement denunciations on the part of the Church newspapers, aimed more, however, at the Dean than Dr. Vance Smith; and what was termed the "Westminster Scandal" has been characterised ever since, and even up to the last few weeks, as a profanation of the sacred mysteries. But Dr. Vance Smith was justified to his own conscience, and during his long connection with the Revision Company was treated with marked respect by all his colleagues.

From York Vance Smith removed in 1875, after a ministry there of seventeen years, to Sheffield, where he became minister of the Upper Chapel, in succession to the Rev. J. L. Short. A successful ministry here of only one year was interrupted by his appointment to the Principalship of the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, in 1876, a position which had special attractions for a man of his scholarly tastes and pursuits. As Mr. Jeremy in his "History of the Presbyterian Fund" writes, "the arrangements made between the Presbyterian Board and Dr. Vance Smith were such as to enable him to attend all the meetings of the Revision Company, which he did very regularly from Carmarthen College, which will thus be ever associated with the Revised Version—a distinction which belongs to no other college in Wales." Perhaps this was the happiest and most useful part of his professional life. The College was open to students of all denominations, the large majority of whom were Congregationalists. The Principal thoroughly appreciated the open constitution, which at Carmarthen is an established fact and not merely a theory. The students of many successive years greatly valued their Principal's sound and careful teaching which was quite free from dogmatic bias; he worked with uninterrupted harmony with his accomplished colleagues, and the Nonconformist churches generally in South Wales highly appreciated the honour of having so distinguished a man among them.

After completing twelve years' admirable work at Carmarthen, Dr. Vance Smith retired, to the great regret of the Governing Body and his colleagues, feeling the need of rest and a better winter climate than that of South Wales. He removed first to Bath, where he still engaged in scholarly work and in the publication of a revised and enlarged edition of his well-known work on "The Bible and Popular Theology."

Here he lost his first wife, a daughter of the late John Fletcher, of Liverpool. On his subsequent marriage at Bedford Chapel—the last marriage service in Mr. Stopford Brooke's old chapel—to Miss E. A. Todd, second daughter of the late Edward Todd, of Tadcaster, he removed to Cranwells, Bowdon, near Manchester, where he spent the remaining years of his life in lettered ease, varied by frequent journeys on the Continent.

Dr. Vance Smith lost three sons—one in infancy, one a young man of considerable promise who became a permanent invalid and died at Carmarthen; the other, the Rev. Philip Vance Smith, M.A., whose valuable career was closed at a comparatively early age. One daughter and one son survive, the latter the well-known minister of Stephen's Green, Dublin. The present writer offers, on behalf of a host of friends, a respectful tribute of sympathy to Mrs. Vance Smith, who will find consolation in the remembrance of a scholar's life abounding in good fruit.

In 1858 the University of Tübingen conferred upon Dr. Vance Smith the degree of Ph.D., and the University of Jena that of D.D. in 1873.

Dr. Vance Smith was member of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association from its early days, and in 1865 he preached the anniversary sermon on behalf of the Association, which was published under the title of "Providential Lessons in Christian Doctrine." His first work, published soon after leaving college, was, as I have said, an examination of Dr. Pye-Smith's "Doctrine of the Sacrifice of Christ." He was joint author, with the Revs. Charles Wellbeloved and John Scott Porter, of the Revised Translation of the Old Testament published in three volumes in 1859-62, his portion of the work being 1 and 2 Samuel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Lamentations. His other works, besides fugitive sermons and essays, were "The Spirit and the Word of Christ," "Revised Texts and Margins of the New Testament Affecting Theological Doctrine" (1881), "The Prophets and Their Interpreters" (1878), "Chapter on Job for Young Readers" (1887), "Some Modern Phases of the Atonement" (1894), "The Prophecies Relating to Nineveh and the Assyrians," and "The Bible and its Theology: A Review, Comparison, and Restatement, with special reference to certain Bampton Lectures and recent works on Atonement and Inspiration." This was first issued under a slightly different title in 1875 and went through several editions, a fifth edition, "revised and partly rewritten," having been issued only last year. The late Canon Liddon and other members of orthodox churches bore testimony to the candour and the devout spirit of the writer. To these may be added "Church Comprehension: A Letter to Mr. Gladstone," published anonymously in 1868, and advocating views which Dr. Vance Smith retained to the end of his life.

The funeral was on Tuesday at Hale, the service being conducted by the Rev. Dendy Agate, among those present being the Rev. G. Hamilton-Vance, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson (representing Manchester College), the Revs. P. M. Higginson, H. S. Tayler, W. Harrison, T. Robinson, T. B. Evans, J. Ruddle, C. Roper, W. E. George, G. A. Payne, Messrs. A. Nicholson, D. A. Little, E. Hadfield, and others.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A NEW BOOK.

I AM not quite sure that this column is really for the children, but I must leave you to find that out for yourselves. It is just to tell you about a new book; but whether the book is meant most for the children or for the elders, I cannot be quite sure. It is called "Fireside Fables,"* and there are more than a hundred of them, so that as it is a small book they are all quite short. Here are three of them.

The Water-Lily.

A water-lily lay open on the surface of a pond, and made the moon-beams pale with the pure brightness of her face, so that people passing stood to look. But the fish which swam beneath, and peered, as they thought, into everything, saw only the stalk that clung to the mud, and the shadows thrown down by the leaves.

Quack! Quack!

Some young ducks were swimming on a pond one night whilst a nightingale poured forth his song. For a time they listened, and then they shook their heads. "How much better we should understand him," said one, "if he would simply say, Quack! Quack!"—and with this the rest agreed.

Profit and Loss.

A girl and a boy went gleaning. The girl filled her hand, and then her apron, with the scattered ears; the boy spent his time in counting the sheaves. After this, they went to fill their pitchers at the spring. The girl caught the drops as they fell; the boy lost himself in looking for hollows ready-filled lower down. Next, they went to the orchard to gather fruit. The girl picked up the windfall on the ground; the boy threw stones at the one apple left on the tree. Then the night came.

Those, I think, are three of the best fables in the book. At any rate, they are good examples, for there are others more difficult to understand. You will be able to see from these whether you would like to have the book, and could enjoy reading the fables and thinking over their meaning. Only one of the fables is in verse; the elder children perhaps will understand it; and perhaps it would be better called a parable. It is about "Holly."

From arch of heaven high
A bird did downward fly;
Of silver was her wing,
And on her neck a ring
Of gold did lie.

By lake and winding shore
An olive leaf she bore,
And, where a young child played,
The tender leaf she laid
His feet before.

Then was he sad, for, lo,
A wreath therefrom did grow,
But now to thorn was bent,
As half for gladness meant,
And half for woe.

Yet would he not repine,
But did accept the sign:
Who heaven's peace would gain,
Some touch of earthly pain
Therewith must twine.

If you get the book you will see that after the 111 fables there are six which are rather longer and more of stories. The last is about little Miss Muffet's brother and you must look to see what lesson he learnt. And be sure to read Fable 36, about "Wishing and Hoping." The boy who idly wished got nothing, and got into trouble; the boy who hoped kept on steadily doing things, and his life was a success.

There are a good many difficult things in the book, but perhaps it is none the worse for that. And there are amusing things, too. Here is another of the fables to finish with:—

The Lady-Bird.

A young lady-bird coming home was asked by her mother whether she had had a nice walk.

"I met some very disagreeable people," was the answer.

"Who were they, and what did they do?"

"Mrs. Toad did not even turn her head when I passed."

"Does she ever turn her head?"

"Miss Mole pretended not to know me."

"Does she know anyone?"

"Mr. Hedgehog turned his back on me."

"Are you sure he was not asleep?"

"Hector, at the farm, barked when I went by."

"Is he not always barking?"

"Mr. Bull came charging down behind me. I suppose it was the sight of my red coat; but I thought it very rude."

"Was that all that happened?"

"No; I met Farmer Brown."

"Surely he was polite?"

"Far from it; he shut the gate in my face."

"I don't believe one of them even saw you," cried the young lady-bird's younger brother. And that was the simple truth.

IN matters of great concern, and which must be done, there is no surer argument of a weak mind than irresolution—to be undetermined when the case is plain and the necessity urgent. To be always intending to live a new life, but never find time to set about it—this is as if a man should put off eating and drinking and sleeping from one day to another, until he is starved and destroyed.—Tillotson.

LONDON, MARCH 8, 1902.

A BRAVE UTTERANCE.

WE are glad to be able to publish what we trust is a complete and accurate report of the address delivered last Sunday evening by Canon CREMER, the Vicar of Eccles, on "The Unitarian Movement." That some excitement should be caused by the Vicar's genuine liberality and courage in asking a Unitarian minister to take part in a series of Lenten Addresses, is perhaps not to be wondered at; but neither are we surprised that when difficulties arose, the Vicar determined to give the address himself, and to declare openly what he felt to be the truth as to the indebtedness of the Church to Unitarian teaching.

The excitement, so far as it went beyond a keen interest in such a subject, and warm appreciation of the vicar's liberality and courage, has perhaps been exaggerated, but we see that one imaginative reporter declares that while at the evening service, which preceded the address, the parish church was packed with a thousand people, two-thirds of them "withdrew as a protest," while the voluntary was being played, their places being subsequently taken by outsiders. The fact is that it has not been the custom for the majority of the evening congregation to remain for these special after-addresses, and on the two previous evenings, when Congregationalism and Methodism were dealt with, it showed an unusual interest that a third of the congregation remained, while last Sunday the proportion is judged to have been much greater. The report above quoted also announces that the senior curate has resigned, which, for the curate's sake, we hope is not true.

Canon CREMER's address we leave to speak for itself. It will be found full of interest, and we would call special attention to the brief section on the Doctrine of the Holy Spirit, as suggesting the point at which our thought is most likely to meet for the harmonising of very divergent conceptions of the "Divine nature" of JESUS. We ought, perhaps, also to note at once that while Canon CREMER refrains from criticising modern Unitarian developments of thought, he appears to be under a grave misapprehension as to the facts. That until lately Unitarians as a body have "mostly been willing to accept the Apostles' Creed," may be true (and not "until lately" only), so far as the sound Unitarianism of that creed is concerned; but it contains several supposed statements of fact, which neither past nor present Unitarians could accept. On the other hand, our alleged lapse "into virtual denial of the Divine nature of our Blessed Redeemer," which Canon CREMER seems to regard as "the extreme negative position of Socinians," we should interpret rather not as a denial, but as an enlargement of the conception of the Divine immanence not in JESUS only, but in growing measure in humanity as a whole.

With regard to the interpretation of formularies there is also something to be said, but for the present we prefer to leave the address with a final word of gratitude for its generous appreciation and the refreshment of its steadfastness of purpose and fearless love of truth.

IN ECCLES PARISH CHURCH.

THE VICAR ON "THE UNITARIAN MOVEMENT."

AT the close of the evening service in Eccles Parish Church last Sunday, the Vicar himself, the Rev. F. D. Cremer, M.A., gave the third of a series of Lenten addresses on "The Church of England and her Daughters: the special contribution of each section of the Christian Church to the common life of the whole." The subject of this third address, following those on the Congregational and Wesleyan Movements, was "The Unitarian Movement." Canon Cremer gave the address himself, as he explained, in deference to the wish of the Bishop, in place of the Rev. Alexander Gordon, Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, who had been announced to speak on that subject. There was a large congregation, and the following we believe to be a complete report of the Vicar's address.

THE VICAR'S ADDRESS.

The Christians in any place constitute the Church or Flock of Christ in that place, be it village, district, or nation. All Christians in all places constitute the Catholic or Universal Church. Any grouping of Christ's flock into folds, other than local, to meet differences of taste and conviction in points of Polity, Worship, and Doctrine is not primitive, and is regarded as a temporary expedient for convenience only. The separate organisations act as checks and counter-checks in the life of the Church. Each sees a part of the prism of truth, and we must always be on our guard lest such temporary organisation should cause what St. Paul calls schism—i.e., a breach of charity—and lead to a setting up of a claim: "We are Christ's Church; you are not, unless you follow along with us." And the Good Shepherd has some disciples who do not profess to call themselves Christians at all. They are obedient sons of the Father, but feel unable to become members of any branch of the Church of Christ. They do not yet recognise God's voice in His "Them, also, He must lead." The time will come when all who give up their will to do God's Will shall be "one Flock under one Shepherd."

Religious Movements in England.

The sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries witnessed, each of them, two great movements in the life of the Church of England, and each of the six movements unfortunately ended in a portion of the Church breaking away from established order and starting as a separate organisation. In the sixteenth century the subject of controversy was Church Polity. The Congregationalists and Romanists broke away in opposite directions; the former seeking more freedom, the latter fearing so much. In the seventeenth century the controversies were about Church worship. The Baptists and Quakers again represented two opposite views on the Sacraments; the one being champions of the letter, the other of the spirit. In the eighteenth century the struggle went deeper, it was about Church Doctrine or Teaching. Religion was very dead and formal. Again there were two movements. In an effort to escape formalism and win the masses of the people for Christ by appealing to their hearts, the Wesleyan movement arose. In an effort to satisfy the reason and keep the intellectual from unbelief, the Unitarians broke away.

The Evil of Enforced Orthodoxy.

Having lived in Russia, I know what the results are when every man's belief and religious worship are regulated by law, and dissent is criminal. It means that religion and morality are altogether divorced from one another in the minds of all thinking people. To be religious is one thing; to be honest, kind and good, quite another. It is no wonder, therefore, that I am more keenly alive than many to the healthy effect religious freedom has had on the real life of the Church in England, and that I am anxious not to forget the debt we owe to all these great religious movements.

Movements for Completer Life.

Each of them came into being to emphasise some great truth of God that seemed in danger of being neglected by the Church. That each in turn developed from a reforming movement within the Church into a separate organisation outside is to us, and to many of themselves, a matter of the keenest regret. But, after all, when children run away from home, the fault is very seldom all on one side. In spite of the faults of their founders (or of those who carried out a policy of separation contrary to the wishes of their founders) it has pleased God to grant very signal proofs of His favour and blessing to these, the Church's separated daughters. In the evangelisation of heathen at home and abroad and in witnessing for Christ in our midst they have played a noble part, as the pages of our history prove.

The Right Attitude Towards Dissent.

In her present treatment of them I hope that our Church is reaching a stage similar to that which our country has reached in her relations with the United States. So long as we treated the United States as a runaway and a rebel it gave back scorn for scorn, and flouted all suggestion of the ties of kindred, but, respectfully received into the comity of nations, it forgets past enmities, and shows many signs of recovering filial affection. How long is the Church of England to go on offering inter-communion to foreign branches of Christ's Church, Romanist or Greek, which receive our advances at best with coldness, sometimes with insult, while she neglects to cultivate the friendship of her natural allies who only ask for a respectful recognition of their separate life from their mother church before becoming like our colonies to the mother country—a source of happiness and strength to her that foreign churches will envy?

What the Church owes to Unitarians.

Everybody knows what the Church owes to John Wesley. Our debt to him is freely and gratefully acknowledged. Comparatively few know what the Church owes to such men as Channing and Martineau. As our bishop (to the very great disappointment of some of us, to the very great relief of others) did not approve of my having invited Principal Gordon to speak to us himself to-night, I must do my best to take his place and set forth the debt of our Church to the Unitarian movement. I will ask my hearers to bear in mind that I am not here to point out defects in the Unitarian creed, but to show what we owe to them.

The Foundation Truth of Divine Unity.

At the foundation of all our creeds and articles, as the very central truth of Revelation for Christian as well as Jew, stands the proclamation—God is One! There is nothing to compete with it. No subsequent revelation has ever modified or impaired it. It stands, as it has stood since the days of Abraham. "I believe in one God," so we begin our Creed. "There is but one living and true God," so we commence our Articles. There is not a word in the New Testament any more than in the Old, not a word of Christ or his apostles that throws the slightest doubt on this fundamental truth.

God Revealed in Christ.

The Word of God, by which He made the world, became flesh in Jesus, the Christ. The One God was in Christ, manifested Himself, revealed His mind and heart and will in the life and death, in the words and acts of Jesus Christ. The One God highly exalted him, raised him from the dead, set him at His right hand, appointed him the Judge of quick and dead. He is at God's right hand now, preparing for us, interceding for us. This is the Catholic faith; this is orthodoxy. In union with him, as one with him, "in his name," we approach God—the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. He hath opened heaven, made God accessible to all believers. This is the Catholic faith, this is orthodoxy.

No Subordinate Deity.

Christ is not a second inferior God, a sort of Demi-God. This Arian heresy, which almost captured the Church in the third century, is as distasteful to the instructed Unitarian as it is to ourselves, as Dr. Martineau has made plain. No! God, the One God, was in Christ. The Divine nature of Christ was the Divine nature of the One God. He was of the same essential nature ("substance" was the term in the old scholastic theology) with the Father—Very God and proceeding from Very God.

The Father's Good Purpose.

What is the orthodox faith about our Lord Jesus? What is the teaching of the Catholic Church? It is, that the sending of the Christ into the world, the Incarnation, was a spontaneous act of love on our Heavenly Father's part, in order to lift human nature into communion with Himself, and deliver, or redeem, or save us from the power, the slavery, the disease of sin. Christ showed us the only sort of sacrifice that is really acceptable to God. In vital union with him we offer ourselves. Pagan and Jewish notions about propitiation are past. He is our propitiation.

The Wholesome Unitarian Protest.

The Unitarian protest has helped to bring the Church back to primitive simplicity on such points. Why should we not express our obligation to them? Though I am, as I have said before this, neither Quaker nor Unitarian, yet there are times when I am glad to take refuge from the heated rhetoric of devout persons, be they Romanists, Anglicans, or Wesleyans, in the cool (too cool except for an occasional plunge with its refreshing reaction) pages of a Channing, or the practical yet spiritual atmosphere of the Society of Friends.

Doctrines in the Church governed by Scripture.

If there is anything perplexing in Creed or Article, the Church of England is careful to remind us that she never intends to go one jot or tittle beyond the very words of Scripture. "Whatever is not found therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man as necessary to salvation."—(Art. VII.)

The Doctrine of the Holy Spirit.

And just as we are to adore and approach the One God as revealed in the human life of Christ, just as we believe that in loving and obeying him we love and obey God, by identifying ourselves with him we become sons of our Father in Heaven, so we are taught by the Church about the Holy Spirit. We are to adore and obey the One God when revealed within us. The Holy Spirit is not a separate Being, as ignorant people sometimes argue from a misunderstanding of the word "Person" in the Athanasian Hymn. The Holy Spirit is God. The Divine voice within us is God's voice. It is God whom we grieve, if we grieve the In-dwelling Spirit. We acknowledge, as the old Canticle says, both Christ and the Holy Spirit as God and Lord, as Eternal and Almighty and Incomprehensible; but behind and beyond this truth lies the other that cannot be shaken: There are not three Gods, but one God.

Unitarian Protest against Perverse Doctrine.

When the Unitarian movement first arose, popular religion had greatly obscured these fundamental truths of our most holy faith. The language of the religious teachers of the day constantly represented the Almighty Father as a hard tyrant, and Christ as a gentle God, who found the only way to touch the heart of his Father and make Him show any mercy to His human children was to buy Him off by a tremendous sacrifice. This blasphemous obscuring of the Christian Revelation called itself the gospel! Those who protested against such a caricature of Christian truth were, by the ignorant, styled unbelievers. Popular theories about the verbal infallibility of Holy Scripture, about endless impenitence and torment, popular theories which pictured three Gods reigning together in Heaven on separate thrones, and dared to call this the Christian worship of the One God "in Trinity," seemed to have possession of church and chapel pulpits alike. The real human nature of our Saviour, who was "in all points tried and tempted like as we are," was ignored, and all the many texts which made it clear explained away. His human life became, under such treatment, an unreality, his example of no avail, his prayers a mockery. There was need, there was great and sore need, of a protest in the name of truth and reason against all this heresy styling itself orthodoxy, which was overlaying the gospel of Christ, and departing from the deposit of truth once delivered to the Saints.

The Protest Greatly Needed.

Now the Unitarian movement originated in this most necessary protest, a protest on the part of reverent philosophic thought against the caricaturing of truth by devout but ignorant and unbalanced minds, which could not distinguish a metaphor from a scientific statement, and were so stating or rather mis-stating the Church's doctrines as to make it impossible for the foremost minds of the age to accept them.

Further Denials of Unitarians not dealt with here.

This is not the right occasion for me to enter into the lapse of a great many Unitarians into virtual denial of the Divine nature of our Blessed Redeemer, into virtually teaching that he was no more than a good man. As a body they have, until lately, mostly been willing to accept the Apostles' Creed. My subject, I must repeat, is not the subsequent history of the Unitarian movement, but the debt of our Church to that movement—what we have gained by the protest it made. Undoubtedly it was not in vain. Much was learnt from it. The pity is that many, who are very far indeed from taking up the extreme negative position of Socinians, should yet rank themselves rather with the Unitarians than with the National Church.

The Stumbling-block of Popular Orthodoxy.

I cannot help thinking that this, in many cases, is due to an imperfect understanding of the difference between the self-styled orthodoxy of popular religion (as found in pulpit and hymn-book), and the real orthodoxy of the Church of England, which is ultimately founded on the actual words of Holy Scriptures as interpreted by sound learning.

The Interpretation of Formularies.

The Church cannot be constantly rewriting her formularies, so as to keep every phrase exactly up to date. Few, very few, would for a moment wish her to make the attempt. Her loyal sons know how to value her ancient documents and to use all the God-given modern knowledge at their disposal in the interpretation of such documents. When the present Bishop of Winchester was acting as private secretary to Archbishop Tait, he was once instructed to spend a fortnight in studying all the Secularist newspapers and pamphlets, and to report to his Grace thereon. His report was as follows: "They imagine that they are attacking and destroying Christianity. In reality they are, in most cases, but attacking the false teaching of popular religion." It is my conviction that many Unitarians, who have quite sincerely imagined that they were exposing the absurdities of Church doctrines, were in reality doing the Church good service. We read in the Epistle to the Hebrews of the "removal of things that are shaken, that the things that cannot be shaken may remain."

Frank Acknowledgment of Differences.

Where the Unitarians really understand the Church's position, and are honestly unable to agree to it, we part with them definitely though reluctantly, not in anger but in sorrow. In sorrow that such consistent, brave, faithful followers of our one Lord and Master, as most of them seem to be, should at present be shut out from what seems to us the blessed privilege of deeper insight into the meaning of the Incarnation.

No Anathema.

We know our Master's Spirit too well to anathematise them for holding what seems to us a very imperfect creed. We do not doubt that they will be accepted by Christ at the Judgment-seat, if they have believed in and followed him truly in spite of intellectual error. We dare not forget that our own fuller knowledge, if it prove to be so, will do nothing but increase our condemnation if we have cried "Lord, Lord!" and have not done the things he has commanded us.

UNITARIAN TEACHING.

"The Faith and Principles of Unitarian Christianity" is the subject of the sermon by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong in the March number of the new series of Sermons of the Day.* Last spring three addresses were given in Hope-street Church, Liverpool, on successive Sunday evenings, by members of the communities, on the Faith and Principles of the New Church, the Church of Humanity and Judaism respectively, and Mr. Armstrong's sermon followed these. Having briefly noted the difference between his own position and that of the Swedenborgian and the Positivist, Mr. Armstrong continued:—

The faith of the Unitarian Christian—at least as I entertain it—differs from that of the Jew—at least as stated to us last week—in an immeasurably less degree than that in which it differs from those other twain; differing from it, indeed, only so far as this, that the Unitarian Christian sees in Jesus of Nazareth the continuation and consummation of the line of the Hebrew Prophets. He is the crowning son of prophecy, whose vision of the Heavenly Father was the most luminous of all, whose word brings God home to us with supreme and unprecedented persuasiveness, whose life and spirit seem to us to illustrate with unequalled beauty and lucidity what it is to be a child of God and to live in communion with the Father.

He then expounded the principles of Unitarian Christianity, as including Freedom, Veracity, Fellowship, preference of Character to Creed and the Sacredness of Civic Duty, and proceeded to speak of the religious faith associated with those principles. In the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God he found the sum and substance both of religion and theology. How that great truth was brought to full realisation in Jesus was declared in the following passage:—

Jesus, the young prophet from Nazareth, as he wandered on the shores of the Galilean Lake or gathered the curious throng around him in the streets and squares of great Jerusalem, proclaimed it with a persistency, an iteration, a sureness and joyousness of faith, a concentration of purpose, a force and power of persuasiveness with which it had never been proclaimed before. He was of Hebrew blood. The old prophecies and psalms of his people were in his heart. He had first learnt from them how near the soul of man may climb to the soul of God, how the all-holy voice may sound in the chambers of the heart, how the eternal love may fold a man round about and steal into the secret places of his being. And then in his own manhood he brought this thing to a living experience, a practical working truth, knew and felt the communion of his humanity with God, as of a child with a tender father; and he set forth his report thereof by his word and life, so that the world has never since been able wholly to forget it. "What is Christianity?" asks the most illustrious scholar of our day, the German Harnack, in the last book given to the English public. And the answer rings out clear from his learned page: Christianity, the message of the Christ, is faith in the Fatherhood of God.

And at the conclusion of the sermon, having shown how all other doctrine was involved in that fundamental truth, Mr. Armstrong added a plea for courage and sincerity in those who did not find in other Churches teaching to which their conscience and understanding could respond:—

Finally, if you would have a working theology for life clear of all ecclesiastical subtleties and hair-splitting schemes of redemption, go, read the parable of the Prodigal Son. Make that the manual of your theology. Ask of any orthodoxy which the Churches or the preachers present to you, is it compatible with the conception of the relation of God to man which that incomparable utterance conveys, and let not any theological debatings draw you away from the simple beauty and completeness of that wonderful symbol of the love which the Heavenly Father bears to us every one.

In the notice of the late Miss C. A. Martineau last week there was a mistake in our reference to the memorial services. The deputation from the Morley Memorial College, together with Miss Cons and other friends, attended the service at Woking, on Monday, Feb. 24, conducted by the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, and not the Sunday morning service at Little Portland-street. On Sunday morning Miss Cons was present at the service at Clifton-place. Last Sunday the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed conducted a service of commemoration and thanksgiving at the Morley Memorial College.

BRAHMO SOMAJ SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sir,—Since placing before your readers the appeal from India on behalf of the Brahmo Somaj, I have received a copy of the New India, containing a leader on the subject, an extract from which I would ask you to kindly insert.

With very limited means at their disposal the School Management Committee is doing excellent work, but sore need is therein shown for a building amid surroundings where this work may be done more efficiently and under healthier conditions.

I hope friends will enable me to send to Calcutta substantial help towards the School-building Fund, which will also be a mark of friendship and recognition of the efforts being made by our co-religionists to promote female education there.

I beg to acknowledge the following donations:—Sir Rowland K. Wilson, £1; Mr. W. Albery, 5s.; Lieut.-Colonel Trevelyan, £1; Mrs. W. Nuttall, £1; Mrs. Gibson, £1 1s.; Miss I. Wyld, 10s.; Miss M. L. Bruce, £2 2s.

Extract from New India, Jan 27th, 1902.

THE BRAHMO GIRLS' SCHOOL.

One must have witnessed with mingled sense of pleasure and pain the ceremony of the distribution of prizes to the meritorious girls of the Brahmo Balika Sikshalaya, over which Sir John Woodburn presided on Friday before last.

This school is managed by a committee of the Brahmo Somaj, and is supported by private donations and subscriptions raised by it, supplemented by a handsome grant from the Government of Bengal. It is at present seriously handicapped from want of a house of its own.

A Building Fund has been started under the patronage of the Lieutenant-Governor, and 20,000 rupees (£1,350) has already been subscribed. We hope this amount will be raised to 50,000 rupees (£3,500) in the course of this year, and the foundations of a suitable school and boarding-house will be laid before Sir John Woodburn retires from Belvedere in March next year. The school is doing excellent work, and, judging by its results, it can hold its own in competition even with older institutions of its class in the metropolis. But as one saw the girls as they filed up to the platform to receive the prizes from the hands of Lady Woodburn, one was painfully impressed with their physical deterioration. Pale and haggard, without the natural flush and bloom of youth, the sight of the prize-winners was really pitiable. And one had simply to look about, and take a survey of the small school-compound, to discover the reason of this physical deterioration. It seemed to us to be slowly spelling the ruin of the community, and unless the intense intellectual and nervous stress and strain under which the girls are being brought up in this school be counteracted by sufficient physical exercise, taken in a freer atmosphere than what surrounds the present school-site, the school will surely undermine the health and vigour of the increasing number of young girls who are joining it year after year.

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

Sir,—The leader in your last issue intimates that a doubt has been expressed concerning the persons qualified to vote at the adjourned meeting on the 19th prox. Will you allow us, therefore, to state that as it will be a continuation of the meeting held on Feb. 26, it will be in the same way open to all donors and subscribers. The rules then adopted for the regulation of general meetings will not come into force until the whole constitution has been settled.

We hope that as many contributors as possible may make it convenient to attend.

J. Estlin Carpenter,
Chairman of Committee.
J. Cogan Conway, Hon. Sec.

THE CONFERENCE AND THE SUPERANNUATION FUND.

Sir,—The account of the meeting to inaugurate the Superannuation Fund must, I think, have filled many of your readers with a feeling of surprise and regret. Many of us have noticed with delight the widespread interest taken in the Fund by the churches as a Conference movement appealing to their common loyalty. There was a sense of largeness and union about it to which we have not been accustomed, and which was full of promise for the future. The sequel is little short of a bathos. A small meeting in London in no sense representative of all the interests concerned, held at a time when it was most unlikely that many people could attend, has undertaken the momentous duty of framing a constitution. About twenty people have succeeded in practically disfranchising the churches of the National Conference from the management of a Fund which was raised in its name. The large corporate idea which appealed to the imagination, and seemed to be awakening a new sense of unity and common responsibility among our scattered churches, has suddenly suffered an almost total eclipse.

A Committee appointed by the Conference has allowed the Fund to pass away into private management. The issue is a very serious one. As one who has subscribed to the Fund and done something to promote its interests because it came before us and appealed for help in the name of the Conference, I should like to ask on what grounds the members of the Conference were not summoned to settle its constitution. The interest aroused and the issues at stake were of sufficient importance to warrant a special meeting of the Conference, say, at Whitsuntide, instead of a small and unrepresentative meeting at what may fairly be called an off-time in London, which can claim in no sense to speak for the churches in whose name the Fund has been raised. In all other cases with which I am acquainted the society or corporation which appeals for support towards a particular object undertakes the responsibility of management instead of throwing it back upon the individual subscriber. The course that has been followed is, to say the least, a grave breach of usage. W. H. Drummond.

All Souls' Church, Belfast, March 3.

The Rev. Priestley Prime also writes to the same effect, in a letter of which we can only give the following passage:—

"The report of the meeting held in London is a surprise to me, as I think also to many others, both in its assumption of authority apart from the Conference, and in the remarkable action of excluding the Conference from any representation or influence in the management of the Fund it has created. The enfranchisement of such congregations as contribute to the Fund is simply the recognition of the right of subscribers; it is in no way a compromise, giving the Conference any representation.

"The Triennial Conference secures the attendance of delegates from all parts of Great Britain, while the meeting in London was manifestly a meeting of Londoners, with the addition of the officers who have so successfully established the Fund. The recommendations of these gentlemen, to whom we owe so much, have been seriously modified, not by a national or representative vote, but by that of a district. The results might have been different had the meeting been held in the Midlands. However, as a matter of principle, I should have thought it necessary that the arrangements should be ratified by the National Conference. It has done so well what it has taken in hand that it seems to me remarkably unwise and ungrateful to exclude it so pointedly from the work it has set in motion."

THE CONFERENCE AND THE CHURCHES.

Sir,—After the serious manner in which my friend Mr. Gow takes my use of the phrase "aide-de-camp," I do not know if I shall be allowed a few words on the material part of his criticism. Let me assure you, and your friend, that its meaning went no further than your own statement which introduced that gentleman's answer to the Newington Green letter. It was intended slightly to mark my preference for open correspondence; and, perhaps, I may confess to a feeling that somehow our response to the circular of the National Conference had not quite met with the Editor's approval. If so, you have had your own gentle and silent revenge for any failure on my part; we may, therefore, both smile and pass on.

Mr. Gow challenges my statement as to the decline of the Conference from its early catholicity. For answer, I would direct his attention to the Report of the Leicester Conference, pp. 132-142. He will there see that the first meeting was by special invitation open to Congregationalists and others; whilst, for some time past, none are (now) invited outside the roll of members carefully defined. He will next observe that the Conference has gradually undertaken work which is not consultative but regulative; and further that, whether by accident or design, it has been preparing for an organic ecclesiastical life which shall embrace all the variously named churches of the more or less strongly marked Unitarian type. I believe that the bulk of our people had no idea of this gradual change; but clearly Mr. Gow, the writer in the Seed Sower, and our unnamed critic, have all had these aims specially in view. But I am in doubt respecting one point Was this issue, now evolving before us, clearly placed before the individual churches? Were they asked to become parties to it? We all remember the scheme of the late venerable Dr. Martineau, which was clear and open enough, and was not favourably received. Confessedly this scheme has greatly influenced the later developments of the Conference; but have our churches been frankly admitted to the confidence of those who have had these aims in view? I am aware that we were invited to send delegates, but were they asked to bring (with them) the votes of the churches on the question of ecclesiasticising the Conference? I would not be offensive in these questions, but I am really anxious to be authoritatively told how the matter stands. I am sure of one thing: the delegates from Newington-green had no authority to commit us to any such scheme. After the thing was done we heard of the accomplished fact; and our letter was a response, partly to this, and partly to the late financial suggestions.

The grounds of our objection? Well, to begin with, we were not alive to the changes going on; and it was not pleasant to discover the new issues involved. Otherwise we think we cherish a somewhat different ideal of church alliances; and it is not that to which the Conference is tending. These different ideals are, as you know, not easily touched by argument; they depend on personal preferences which reflect the character and experience of those who hold them. Mr. Gow discovers irritation in the Newington-green letter and my own. I had hoped that nothing of the kind should appear—the feeling is deeper than irritation. There are those who cannot stand in free and unfettered friendly alliance without seeking to weave the bonds of exact treaties; and thus are not satisfied until kindred church units coalesce in a close federal community. I confess my strong dislike and distrust of all such federations. I have the greatest objection to being brought into line and kept there on pain of someone's displeasure. It is of no use to say that nothing of the kind is now intended. Of course not. Or do you suppose that our churches would not resent it? But these federations grow and consolidate, especially with paid officials and a local habitat; they always take on more power, and multiply their functions until the originally free constituents are compelled to maintain and drive an ecclesiastical machine. Other Unions, quite as liberal in origin as this Conference, have reached to a very effective control of men and churches; and there are not a few in the ranks of our ministry to-day who can read a very large meaning into the words I am now using. "But," say the objectors, "the British and Foreign, though it has shown no tendency that way, may become despotic. We, therefore, prefer a church which, because of its representative character, cannot become tyrannous." Cannot? Really! It is amazing that so much history should have been written to such little purpose.

Are we aiming at piety, religious forms, or show? I utterly fail to see how this peripatetic Conference can attain either of the two former ends. Its value as a free Conference is manifest enough, nor have my present remarks any bearing on this its original function. I can see that it may be important to give our greatest men a chance of reaching the public in our varied towns—though it is a somewhat costly form of propagandism, and will be still more so if the new financial scheme be adopted. Such a method—apart from the price—will be a stimulus to the minister and congregation of such and such a town; but is it expected that we shall by such means convert that town? The field-day will be soon over, the bill paid, and things go back to their old course.

Yes, I think I do see one other use to which this organisation, if it continue to exist, will be somewhat frequently put. It would not be like its kind if it did not sooner or later attempt to capture and exercise secular power for the furtherance of moral and religious ends. The organisation of public opinion so as to bear directly on the government of the day has become a common feature of modern federated church life. I venture to assert the utter immorality of this, and I believe this tendency is as disastrous as it is immoral. There might be some excuse for it had we no polling-booths and no protection by ballot; but to grasp at power for religious and moral objects is to repeat the mistakes of organised religion in Jewry and Christendom for the last twenty-eight centuries. How long shall we be before we learn that though the Lord is in His holy temple, His throne is in the heavens?

However, I will inflict no further Cassandrian warnings on your readers. You will acknowledge that I do not often trouble you or them.

William Wooding.

Sir,—As I strongly deprecate the novel practice, which I devoutly hope will not be generally adopted, of members of a committee discussing a matter in the Press while it is still pending before that committee, I will only ask space for a word of protest against the assumption which underlies the communications of Mr. Gow and of your anonymous "aide-de-camp," that the proposal for a paid Secretary to the Conference, and all that this involves, is the proposal of the Conference Committee.

It has never been discussed, or even formally and definitely proposed, although I admit that it slipped into a circular by accident. J. Cogan Conway.

Brooklands, Ringwood.

[We have been interested to read this protest of Mr. Conway's side by side with the anonymous letter which we declined to print without the writer's name, but on which the Christian Life of last week had compassion. We felt that the "unseemly" process to which that letter alluded would only be aggravated if we published it without making the writer wholly responsible under his own name.—Ed. Inq.]

COMMANDANT KRITZINGER.

Sir,—May I, as a humble "Inquirer," venture to ask why there should be any appeal to Lord Salisbury on the part of well-meaning philanthropical individuals in the Kritzinger case, and why you should have reprinted Mr. George Meredith's amazing letter without a word of censure or remark? Surely we may have full confidence in an excellent commander-in-chief, who has so often exercised the "quality of mercy," that the notorious Boer leader will not be executed if he is not found guilty of the crimes charged against him. If he should be (or has been) found guilty on satisfactory evidence (no doubt it will be carefully reviewed by Lord Kitchener) of those crimes which include several cold-blooded murders, may one ask further why he should not pay the penalty which would be meted out to him in every civilised state in which capital punishment is legal?

Robert B. Drummond.

Edinburgh, March 4.

[The answer is that the above-mentioned "well-meaning philanthropical individuals" are by no means confident that a military tribunal at the seat of war may not be misled into injustice, and if sentence is not stayed, an irrevocable wrong may be done; and further, that Mr. George Meredith's letter was printed because it was deemed worthy of attention.—Ed. Inq.]

The following letter, signed by a number of distinguished members of Oxford University, headed by the Master of Balliol, and including Dr. Fairbairn, Principal of Mansfield College, and Mr. Arthur Sidgwick, has been sent to the Times:—

We, the undersigned, cannot help viewing with the gravest apprehension the practice which seems to be gaining ground in South Africa of executing some of the Generals of the forces opposed to us upon the judgment of a court-martial. It may be true that these Generals have violated the laws of war, and we have no doubt that the courts-martial have acted in the full belief that by a few exemplary sentences they would deter Cape Colonists from rebellion, or protect natives, or secure strict adhesion on the part of our enemies to the laws of war. Nevertheless we plead that this policy may be reconsidered. Our opponents and those who sympathise with them will hardly believe in the competence or impartiality of an English court-martial, which decides upon evidence, some of it doubtless native evidence, given while the country is seething with the passions of war.

Such sentences cannot have the moral effect which is aimed at in the administration of punishment. It is only too probable that the men who suffer by them will be regarded as martyrs whose memory will be cherished for generations, and, so far as we can see, there is no immediate advantage which can weigh against the dishonourable imputations to which this course of policy will be almost sure to give rise. We therefore consider it very desirable that no capital sentence upon the Generals of the opposing forces should be inflicted at the present juncture.

Our Provincial Letter from Yorkshire, and a further letter from the Rev. J. J. Wright on the subject of Guilds, we are obliged to hold over until next week.

The Manchester District Sunday School Association will hold its annual meeting at Todmorden on Good Friday. The sermon will be preached by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, and the Rev. H. Rawlings, M.A., will read a paper entitled "Naughty Boys and Girls."

THE NEW FREE CHURCH AT WIDNES.

OPENING SERVICE AND PUBLIC MEETING.

The little iron church, erected by the Liverpool District Missionary Association in Victoria-square, Widnes, was opened on Sunday, Feb. 23, when the evening service was conducted by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, the Association's missionary, who preached, from the text Acts xxiv. 14, a sermon declaring the principles of the Free Church, and the teaching of Unitarianism, which separated them from the other churches of the town.

Early in last year Mr. Roberts gave some lectures in Widnes and Runcorn, followed by Sunday evening services which were held for some time in a room at the Conservative Club; but the congregation received peremptory notice to quit that building, and as no other suitable meeting-place was available (though they met a few times in a room at the Liberal Club) the Association decided to erect an iron building, which might be removed elsewhere if the time should come when it was no longer needed at Widnes.

There was a good attendance at the opening service, and again at the public meeting held on Thursday evening, Feb. 27, when a number of friends from neighbouring towns were also present.

The chair was taken by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, in the absence of Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., who was to have presided, and of the Rev. Dr. de Beaumont Klein, President of the Association. Among those supporting the chairman were the Revs. J. C. Hirst, J. Crossley, E. W. Lummis, A. L. Smith, and H. D. Roberts, Messrs. Charles W. James, J.P., A. S. Thew, Richard Robinson, T. Birchall, and B. P. Burroughs, Secretary of the Association, who announced letters of regret for absence from Sir John Brunner, Major Gossage, Mayor of the Borough, Messrs. F. H. Gossage, Holbrook Gaskell, W. Rathbone, W. B. Bowring, and Dr. Klein.

The Chairman, in his opening address, spoke of the principles which underlay their efforts for the cause of free religious worship. He spoke of the ejected two thousand of 1662, and what they suffered from the Act of Uniformity and subsequent persecuting acts; and then traced the progress of Nonconformist Churches after the Toleration Act, with the development in certain churches of theological freedom, on what some would call a down-grade movement, but which they felt to be on the up-grade. During the nineteenth century there was still a forward movement, and he thought he might say that amongst the Unitarians at the present day there was a growing faith in the living inspiration of the word of God. They believed that God was not silent; that He had not ceased to speak; that He still transmitted inspiration into the minds and hearts that were ready to receive Him; and, above all, they believed that He was a God strict indeed in His demand for righteousness, yet full of love to the children who were His creatures. They had sent Mr. Roberts to Widnes, and they had provided that humble and modest habitation, because they believed that everywhere throughout this English land where there were thoughtful men and women there was a longing for a freer faith, and for a God more like the God whom Jesus Christ described in the wonderful Sermon on the Mount, the parable of the Prodigal Son, and the other undying utterances which had come down to them from his consecrated lips. They believed there was a longing for a real vital religion together with perfect intellectual freedom. They asked all at the outset of that movement who in their consciences believed that that was a right movement, and felt that they could not honestly conform to the orthodox forms of faith, to gather there with Mr. Roberts to encourage, help, and strengthen him by their presence and support.

The Rev E. W. LUMMIS offered greeting to them from the sister church in Warrington, and congratulated Mr. Roberts on that visible symbol of the beginning of a work in Widnes which he hoped would be successful. That church was erected on the principle of surrendering to truth, whatever truth might turn out to be. They would found that church not on creed, but deep on the abiding facts of human nature, upon their sense of right, that sense which they all had, upon their sense of human brotherhood, and upon the spirit in man whereby he called God Father.

Mr. ARTHUR THEW, of Southport, and Mr. T. BIRCHALL, of Warrington, added their good wishes.

The Rev. J. C. HIRST, of Gateacre, exhorted them to moral courage to stand by the work, and by the faithfulness of their lives to conquer any prejudice they might have to face.

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES dwelt upon worship as the great object for which they must come together in the church. It must not be simply to listen to a sermon.

The Rev. H. D. ROBERTS announced the continuance of the regular Sunday services, and four Thursday evening lectures on the various views of authority in religion, at which discussion was earnestly invited. To the Sunday services he urged them to come, not because of any eloquence they might hear, but because of the persuasion of the truth.

After the singing of a hymn, the meeting was brought to a close.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

THE annual meeting of this Society was held at Essex Hall on Saturday, March 1. About ninety guests, representing many of the Sunday-schools affiliated to the Society, were received from 6 to 7 P.M. by the President, Mr. Howard Young, LL.B., and members of the Committee, during which time tea and coffee were served.

Among those present were the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, H. Woods Perris, F. Allen, W. Chynoweth Pope, W. Wilson, Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, Mrs. Howard Young, Mrs. Tarrant, Mrs. Pope, Miss Marian Pritchard, Misses A. J. Lawrence, and C. A. Lawrence,

The chair was taken by Mr. HOWARD YOUNG punctually at 7 P.M., and the proceedings having been opened by the singing of a hymn, the business of reading the various reports was at once commenced.

Mr. ION PRITCHARD, the hon. treasurer, presented the general account of the Society, and also the account relating to the Southend Home; the former showing a satisfactory balance of £3 16s. 7d. to the good, and the latter a deficit of £10 9s. 4d., which the hon. reasurer explained would be more than tmet by a subscription due from a generous donor to the funds, who was at present abroad.

Mr. A. BARNES, the hon. secretary, then read the Committee's report of the work done during the past year in which was embodied a cheerful and encouraging report prepared by Mr. F. Talbot (Highgate), on the subject of School Visiting, which branch of the Society's work he had undertaken at the Committee's request. With regard to the three heads—(1) efficient teaching, (2) punctuality and good discipline, (3) the relations between teachers and children—Mr. Talbot stated the reports of the visits paid to the schools by the members of the Committee bore eminently satisfactory testimony.

The need for more teachers, to which the Committee have previously drawn attention, was again referred, and was dealt with by the Chairman, to which reference will be made later.

Miss A. J. LAWRENCE then read the account of receipts and expenditure in connection with the Country Holiday Movement, for which she has for several years acted as hon. treasurer, and drew attention to the fact, that owing mainly to the largely increased number of children sent away for a fortnight's holiday in the country last summer—namely, 475, or 122 more than in the previous year—there was a balance on the wrong side of the account of £31 8s. 6d. instead of a balance to the good as usual.

In the absence of Miss E. J. Toye, the General Secretary to this Movement, who was kept away by duties at the Limehouse (Durning Hall) Mission, Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD read her report, giving in detail the number of children sent from each school, and also the number sent to each of the places where Country Homes had been secured. The largest numbers were 118, 79, and 77 sent to Maldon, Coggeshall and Bracknell respectively, but a good many went to Faversham, Rochford, Weybridge, Brighton, and Goring. Those who were sent to Brighton appear to have been charmed with their experience of the seaside, and long naturally to go again.

The PRESIDENT read a short report written by Mr. G. W. Oldland, the local hon. secretary of the Southend Home, showing that ninety teachers and others had, during 1901, taken advantage of Mrs. Bayle Bernard's gift to the Society.

The President drew attention to the revised Circular recently issued by the Committee about this seaside home, and expressed a desire that the advantages offered by it should be made known as widely as possible with a view to its being made use of not only during the three summer months but at other seasons of the year by persons connected with our schools or congregations who may be in need of rest and change.

On the motion of the PRESIDENT, seconded by the Rev. F. ALLEN, the reports were adopted. The Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope was elected President for the ensuing year, and the other officers and committee were also elected, Mr. Ion Pritchard and Alex. Barnes continuing as hon. treasurer and secretary respectively.

Three papers on the subject of "Methods of Class Teaching" were then read by Miss AMY SUDBERY (Wood Green), Mr. A. H. BIGGS (Wandsworth), and Mr. ION PRITCHARD, the last named having at short notice taken the place of one who had been unable to be present to take part.

The three papers were all excellent in their way, but did not lead to much discussion. The Rev. H. W. Perris, the chairman, and Miss Marian Pritchard spoke.

The CHAIRMAN made use of the following quotation:—"In speaking of Sunday-school work, I believe in my heart that there is not a happier or nobler occupation in the world than that of developing the minds that are to work in the next generation," and suggested the advisability of congregations having for their own sake some definite work connected with it.

A very interesting and successful meeting was brought to a close shortly after 9 P.M. by a hearty vote of thanks to the President for his services during the year and on that occasion.

The hon. secretary, referring to the musical Festival to be held on Saturday, April 26, announced that six schools had already entered choirs for the competition, and two more had that evening promised to do so.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The fifth anniversary services of the Unitarian congregation were held on Sunday last. The Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A., of Norwich, preached in the morning and evening. In the afternoon a musical service was held, at which the services of the Dunkinfield Old Chapel choir and local musicians were given. At the afternoon and evening services the building was crowded. Collections realised over £18.

Bury.—The distribution of prizes and medals to scholars of the Sunday-school took place in Bank-street Chapel on Sunday, Jan. 26, Mrs. J. Dearden making the presentations. First-class prizes (no late or absent marks) were gained by forty-three girls and fifty-six boys. Gold medals, for ten years' unbroken punctuality, were awarded to one girl and five boys; silver medals, for five years, to two girls and five boys.

Chatham.—On Wednesday week a successful Sale of Work was held, for the benefit of the Choral Society, the arrangements being carried out by the Ladies' Working Society. A programme of vocal and instrumental music was also provided.

Chester.—The winter meeting of the South Cheshire and District Association, on Wednesday, Feb. 26, is reported elsewhere. On the same evening the members of the Social Union met in the schoolroom and enjoyed a pleasant and amusing lecture, by the Rev. A. E. Parry, of Liscard, entitled "A Dish of Humour." On Sunday, the 23rd ult., the special collections taken on behalf of the Liverpool District Missionary Association amounted to £2 16s. 10d.

Derby.—A social evening, arranged by the members of the Friar-gate Chapel Guild, was held in the schools on Wednesday, Feb. 26, and was largely attended and very successful in every way. The Rev. John Birks, F.G.S., presided, and during the evening gave an address on the guild and its aim, which was, he said, to foster the religious life and inspire personal service, particularly among the young people of from sixteen to twenty-one years of age, thus carrying forward the work of the Sunday-school, and connecting it with the church. Mr. S. D. Hall, hon. secretary of the guild, proposed a vote of thanks to all who had taken part in bringing about that delightful meeting, and added a few earnest words on the importance of the work of the guild, to which Mr. J. Larratt responded in appropriate terms. A musical programme added to the enjoyment of the evening. Refreshments were provided and well served by the young members of the guild, and the meeting closed with a verse of the National Anthem.

Dundee.—The thirty-sixth anniversary of the Unitarian Church was celebrated by a social meeting of the congregation in the church hall, on the evening of Feb. 21. The Rev. H. Williamson, who presided, called attention to the fair amount of success which had attended the effort to establish a congregation upon Unitarian principles in the city. Mr. J. K. Wood, treasurer of the church, made special reference to the lengthened service which Mr. Williamson had rendered to the congregation, and to his activity with regard to the public movements of the city, in which he had the approval and goodwill of his people, and added that it had occurred to them to mark that occasion by presenting Mr. Williamson with some token of their regard and respect. He then handed over to the minister a handsome pulpit chair made of oak, and Mrs. Millar also asked Miss Williamson to accept a dressing-case. Mr. Williamson, in responding, assured them it would be his constant endeavour to give the cause they had at heart his best services.

Gateshead.—On Sunday evening, Feb. 23, the second of a series of lantern services was given by the Rev. Arthur Harvie, the subject being "The Religious Significance of the Pictures of G. F. Watts, R.A." The service was much appreciated by a large congregation. The slides used were excellent. Portraits of the composers of the hymns sung, which included Dr. Martineau, were thrown upon the screen. The adoption of this kind of service occasionally has fully justified the committee's expectations.

Liverpool.—The annual meeting of the Liverpool Postal Mission was held in the new room at Ullet-road Church, on Saturday afternoon, March 1, when, on the invitation of Mrs. and Miss Holt, more than 100 friends and subscribers met for tea and business, the Rev. Dr. de Beaumont Klein occupying the chair. The report of the year's work shows a steady increase in the number of new applications for literature, as well as a good number of steady readers among the old correspondents. The Birkenhead branch, which is managed by Miss F. E. Cooke, is also doing good work, its field of labour being to a large extent in India and Burmah, where in seven different places little companies of students meet together to discuss the books which are sent out to them, and Postal Mission pamphlets circulate among them. A convert in Burmah has bought several books, with which he has established the nucleus of a lending library. The balance-sheet shows that the work has a tendency to increase more rapidly than the funds, and an appeal was made for more subscriptions to keep pace with its constantly-growing needs. The Rev. E. W. Lummis made some interesting statements as to Postal Mission work in Yorkshire and elsewhere, and spoke encouragingly of the good such work is doing in a quiet way. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong referred to the movement in Denmark, which has been helped during the year by both the Liverpool and Manchester branches of the Postal Mission. The Revs. H. W. Hawkes, H. D. Roberts, and W. J. Jupp also spoke, and the meeting terminated with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

Oxford : Charles-street Institute.—The annual meeting was held on Feb. 3 ; Dr. Drummond in the chair. The report for 1901 was read, and showed that good steady work had been done during the year. The meeting was a sympathetic one, and cheering words were spoken by several of the subscribers. All were at one in feeling that better accommodation was needed for the extending and carrying on of the work which is waiting to be done in St. Ebbe's. Evening services during term time were kindly conducted gratuitously by several of the Manchester College students, and they were continued in the vacations as long as funds would allow. The Sunday-school has much improved, and has an average attendance of fifty. The "Mothers' Meeting" has twenty members. In connection with this meeting there is a Savings' Bank, and also a Coal Club. The "Provident Bank" has thirty-two depositors. The attendance at the physical drill class has to be limited for want of room, and other classes suffer from the same cause, and also for want of workers. Since the annual meeting two gentlemen have come forward with offers of help, and it is hoped that during the present year our work and influence in St. Ebbe's may be largely increased, but more pecuniary and personal help are absolutely necessary for the bringing about of this result. The treasurer's account, with a total of £59 13s. 5d., showed that the year which opened with a deficit of £4 9s. 1½d., closed with a credit balance of £8 12s. 9½d., for which the proceeds of a Rummage Sale, £8 16s. 10d. seem to be accountable.

Rawtenstall.—A congregational meeting was held on Sunday evening last to consider the advisability of securing the services of a suitable minister to take charge of the church. The congregation resolved unanimously empowering the Executive Committee to take immediate steps to attain the above object.

Rotherham.—On Wednesday, Feb. 26, the annual meeting of the Church of Our Father was held, the Rev. W. Stephens presiding. The reports having been adopted and the usual business transacted, a resolution was passed unanimously inviting the Rev. W. Blazeby, B.A., to write a short history of the chapel for the approaching bi-centenary in 1906. The number of members on the church roll for 1901 is 110. Messrs. Gibbs and Hockton, architects, of Sheffield, estimate the cost of renovation and alterations to Sunday-school to be £800. A vote of thanks to the Chairman, hymn and benediction, brought the meeting to a close.

South Cheshire and District Association.—The winter meeting of this association took place at Matthew Henry's Chapel, Chester, on Wednesday, Feb. 26, and was attended by a goodly number of delegates and friends from Crewe, Nantwich, Shrewsbury, and Chester. Amongst those present were the Revs. J. K. Montgomery, E. A. Maley, R. S. Redfern, J. C. Street, and H. E. Haycock. The proceedings opened in the chapel with an uplifting religious service, conducted by the Rev. R. S. Redfern, whose sermon, based on Ephes. ii. 21, was a powerful plea for the recognition that in the work of the Christian Church adjustment of means to ends is of first necessity. In conclusion, the preacher urged the claims of the Sunday-schools to the help and sympathy of the congregations as being an important part of the work of the Christian Church. At the close of the service tea was served in the schoolroom, followed by the business meeting, the President, Mr. R. Mansell, in the chair. The question of rendering help to Longton was again considered and referred to the Executive Committee for further consideration and report. It was decided that, if practicable, the annual meeting take place at Crewe in May. The report of the sub-committee appointed to draw up a set of rules for the association was then considered, and after a lengthy discussion it was modified, adopted, and ordered to be printed and circulated before being submitted to the annual meeting for confirmation. A cordial vote of thanks was given to the Rev. R. S. Redfern for his services as preacher, the Rev. J. C. Street remarking that he had been drawn to the meeting almost solely by the desire to hear Mr. Redfern's sermon, and he had been most amply rewarded, for seldom had he heard a discourse on such an occasion that was at once so appropriate and so lofty in tone. The Chairman was thanked for presiding, and a very pleasant and profitable meeting was brought to a close.

Stand.—The annual congregational soirée was held on Wednesday evening, Feb. 26. The Rev. R. Travers Herford, the minister, presided over a large assembly, and in his opening address referred with satisfaction to the numerous activities in connection with the chapel, and to his attachment to his work among the congregation. An admirable programme of music was rendered by the "Lyric Operatic Party" from Bury, under the leadership of Mr. T. Hamer, the choirmaster of the chapel. The selections from the operas were varied, including many favourite airs, and consisting of solos, duets, and choruses, all of which gave great satisfaction.

Warrington.—The annual sermons were preac'ed in Cairo-street Chapel on Sunday, Feb. 23, by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, of Hope-street Church, Liverpool, and on the following evening the annual congregational tea was held in the schoolroom. About 200 sat down to tea, which was followed by vigorous speeches and pleasant music. The chair was taken by Mr. J. R. Young, and the first speaker was the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, who said that there was a great similarity in the character of the congregations, but there were also very marked differences, and he did not think he had seen a single congregational assembly in connection with their churches with so large a proportion of young men and young women—especially of young men. They should try to gather in the young men of Warrington and to enlist their services in a beautiful and enduring work. He expressed his pleasure at the reverent manner in which the choir took part in the worship, and urged that parents should train their children in the habit of attendance at public worship. He pleaded that they should allow their minister leisure for the exercise of his best gifts, and concluded with congratulations and good wishes to the congregation. Mr. Hill, the Superintendent, spoke on behalf of the Sunday-school, and Mr. F. Monks warmly endorsed what Mr. Armstrong had said as to their securing to their minister due leisure for preparation. He also referred to a recent correspondence in the local papers, in which he was thankful that their minister had not retorted in the spirit in which some of their critics had written, and claimed for Unitarians respect and courteous treatment from members of other bodies. Mr. T. Birchall touched upon the subject of Sunday absentees, and uttered a warning against lazy habits. The Rev. E. W. Lummis expressed his great thankfulness for all his experiences during the year—which was now nearly completed—he had been connected with them. He felt greatly indebted to his predecessors for what they had bequeathed to him. In conclusion, he said he should do his utmost to improve at all points as a minister. They were fighting for truth's sake, whatever truth might turn out to be, at the sacrifice of their own personal predilections for this or that formula or form of truth, until the whole world became one Church, sharing the same opinions, and all members of one brotherhood earnestly striving to discover and to obey the will of God. The speeches were interspersed with music, and concluded with hearty votes of thanks.

West Bromwich (Appointment).—The Rev. Ellison A. Voysey, B.A., of Burnley, has been unanimously invited to succeed the Rev. F. A. Homer as pastor of this church, and will commence his duties on the 16th inst.

WOOD GREEN UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

BUILDING FUND.

Notwithstanding the most strenuous efforts of the Congregation, there remained at the close of 1901 a debt of £298 on the new Church, in addition to the £1,000 borrowed from "The Permanent Chapel Building Fund." And as the repayment of this must commence next year, it is most important that the present debt should be cleared off. To encourage this, the London District Unitarian Society has promised, in addition to its previous contribution, a further £25 if the balance is raised by the end of the present month. The congregation, which has already raised £668, will give another £50. Various other kind friends have contributed £167, which with the £25 from the London District Society, leaves £106 still wanting.

Towards this sum subscriptions are invited, and will be thankfully acknowledged by

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE shareholders of THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, at a meeting held on Monday afternoon, confirmed by a large majority the decision of the Directors to terminate the engagement of their present Editor. The votes, which included a considerable number of proxies, were 82 against 31. At the end of June the Rev. V. D. Davis will therefore relinquish the editorship, which he will then have held for four and a half years.

THE Jowett Lectures for the present year, at the Passmore Edwards Settlement, Tavistock-place, have been given, as already noted, by the Rev. W. Addis, M.A., of Manchester College, Oxford, the subject of the course of seven lectures being "The Hebrew Scriptures in the New Testament and in the Christian Church." The concluding lecture on Friday week was on "The Old Testament in the Patristic and Mediæval Church. The value of the Old Testament to-day." Mr. Addis described how the Church's struggle with the Gnostics had hastened the formation of the New Testament Canon, while the Hebrew Bible as a whole was accepted as divinely inspired. In thus retaining the Old Testament the Church had, what the Gnostics had not, the sense of development in religion; but Catholic writers made the mistake of thinking they must find the whole of Christian truth in the Old Testament, which could only be done by a very forced system of allegorical interpretation. That was the accepted method throughout the Middle Ages; it survived even to the present day in edifying books, though among scholars it was extinct.

As a striking exception to the rule of allegorical interpretation in the early days of the Church, Mr. Addis mentioned the famous school of Antioch, which was not ashamed to apply common sense to the interpretation of the Old Testament. Theodore of Mopsuestia, at the end of the fourth and early in the fifth century, was the most notable representative of that school, the interpreter par excellence, known as "the teacher of the whole Church." His commentary on the Minor Prophets was still extant, and that on the Psalms. He refused to see anything more in Canticles than a collection of love poems, and declared that Psalm xlv. was an epithalamium to celebrate Solomon's marriage with an Egyptian princess. He insisted on the need of study to arrive at the real meaning of a writer, and declared that no passage could have more than one meaning. He poured scorn on the old wives' tales of the allegorists. Such common-places of modern scholarship were remarkable in his day, running directly counter to the received methods, and the Church at large was shocked, especially as Theodore was in bad repute as the teacher of Nestorius. It was a significant remark of Cardinal Newman's that the mystical (allegorical) interpretation of Scripture and Orthodoxy would stand or fall together. Mr. Addis then gave some instances of the extraordinary interpretations of later Fathers, and noted that the Reformers were greatly indebted to the Rabbinical commentators, who were far superior to the Christian, and were thus able to make what advance they did in sound interpretation.

SPEAKING in the latter part of his lecture of the present value of the Old Testament, Mr. Addis said that as literature its limitations were obvious. It was but a part of Hebrew literature, a compilation by scribes who cared for nothing but what was religious. Yet they saw that the Hebrews had true lyric power, and the "Song of Songs" had been preserved to us by the fortunate chance of misinterpretation. The Semitic mind could never produce a great whole, and thus it had no drama. In ancient times the Hebrew mind produced no philosophy, the language itself was unfit for abstract thought. Thus the Old Testament had no philosophy of history. And there was scarcely a trace of humour; bitter sarcasm there was, but that was not humour. The Hebrew lived in the concrete, and was incapable of long sentences; but his language was admirable for narrative, and there were no stories in literature to compare with those of the Old Testament—Abraham about to sacrifice his son, the story of Joseph, and of David and Absalom; and while there was nothing in Hebrew like the great speeches of Demosthenes and Cicero, there was very noble eloquence in Isaiah The religious value of the Old Testament was in its record of progressive life leading up to the perfect revelation in Christ. The early Hebrews were not even Monotheists, and in Exodus iv. a religion was encountered no better than heathenism at one of its lowest stages. Other religions also had come to an intellectual apprehension of the Divine Unity. The Hebrew prophets made the great advance when they realised that righteousness belonged to their God, and the moral ideal became an essential part of religion.

THE obituary notices of Dr. S. R. Gardiner, the historian of the early Stuarts and the Commonwealth, who died on Feb. 23, in his seventy-third year, noted the fact that through a good part of his life he was obliged to support himself by teaching and the writing of text-books, and other remunerative literary work, to the hindrance of the progress of his great History, which was to have been brought down at least to the death of Cromwell, and of which the concluding volume was not completed. But a writer in last week's Athenæum, a personal friend of Dr. Gardiner's, and a worker in the same historical field, takes a different view of the matter. Thus he says:—

> On one point I am sure some of your contemporaries are mistaken, namely, in implying that it was a drudgery and uncongenial to him to have to teach as well as write history, owing to the lack of affluent circumstances. Others have hinted that it was only res augustæ that made him accept publishers' proposals to produce a "Students' History of England," or an "Historical School Atlas." I can only say that I have heard from his own lips, on more than one occasion, statements as to the great pleasure that it gave him to talk as well as to write on historical subjects. He believed that he owed his health and power of achieving so much writing to this change of occupation. As to the short general history, his most genuine and unaffected interest in modern school education led him to take exceptional pleasure in its production, and he did not hesitate in his own simple way to show real gladness when he heard of it being used or appreciated.

The amount of work accomplished by Dr. Gardiner was truly astonishing. Born in March, 1829, he was educated at Winchester and Christ Church, Oxford, where he was elected to a studentship; but in 1853 he resigned and withdrew from Oxford, having joined the Catholic Apostolic (Irvingite) Church. (His first wife was Edward Irving's youngest daughter.) He settled in London, and at once took up his great historical work, the first two volumes of which appeared in 1863. Ten volumes covered the ground up to 1642, the last two appearing in 1881. The earlier volumes had very little sale, but in 1883 a new and cheaper edition in ten volumes was issued. At that time, Dr. Gardiner was Professor of History at King's College, and also an Extension lecturer for the London Society, and Oxford had again recognised his worth. Six more volumes, covering the Civil War and Commonwealth period, he lived to complete. In 1894 he refused the Regius Professorship of History at Oxford that he might reserve his whole strength for his own special work; but the history after 1656 up to Cromwell's death remained unwritten. From 1890 to 1901, Dr. Gardiner was editor of the English Historical Review, and amid all his other work he edited a large number of volumes of historical documents. He wrote the section on his own period in the article "England" in the Ninth Edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, and was a large contributor to the "Dictionary of National Biography."

GUILDS.*

SIR,—Now that we have Mr. Anderton's uncondensed opinion upon Guilds it turns out that it is not Guilds in themselves, but a certain "type" of Guild, that he objects to, and he has been good enough, in his frank letter, to let us see what this objectionable "type" is. He writes:—"Deliberately to hold meetings for public self-examination in religious sentiment is not conducive to the best interests of religion." This is the "type" of Guild he condemns. He further describes the "type" as the kind of Guild which induces young people to come together in order "to be seeing continually what is going on inside them—in public."

Now, will Mr. Anderton tell me where there is such a Guild amongst us? The Guild that I know most about is certainly not of such a "type." The above sentences are not only a misdescription of any Guild I know—they are worse than a caricature. They have, in fact, no relation to reality! I have a fair knowledge of Guilds, yet, so far as I know, there is not one single Guild amongst us which answers to Mr. Anderton's imaginary case. I have just looked again through "The Guilds' Union Year Book," in which the aims and methods of most of our Guilds are given, and I cannot find one which, in any way, answers to the imagined "type." So far as I can see, the foregoing is the only real difference between Mr. Anderton and myself. Of course, I did not say in my letter that "there can be no possibility of priggishness or cant," but what I did say was that "it goes without saying that cant and hypocrisy are to be discouraged both in old and young." Nor did I "seem to think" that the "unadulterated sincerity of young people in religious matters is spoiled by association with their elders in worship." What I did say was that "the root of all religion is sincerity, and I have found no souls so unadulteratedly sincere as young people unspoiled by elders in matters of faith," i.e., when elders, as one thought it would be obvious, have not artificially forced their spiritual experiences and dogmatic interpretations into the virgin souls and minds of young people. Nor, of course, did I, who was contending for the rights of young people, ever dream so absurd a thing as to "deny to young people the right of having a trained religious leader of their own." I distinctly put it thus:—"Needless to say, it does not mean that young people are going to have less—they will rather seek more—of our religious guidance when they are more spontaneously and personally concerned in spiritual things."

May I just remark, in passing, that Mr. Anderton is wrong in his guesses as to the cause of my own earlier prejudice against Guilds? Other influences, exciting natural prejudices against Guilds, were in operation at the time I refer to—say twenty years ago. I was already in the ministry as he is. Similar influences have excited prejudices in sincere men and women against churches and religion, but Mr. Anderton is an active believer in churches and religion.

Now, Sir, I am happy to find that if he can once see that the "type" of Guild he abominates has actually no existence except in his imagination, I can claim Mr. Anderton as really a friend of the "Guild Idea." As he himself says, "In fact, perhaps, I am as favourably disposed towards the 'Guild Idea' in the abstract as Mr. Wright himself." But he is, unconsciously it may be, more than that; he is in favour of a Guild in the concrete. He himself gives an admirable definition of the need for, and operation of, a Guild when he says, "Intellectually young people need help in their difficulties. Spiritually they need fellowship, as we all do." Exactly! No one could more precisely describe than Mr. Anderton here does what our actual Guilds aim to do. As Mr. Anderton again truly says, "Young people need .... to have positive religious influences brought to bear upon them." Why, of course! And this very aim and these very methods which Mr. Anderton desiderates are, I assure him, no other than the "Guild Idea" in our actual Guilds. The things he condemns have no existence; the things he earnestly advocates are just the things we have at work in our present societies. Quite handsomely Mr. Anderton last week admitted his unacquaintance with Guilds as they are; may I not venture to ask him to believe some of us who have an actual knowledge of Guilds, when I tell him that they really are, or try to be, what he says such societies ought to be.

Nay, further, "With the idea of young people's societies to unify and co-ordinate the various activities of the young people of our congregations, I am fully in sympathy." So writes Mr. Anderton, and this is precisely what our actual Guilds do. If anyone will turn to the "Year Book" he will see at a glance that this is so. Let me quote a brief description of the Guild I know best. It has eighty-six active members, ranging mainly from sixteen to thirty years of age, with some older still. Its various committees manage a band of hope, a gymnasium, a literary society, a singing class, a library, a reading-room, entertainments, &c. Members promote lantern lectures, provide flowers for the chapel, and take them afterwards to sick and aged people, and make themselves of service to the chapel and schools in many ways. At the regular meetings, which open with a hymn and a very brief printed service, after work previously appointed to be done has been reported on and forthcoming work allocated, papers or addresses may be given on religious, literary or social subjects, followed by discussion or citations from books in prose or poetry bearing on the subject. For example, this week at its meeting "Friends and Friendship" was the topic for the evening, and was introduced and spoken to by several young people. At previous meetings the topics had been "Gossip—Bad and Good," "Jumping to Conclusions," "What can we Young People do for our Chapel?" "The Leadership of Jesus," &c. In this Guild the interchange of thought upon the topic of the evening is usually summed up by the minister who presides, and the evening closes with hymn and benediction. Thus it is that the young people of this Guild have afforded them what Mr. Anderton agrees they need, namely, help in their intellectual life, fellowship in their spiritual life, and, to quote him again, "'reverent self-expression' takes care of itself." I therefore put it to Mr. Anderton, and to any who hesitate about a Guild, that here they have, ready to their hands, an institution or association, for our young people and for as many elders as care to join with them (for in a Guild there is no maximum age), which is not only capable of, but is positively doing, splendid service for many of our schools and churches. Moreover, may I add that, of course, each of our churches or schools is free to make its own Guild just what it sincerely desires. Even if it yet be that there are in some Guilds elements which Mr. Anderton objects to (though I do not think there are), there is no power to prevent him omitting anything he dislikes and working out for himself and his own particular set of young people exactly such a conception of the "Guild Idea," which he says he is favourable to, as he feels and believes will be fraught with greatest benefit to the young people whose training I know he is as anxious for as the most ardent Guildite amongst us.

LOST IN LONDON.

SIR,—My attention has lately been called to the fact that numbers of our young people, and also of the older members of our congregations, when they leave their homes in the country, and settle in London, are entirely lost to our cause for want of some one in London who will take them in hand, and make them feel at home in one of the London churches. May I suggest that this feeling of isolation might be prevented if ministers of congregations, or where there is no minister the secretaries, would always give members of their congregations going to London a letter to the Rev. Copeland Bowie, Essex Hall, who has assured me he would be glad to put strangers in touch with the ministers of the chapels nearest to their place of residence.

It is very discouraging to us in the country, who have tried to help these young people, to find that as soon as they go to London they drift away from Unitarianism for lack of the helping hand that will keep them amongst us.

LITERATURE.

THE PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNALS.

The January number of Mind opens with an article by Mr. F. H. Bradley, on "Active Attention," in which he continues the discussion which he began in the previous number. We suppose that his paper will be intelligible and satisfactory to thinkers of his own school, but we must confess that we are unable to follow his reasonings, simply because they rest on an interpretation of consciousness which appears to us, to be manifestly erroneous. He tells us, for instance, that "active attention involves will, and that will is the self-realisation of an idea." We must leave to our readers to determine whether, when they will the writing of a letter, they have the feeling that the idea realises itself. To the present writer it seems evident that if we felt that the idea realised itself, we should say that it was not an act of will at all, but was an involuntary or automatic act for which we should decline to hold ourselves responsible. In an act of will, what realises the idea is not the idea alone, but the Self acting upon the idea. But to admit this would be to admit the existence and activity of a real or metaphysical Self; and it is the desire to avoid if possible the admission of the reality of such a Self which prompts this succession of papers from Mr. Bradley's pen; for if such a Self be allowed to exist it would largely revolutionise Mr. Bradley's philosophy, and lead to a very different estimate than he forms of the true relations between Appearance and Reality.

This article is followed by an erudite and interesting one by Mr. A. W. Benn, on "The Later Ontology of Plato." Then comes one of Professor Mackenzie's readable and suggestive papers on "The Hegelian Point of View," from which it appears that the gnostic pretensions of present Hegelianism are much humbler than those which were once advanced. It is interesting to learn that Hegelianism does not now mean that "everything has to be reduced to pure thought," and that "the simple distinction between the colour red and the colour blue can never be expressed in any form of thought." The non-Hegelian reader will, however, naturally ask how then the idealist makes out that the reality of the colours and of the distinction between them is derived entirely from the circumstance that they are objects to a thinking consciousness.

In the first paper of the Philosophical Review Dr. Eliza Ritchie gives some thoughtful "Notes on Spinoza's Conception of God." Her conclusion is that > Spinoza undoubtedly rejects wholly the conception of God as a person, but equally certain it is that consciousness or "thought" is an essential and eternal aspect of being. The true statement as to the consciousness of Spinoza's God is that God, as "being absolutely infinite," is consciousness per se, eternal, all-embracing, and self-sufficient; and that such consciousness is cognisable by our reason, which pertains to it, though it cannot be pictured by our imagination, which misleads us when it represents it as analogous to our own, since the latter, being only a "mode," is finite, transitory, and dependent. Our relation to being viewed under the attribute of thought is, therefore, not similar to that which one person bears to another.

There are also in this number two excellent metaphysical articles, one on "Jonathan Edwards's Idealism;" and another on "Royce's Refutation of Realism," in which the writer, Mr. W. O. P. Montague, of California, acutely criticises Professor Royce's Gifford Lectures, and gives good reason for maintaining that "in spite of the novelty and interest that attaches to Professor Royce's argument, it appears to do scant justice to the realistic doctrine and to be, therefore, lacking in finality." Among the "Reviews of Books" there is a very long and, on the whole, unfavourable notice of the work on "The Problem of Conduct: A Study in the Phænomenology of Ethics," by Mr. A. E. Taylor, of Owens College, Manchester. The summaries of articles from the other journals are, as usual, excellent.

The most important article in the International Journal of Ethics is the opening one, in which the celebrated Professor Harald Höffding, of Copenhagen, writes on "Philosophy and Life." In reference to religion he says:—

> The proper task of the philosophy of religion is to examine the psychological possibility of uniting the belief in the persistence of value with the scientific understanding of reality, and with the ethical activity in discovering and producing values. Philosophy cannot produce belief. Belief is not excogitated or constructed, but grows out of life. But though it is no product of philosophy it is something which philosophy must deal with. Philosophy examines its psychological possibility, its ethical import, and its epistemological validity. In this last respect the problem is to draw the line between thought and poetry. The highest is perhaps only accessible to us in the form of poetry, and a poetry of life, in which the deepest experiences of personal human life are expressed, will more and more satisfy the want, which before could only be satisfied by myth and dogma. Then Goethe shall be right:
> "Und deines Geistes höchster Feuerflug, > Hat schon am Gleichniss, hat am Bild genug!"

After two popular articles on "Temperance" and "Women as Moral Beings," we get a short but weighty paper by Dr. Bernard Bosanquet on "Dark Ages and the Renaissance," which contains an appreciation, as warm as it is just, of Mr. Wicksteed's "most profound and delightful address on the Religion of Time and of Eternity." To tempt our readers to turn to the article itself, we need only quote the profound and deeply interesting paragraph with which it closes. If we differ at all from Dr. Bosanquet it is only that we are at times conceited enough to ascribe to "our little ephemeral personality," that can partake of such divine experiences, a more permanent value and a deeper root in the ethical and spiritual meaning of the universe than he appears inclined to allow:—

> And thus the modern Renaissance has carried us beyond itself, perhaps to the very revelation of which we stand in need. I would point you once more to the recent address of a living friend and teacher—I may name him—Mr. Wicksteed, to show you in greater depth and detail the meaning and value of this revelation for the present day. A motto which I have heard that the Comtist school have adopted, and which probably expresses the inmost hearts of many of us who live energetically the life of our century, runs in the words, "The End is Progress"—surely a strange contradiction for any generation of mankind to set as the foundation of its life. The teacher of whom I have spoken will call your attention, on the contrary, to the mediæval conception of eternity and fruition. If our life has in it nothing worth possessing, we shall not be advantaged by gaining more of the same. No problem is solved by a mere appeal to the future. If we cannot in some measure, however humble, know what it is to lay hold on eternal life, to enter into the consciousness of something that is rooted beyond time, we seem to be in a fair way to gain the whole world and lose our own soul. I am not speaking of a life in the future, but of something like what Spinoza meant by seeing things under the form of the eternal, or what the ancient Greek more simply indicated by the conception of Leisure. Leisure—the word from which our word "school" is derived—was for him the expression of the highest moments of the mind. It was not labour; far less was it recreation. It was that employment of the mind in which by great thoughts, by art and poetry which lift us above ourselves, by the highest exertion of the intelligence, as we should add by religion, we obtain occasionally a sense of something that cannot be taken from us, a real oneness and centre in the universe; and which makes us feel that whatever happens to the present form of our little ephemeral personality, life is yet worth living because it has a real and sensible contact with something of eternal value.

Among the book reviews is a very full and searching estimate by Dr. S. H. Mellone, of the third volume of Wundt's "Ethics," which now appears in an English dress from the hand of Margaret Floy Washburn, Ph.D. In treating of Wundt's Determinism, Dr. Mellone justly says:—

> The usual "short way with the indeterminists," is to ascribe their doctrine to philosophic incapacity; Wundt goes further, and insinuates that it implies a certain moral and spiritual dulness, if nothing worse! Not much profit can come of this sort of thing. Men like Martineau and Lotze maintained the "indeterminist" doctrine, because by no other interpretation could they justify certain ethical facts which, perhaps, may be summed up by the term "moral responsibility." And they attempted to justify these facts by a metaphysical theory; not (as Wundt and many others suppose) by "denying causality," but by making the will into an Absolute Cause, absolute, but acting only through the phænomenal contents of mind. . . . There are some who think that, in spite of Green's brilliant discussion, it is not possible (in the present state of our knowledge) to combine the ethical advantages of Libertarianism and the scientific advantages of Determinism, as Green and Wundt attempt to do.

We may add that the reviewer of Wundt in the current number of the Philosophisches Jahrbuch is more unqualified in his strictures on Wundt's determinism than Dr. Mellone is; for Mind thus summarises his criticism:—"The writer refutes Wundt's idea of the Will, and of consciousness, of motive and of freedom. Motives do not account for the whole causality of a human act. Character, whether individual or given by the family or by society, cannot explain the feeling of freedom. Wundt's determinism destroys all responsibility."

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

In the Contemporary Review Mr. E. Wake Cook, who wrote last September on "The Organisation of Mankind," has an article on "The Increasing Purpose," in which he vindicates the reality of the continuing spiritual life, in which death is but an incident. His point of view is indicated in these sentences from the first paragraph :—

"Faith" has a mystic meaning in the teachings of religious light-bringers, implying strange unexplored potencies; but with priesthoods dealing largely with fossil forms of ritual it means assent to dogmas. This assent is vital to the ecclesiastical organisations demanding it, hence the fictitious value imputed to it as a means of deciding the eternal destiny of the individual. Whatever its real value, the fact remains that faith fails, and scepticism is rampant.

Mr. Cook then shows how the growing experience of life in this ordered cosmos, and not least through the recent studies of psycho-physics, points to a destiny for the individual of ever-widening range and deeper spiritual insight, through conflict rising ever to fresh heights, the whole process of life ordered by a Providence of Good. "This life is but a minor prelude to a major movement, and 'death' but the resolution of discords into harmony."

Mr. Alfred Stead contributes an interesting article on "The Anglo-Japanese Agreement from the Japanese Point of View," drawing the conclusion—which we most devoutly hope events will justify—that this treaty, "if accepted in its finest sense, might be made productive of a greater International Peace than has yet been attainable."

In the Nineteenth Century and After readers interested in India should turn to Mr. G. M. Chesney's article on "Famine and Controversy." Mr. W. F. Lord writes very severely of Thackeray as "The Apostle of Mediocrity." Mr. Stephen Gwynn makes a vigorous defence of Mr. Stephen Phillips's "Ulysses," both as poem and drama on the stage, and rejoices that the public have shown the appreciation of the play which he holds to be due, against the cool reception of the critics. In calling "Ulysses" a masque he rightly points, as it seems to us, to its character among plays.

In the Fortnightly there are two articles to which we would call special attention—one by "Vigilans," in whom we recognise a teacher of wide experience whose judgment in the matter should carry great weight, on "England's Educational Peril," pointing to various forms of waste and inefficiency in our present system of elementary education, and suggesting remedies; the other by Sir Henry Thompson, Bart., F.R.C.S. on "The Unknown God?" a personal confession of the deepest interest, showing the progress of the writer's thought, which has brought him to "unshakeable confidence in the Power, the Wisdom and the Beneficence which pervade and rule the Universe."

The Monthly Review appears for the first time without any of the illustrations which hitherto have been a marked feature. Mr. W. Malleson contributes a useful article on "A Prosperous British India," pointing to the real hope of improvement in the condition of this people through the development of various industries, in which the needed capital would have, he is assured, prospect of an adequate return. Irrigation has done much to meet the recurring disasters of famine; but in many parts of the country the formation of the land makes the impossible. The famine, Mr. Malleson urges, has recently been more of money than of food supplies, and this must be met by utilising the vast undeveloped natural resources of the country.

In Good Words will be found a second paper by Mr. Stopford Brooke on "Browning's Treatment of Nature." "Browning, unlike Tennyson," says Mr. Brooke, "did not invent his landscapes. He drew direct from nature. The landscapes in Pauline and Sordello and in the lyrical poems are plainly recollections of what he has seen and noted in his memory, from the sweep of the mountainous or oceanic horizon to the lichen on the rock and the painted shell on the sea-shore. Even the imaginative landscape of Childe Roland is a memory, not an invention."

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

Sir,—Referring to Mr. Drummond's and Mr. Prime's letters in last week's Inquirer, may I call your attention to the above headline. It is not "The National Conference Patronage Fund."

In your condensed report of the meeting of Feb. 26 you had no space for the very strong protest of Mr. F. Nettlefold against the attempt to alter the aim of the Fund, nor could you refer to the active participation in opposition of Mr. Colfox to certain of the proposals of the Committee. The bulk of the subscribers had, I suggest, no other object in view in subscribing than to provide, on a sound basis, what has been called "Deferred Pay" for the devoted men forming our ministry.

In the attempt to yoke the Fund to the National Conference, numerous peculiarities show themselves in the rules, and one can sympathise with the draughtsman of the constitution in his work of reconciliation. Just to illustrate :—

There is to be no general meeting for four years.

Thereafter meetings every three years.

Managers to be selected, the first for four years; afterwards for nine years.

General meetings to be called only by advertisement.

The managers and not the constituents in general meeting to elect the officers.

The by-laws to be alterable by the managers in many respects without reference to the constituency.

Nominations of managers to be sent to the secretary before the announcement of when the general meetings are to be held.

Amendments will be submitted at the adjourned meeting on the 19th inst. with the view, if possible, of remedying the above propositions and of keeping the management of the Fund in the hands of the donors and subscribers, both in regard to the managers and to others, and of keeping them actively interested in it. Almost all the amendments moved at the meeting of the 26th had these for their objects.

Had Messrs. Drummond and Prime been present at the meeting they so much contemn, they would have seen that all sections of the meeting voted for the amendment to which they take such objection.

Howard Young.

March 10.

[We are not aware that any attempt was made to "alter the aim of the Fund," nor that Mr. Nettlefold made any protest against such a supposed attempt. Mr. Nettlefold, if we understood him aright, was simply one of those who protested against any but the subscribers of the Fund having a voice in the business of determining its constitution.—Ed. Inq.]

Sir,—No one can carefully read the letters of Mr. Wooding on the above great question without recognising the simplicity of his motive, the loftiness of his aim, and the great ability with which he makes both one and the other manifest. Nevertheless, it seems to one equally certain that his troubles, his fears, not to say his bewilderment, arise mainly from the fact that he fails to distinguish things which differ, confounds substance with form, and essence with accidents, and so encounters mere ghosts or comes to death-grips with mere anticipations of the imagination.

I wonder, for instance, that Mr. Wooding does not see that our present lack of ecclesiastical organisation is by no means the same thing as the absence of the very ecclesiasticism in spirit he so much anticipates if the Triennial Conference continues to exist and grow. I wonder, still more, he does not see that, on the other hand, the very absence of the ecclesiastical organisation he so much deprecates has led, long since, both directly and indirectly, to the very worst forms of ecclesiastical abuse, and that, therefore, for many years past, extremes, in their worst phases, have indeed met and kissed each other in our ranks. Who needs to be told that certain congregations among us have been, and are, ecclesiastical in the worst sense, and that it has not, hitherto, been impossible to find one man, here or there, who has had all the worser features and discharged all the more repulsive functions of the worst possible pope, combined, too, with no small touch of the pitiable petty tyrant? Does any one among us, who has kept his eyes and ears open for the past twenty-five years, need to be told that ecclesiastical interference, in its worst forms, has often been, and is often now, exercised by our district unions and associations in ways which have been all the more mischievous because so utterly divorced from due and well-ordered procedure? Passing, for obvious reasons, over many cases of past years, two of which are too bad and too painful for explicit reference, let us look at the way in which, in two counties at any rate, it is now being taken for granted that before any of our "assisted churches" (really more than half the whole number of our churches, especially if we consider the endowments) send out a circular soliciting help for any scheme they have in hand they must "get the sanction of the District Association with which they are connected," or else our richer people must button-up their pockets and refuse to help them! Who has made such a regulation? Why, anybody, or everybody, or nobody, as the case may happen to have been. Take, again, the far graver case of the late and pending proceedings in connection with the Ministers' Assurance and Pension Fund. Though that fund originated from the Triennial Conference, and is, in all senses, the child of that Conference, yet a mere handful of the subscribers (themselves a mere handful compared with our whole body of members) meet together and proceed to arrogate to themselves functions to which they have really no right whatever, and which belong only to the National Conference itself in its duly representative capacity. The fact, for instance, that I am myself a subscriber to the fund gives me no right whatever, apart from my right as an actual or possible representative to the next gathering of the Conference, to say what the constitution of the fund shall be or shall not be; and the same is true of all other subscribers, whether great or small. The whole proceeding is irregular to the last degree; and, if we had had any approach to a proper ecclesiastical organisation, the Conference Committee, as the representative of the Conference itself, would never have allowed the business to get out of their own responsible hands into the grip of a mere irresponsible and non-representative section. Other cases could easily be given if space allowed, but enough has thus been said to show that ecclesiastical abuses, so far from always being inseparable from due ecclesiastical organisation, as Mr. Wooding seems to assume, may come, and have come, of its utter absence.

Meanwhile, as is thus, as in so many other ways, proved, it is certain that due and orderly ecclesiastical organisation is not only one of our supreme needs at the present time, but that it is coming, slowly but surely, by a process of natural evolution which no man, and no collection of men, can hinder. Mere Congregationalism has utterly failed, in all its forms and phases, among the Congregationalists themselves beyond doubt, quite as much amongst the Baptists, and most of all amongst ourselves. Nor can the British Foreign Unitarian Association stand as a substitute for such organisation as we need, and are tending to, day by day. So long since as 1865, when the question at issue was as to "the expansion of the Unitarian Association into a Free Christian Union, or the co-existence of a Doctrinal Association and a Catholic Church, the latter alternative was adopted," as we may learn from a footnote in "The Letters of John James Tayler," edited by John Hamilton Thom (Vol. II. page 258). No other alternative is possible for us now. No Doctrinal Association can, by any fair possibility whatever, become the representative of our Catholic Churches. The only conceivable alternative now, therefore, in the present question of organisation, is a "Unitarian denomination with a transformed Unitarian Association," which is surely too belated and benighted an alternative to be even considered, or "a free Catholic Church, with a free Catholic Organisation, not the less but all the more free because it is orderly," the only alternative worthy of us. We have already a great deal more than the germ of all we thus need in the Triennial Conference, which has been well alive now for twenty years, and is likely to live on, I think, though some of our friends, with a far-stretching but not very happy outlook, seem to wonder if it will "continue to exist," their wonder giving one the suspicion that, on their part at least, "the wish is father to the thought."

THE DUNKERS AND NON-SUBSCRIPTION.

SIR,—In your issue of Feb. 22 Mr. Fripp gave an interesting quotation from Franklin's Autobiography referring to the reluctance of the Dunkers to set forth any official statement of the articles of their belief or the rules of their discipline, lest they or their successors should feel bound and confined by such a printed confession. That is a policy with which Unitarians heartily sympathise. They regard that course in general as thoroughly sound and wise; but this policy is inaptly described by the term "non-subscription," which seems to imply a refusal to sign the actual confession rather than a reluctance to print a rigid official body of articles of religion and code of discipline. As a matter of fact the way of admission into the Dunker community was by a personal confession of faith followed by "trine immersion," with laying on of hands and prayer. At the close of his letter Mr. Fripp asks whether any of your readers can tell what became of "this kindred movement across the Atlantic." I hope some American correspondent will supply the answer. Meanwhile, it may be as well to note that the Dunkers were more akin to the Mennonites, General Baptists and Quakers than to those Protestant Dissenting congregations of England and non-subscribing Presbyterian congregations of Ireland which have given strength to the Unitarian movement in the British Isles. The Dunkers fled from persecution in Germany to America, settling in Pennsylvania, crossing the Atlantic in small companies from 1720 to 1730. They adopted a peculiar dress, objected to shaving, disclaimed all violence or resort to law, even in self-defence, exalted celibacy without condemning marriage, allowed all members to speak in "meeting," called one another "brethren," observed the ceremony of feet-washing (John xiii. 14, 15), denied the eternity of future punishment, and held a doctrine of ultimate universal salvation. There was a split from the main body in 1728 under Johan Conrad Beissel (1690-1760), who founded the Society of Seventh-day Dunkers holding that the obligation to observe the Sabbath or seventh day (Saturday) as a day of rest had never been removed. He formed a monastic community in 1733 at a place he called Ephrata, where the members lived in common a life of simplicity, industry, and piety.

The Dunkers have declined greatly in numbers during the past century, but maintain their separate organisation. They have modified their dress, manners, and faith somewhat, but are still remarkable for their simplicity, purity, and honesty of life.

It is obvious that "non-subscription" is an inadequate form for describing the basis of such a community. It is also obvious that while the Dunkers declined to set forth a final and explicit statement of their belief and discipline, yet that belief and discipline, though it might be insensibly modified in the process of time, must have been implicitly understood and acknowledged by those who, from time to time, belonged to their society. Without such a common understanding and a general unity of spirit and purpose, the Dunker communities would have fallen to pieces at once.

We are indebted to another correspondent, from Newcastle-on-Tyne, for noting that an interesting illustrated article on the Dunkers appeared in Scribners' Magazine for November, 1901.

OBITUARY.

WILLIAM RATHBONE.

ON Thursday evening, March 6, there passed away, at his residence, Greenbank, Liverpool, at the age of eighty-three, "a man who, in a quiet and unassuming way," as the Times obituary notice said, "has left his mark on the practical philanthropy of the Victorian era."

"One of God's best and greatest sons" is Florence Nightingale's tribute. Generous without stint, and with the truest wisdom in his generosity, one of the humblest and most unselfish of men, we will add, and would fain be silent for a little while longer, as we stand reverently by the grave of William Rathbone and ponder the unaffected goodness and the rich achievements of his life. Next week we must attempt a somewhat fuller notice, although the daily papers, and notably the Times and the Manchester Guardian, as well as the Liverpool papers, have published very admirable memoirs.

"I do not wish to live a day longer than I can be of service to others," Mr. Rathbone once said to a friend; and amid his growing weakness and all the disabilities of old age, there was a wonderful persistence in his vivid interests and his constant eagerness to be doing good. To the very last his mind was occupied with schemes of beneficence and unselfish thought for others, until death came to him in quietness and with Divine benediction. Of him, surely, we may say, with a depth of meaning as of few others: "The end of that man is peace."

It was characteristic of Mr. Rathbone that he left the most considerate directions as to his funeral. Believing "that the burial of a large number of persons in the midst of populous districts is endangering the public health," he directed that his body should be cremated. He expressed the hope that none of his friends would attend his funeral at any risk to their health, and desired that as much as possible of the service should be in the chapel and not in the open-air, and that "friends should keep their hats on when not in the chapel."

In accordance with these directions the cremation took place privately at the Anfield Crematorium on Monday evening, and the ashes were brought back to Greenbank; on Tuesday the funeral service was held in the Ullet-road Church, the ashes, enclosed in an urn of alabaster, being brought in on a simple bier, encircled by wreaths of exquisite flowers, and subsequently deposited in the family vault in the Smithdown-road Cemetery. Along the whole line of route blinds were drawn down, and large numbers of people watched in reverent silence. Ullet-road Church was completely filled, and thousands were gathered about the grave, including a large number of University College students and about fifty nurses from the Queen Victoria Jubilee Nursing Institute. The names of those present at the service, members of the family, personal friends, and representatives of public bodies, &c., including the Lord Mayor, the Bishop of Liverpool, and Mgr. Nugent, occupied more than a column of the daily papers. Every section of the community was represented, from the humblest to the highest, and the most divers branches of the Christian Church, all at one in a common sorrow and a common tribute to the noblest human worth.

The service in the church was conducted by the Rev. Dr. de Beaumont Klein, who, with the surpliced choir, met the funeral party at the main entrance and proceeded to the chancel, while the moving strains of Mendelssohn's "Funeral March" filled the church. In the choir stalls were also the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, H. W. Hawkes, T. Lloyd Jones, J. C. Hirst, W. J. Jupp, and V. D. Davis. In the course of the service the two psalms, "The Lord is my Shepherd," and "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills," and, as anthem, Spohr's "Blest are the departed," were rendered with much feeling, and the lesson was from John XIV. Dr. Klein also gave from the pulpit the following address.

DR. KLEIN'S ADDRESS.

We are met here to-day to perform a sacred duty towards one who, to many of us, was a personal friend, but who has been, in a wider sense, the friend of his generation; so that to-day not only a distinguished family and a wide circle of friends are mourning over the death of William Rathbone, but all who in this age have felt higher aspirations, charitable impulses; all who have cherished philanthropic ideals, all who have realised the service of man as an essential part of any true service of God, all of them, in presence of these lifeless remains, experience also a sense of personal loss. Then there are those innumerable men and women, the poor, the maimed, and the blind, those humble friends of his—who were so much to him, upon whose wants he spent so much attention, so much care and thought; all those victims of sin, of social neglect, or of ignorance, for whom he felt so deeply; they may not have always realised all that he was doing for them, all that he meant to do for them, yet in some vague sense at least they were conscious, through his action, of a love that had come near to them, and had not merely relieved but soothed; not merely raised but blessed. And when I think of all those nameless unknown acts of charity, either proceeding from his direct personal attention or in consequence of wisely organised service, which have marked the days and hours of that man's long life in our midst, I cease to see these wreaths about his remains, I cease to hear our psalms and our own poor prayers, but all those innumerable things done, said, thought, loved for the sake of others seem to be at this moment the real wreaths that send up towards Heaven their fragrance, the real psalms and anthems and prayers worthy to reach Him in whose sight those loving acts were done. These are singing the dirge which God will hear.

William Rathbone, the sixth of his line, would seem to be in his own person a striking example of the law of heredity. Surely there was much in him of the character of his ancestor, that sturdy Quaker preacher of the end of the eighteenth century whom a contemporary described as being distinguished by "sound judgment and upright intention." And there was also much in him of that fourth William Rathbone, his grandfather, of whom it is recorded that "the welfare of the human race was the paramount duty of his life and its chief business." Of his own father and mother he had clearly inherited some of the most notable characteristics. He was evidently morally related to the man who was not afraid to be seen on the side of an unpopular cause, provided it was a righteous one; the man who, in Liverpool, backed Wilberforce in his anti-slavery crusade at the time when those who did so might have been counted on the fingers of one hand.

Our William Rathbone was clearly a man cast in that mould. Whether we look at his action in connection with the breakdown of the commissariat at the time of the Crimean war; or whether we watch his efforts about the same period to organise the Liberal party in his native city; or whether we see him playing a leading part in connection with the Cotton Famine relief fund during the American Civil War; or whether we look during the years of his Parliamentary life, at the special measures which he supported in the House and helped to carry to a successful issue; in every instance we recognise the same veracity, the same zeal for practical righteousness, the same faithfulness to ideals which formed, as it were, the natural atmosphere in which he breathed and moved.

We also notice in him that combination, so precious and so rare, of practical business-like reasonableness and generous impulsive enthusiasm. He had the prudence which avoids mistakes and knows how to adapt means to end; but he was not dominated by that prudence which too often dries up the springs of generosity and moral courage within us. He was constant, he was steady, he was faithful to himself and to his aims. It was not difficult to know what line he would have taken given certain circumstances, and this means that he was a man of character. He was that which we love to associate with our conception of one who is a man indeed, in the perfection of a nature normally attuned to the laws of moral order. Sometimes his natural enthusiasm, born of deep tenderness, would lead him first; sometimes intellectual conviction would move him in the first instance, but ultimately mind and heart were sure to be found closely associated in whatever he had set his hand to do.

Thus it was the heart that led in that wonderful enterprise of his which has ended by endowing Liverpool, England, and the civilised world with the blessings of district nursing. In watching the assistance and comfort afforded in his own household by the services of a private nurse, he at once says to himself: What must not be sickness to the poor who have no such help? Many, no doubt, have made some similar reflection, but with him such a kindly thought could not remain a thought; it must be translated into fact. From that moment he will never rest until district nursing has been organised for the poor, until the necessary training has been organised for the nurses, until nurses' homes have been founded. In Miss Nightingale he finds experience, zeal, and inspiration, and draws largely upon those; he extends the reform of sick nursing to workhouses. Then when the Queen Victoria's Jubilee Fund was devoted to the sacred cause of nursing for the poor, more than ever his mind and heart were thrown into the work. It was at that time I first became acquainted with him in London. He could hardly speak of anything else, so full was he of his subject; but in the points he raised, in the questions he put to me, in the projects he unfolded, I could always see the man of business, the practical man guiding the enthusiast, and I realised the secret of his success.

On the other hand, it was intellectual conviction which led the way when he was labouring to promote higher education by establishing a college in his native city or in Bangor while he was representing a Welsh constituency in Parliament. He believed in education, in culture. He realised the value of knowledge, and found that ignorance is the parent of much wrong in society. He wished the city of his birth and the country which he loved to be blessed by knowledge, but a knowledge made perfect through love. Hence his inability to separate education from religion in his affections. Largely by his persuasion £80,000 was raised within a year for establishing University College in Liverpool, and to the last day of his life his devotion to an institution largely due to his efforts was unbounded.

But we should hardly know the man if we only looked at his external work. There is another aspect that must be considered, though we can hardly trust ourselves to dwell on it here and now. We mean his friendships, which formed so large and so beautiful and so sacred an element of his noble life. His old schoolfellow, Mr. Thomas Ashton, he loved through life as a brother. There was Mr. William Lamport and his cousin, George Melly, who were also close and dear friends. Then there was his pastor and brother-in-law, the Rev. John Hamilton Thom, for many years minister of this congregation. For his intellectual culture and spiritual genius Mr. Rathbone entertained a profound veneration. He loved and honoured him as one who had entered deeply into the Christian spirit, and lived it, and taught as he lived. Mr. Rathbone's religion is well described in the works of his saintly friend, which he has with pious care caused to be published after Mr. Thom's death. It was a religion seeking to apply "the laws of life after the mind of Christ." To assimilate the spirit of that mind, and humbly, patiently, faithfully to walk under the guidance of that spirit, was our departed friend's religion. Hence it is that his religion included also tolerance towards all who might differ from him, but a tolerance born of conviction, not of indifference to truth, as is so often the case.

Indeed, in religious matters he was in deep earnest, and his whole life shows it. For, I ask you, what is it ultimately that strikes and fascinates us in William Rathbone's life, that has produced the feeling of veneration and love which is manifested so universally in Liverpool to-day? It is, I think, the fact realised by all, that while so many of us work life and religion on lines more or less parallel perhaps, but still on different lines, this man, William Rathbone, worked on a single line. To him life was religion and religion was life. Hence the unity of purpose, of character, and of work which strikes us all as so noble and so beautiful in him. And this, when all is duly considered, must perhaps be acknowledged as his greatest deed after all. While men stand doubting, hesitating, compromising, trying to make the best of both worlds, and failing, as they must, in the attempt, this man you are burying to-day came simply, honestly, and in the course of a long life spent in your midst he has shown you how religion and life can be lived as one, and lived successfully.

The service in the church concluded with the Lord's Prayer, said by minister and people together, and at the grave in the Smithdown-road Cemetery Dr. Klein simply added the prayer of committal and the benediction. The grave was lined with flowers, and there were close upon 100 wreaths from friends, public bodies, and many educational and charitable institutions. Happily the day was mild and fine, and there was nothing to disturb the spirit of earnestness and reverence and immortal hope with which the last office was concluded.

MR. JAMES BOOLDS.

A NOTE of grateful testimony is due to the memory of Mr. James Boolds, of Stoke, Devonport, who died on the 23rd ult., after more than half-a-century's self-denying and courageous effort on behalf of our faith in that town. Mr. Boolds was one of the founders of the congregation, and served it in many ways, notably in the choir and in the pulpit itself, where he frequently officiated in the absence of a regular minister. He had a clear mind and a generous disposition, and was fully imbued with the principles of liberal religion; hence his value to a pioneer movement was great, and his record is an inspiration to all who are in earnest for the cause. Of a rich artistic temperament he delighted in music and painting, and exhibited much skill alike as a painter of acceptable pictures, and a constructor of violins. Altogether, his ninety years were filled with wholesome, happy, vigorous, and fruitful life.

MR. ROBERT BELBEN.

OUR congregation at Poole has suffered a grievous loss by the death of Mr. Robert Belben, who died suddenly on March 3, at the age of 75, from failure of the heart, following an attack of influenza. A native of Poole, brought up in connection with the Church of England, he had held the office of churchwarden at the parish church, but more than thirty years ago he became a Unitarian and joined the congregation in Hill-street. For the remainder of his life he was a most active and devoted member of the Unitarian Church, taking a prominent part in all its work. Being extremely fond of music he acted as voluntary choirmaster. Before the beginning of the present pastorate he for some years regularly conducted the evening services, and more recently he has often officiated as an occasional supply. At one time he had a seat on the Town Council, and at another time on the Board of Guardians; he served on various public committees; and so greatly was he respected in the town, in spite of his pronounced Unitarianism, that when the news of his death was received, the flag at the parish church was placed half-mast. The funeral took place in Longfleet churchyard, on Friday week, when a large and representative gathering of townspeople attended. The service was conducted by the Rev. E. S. Anthony, and excited some interest as being the first Nonconformist funeral under the Burials Act. A memorial service was held at the Unitarian Church on Sunday morning, when the pulpit was draped in violet. The chants were sung to three of Mr. Belben's own compositions, and a sermon was preached by the minister, showing how greatly he would be missed as a personal friend and a zealous supporter of the Church.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"The Ladder of St. Augustine."

A VERY long time ago, in the year 354, a boy was born in the town of Tagaste, in Numidia, one of the northern provinces of Africa. His father was a pagan, but his mother, whose name was Monica, was a Christian, and when her son Augustine was a boy she taught him some of the beautiful truths of Christianity. It seemed at the time as if she made an impression on him, and for a while he wished to be baptised and become professedly a Christian; but, to his mother's grief, he soon gave up this idea, and instead of remembering all the lessons of goodness that she had taught him in his youth, both by word and example, he grew up a wild, selfish, and pleasure-seeking man. He was very clever, and after he grew up held a post as lecturer at Milan, and while there he went to hear Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, preach. Through Ambrose's teaching he gradually became converted to Christianity, and realised what a sad, wasted life he had lived for all those thirty-two years, and he made up his mind to become a better man and to live a purer, nobler life. He kept his good resolution, and became so respected that he was made Bishop of Hippo, in the North of Africa, and held that post until he died at the age of seventy-five. He wrote many books, and used his great influence so well and wisely, that he is spoken of now as "St. Augustine," and is considered one of the greatest, if not the greatest of the early Fathers of the Church.

But it is not so much of St. Augustine himself, that I want to tell you, as of something that he said—or, rather, about a poem which Longfellow wrote about one of the wise and beautiful things that Augustine said. The poem is too long to quote the whole of it here, for it consists of twelve verses, but most of you will have a copy of Longfellow's poems in your homes, and can read it for yourselves. Try to understand the whole of it, for there are beautiful thoughts and great truths in every verse; only you will miss some of them unless you think very carefully about the full meaning of the whole poem. It is called "The Ladder of St. Augustine," and it is the ladder up which St. Augustine himself climbed, and up which we must all climb, if we want to make the best of our lives—to become what our Father meant us to be, and to do well the work that He has given us to do. The poem begins:—

"St. Augustine! Well hast thou said,
That of our vices we can frame
A ladder, if we will but tread
Beneath our feet each deed of shame.

"All common things, each day's events,
That with the hour begin and end,
Our pleasures and our discontents,
Are rounds, by which we may ascend."

You see from the second verse that there is nothing unusual in this ladder; everyone can climb it, and, indeed, everyone must climb it, if they climb at all. "All common things," and "each day's events" are just what come to everyone; we all have our "pleasures and our discontents," our happiness and our troubles, and our opportunities for doing well or ill; and it just depends on how we take these whether we are going up or down.

But a ladder does not consist only of the rounds or rungs; they require to be held in position by the long upright pieces which form the sides of the ladder; and if the rounds stand for something in St. Augustine's ladder, the upright pieces stand for something quite as much. I think we may take one upright to mean a loving, earnest, and persistent effort to do right; and the other upright to stand for the greatest and best gift that God has given us, the knowledge that He is always with us, always loving us, always ready to help us—as Tennyson says, "Closer is He than breathing, nearer than hands and feet"—and the power of prayer, the getting into touch with Him, so that we can feel and know that He is helping us.

The poem goes on to say, "We have not wings, we cannot soar, but we have feet to scale and climb"; that is just the way we must do our mounting, and the very fact that it is slow and difficult work makes us all the better boys and girls, and men and women, when we persist in the effort, for it is by conquering difficulties and temptations, in the right spirit, that our characters grow strong and loving and helpful.

We all like climbing up some high mountain to see the view from the top, and enjoy the fresh air, and the feeling of satisfaction that comes after a stiff climb; and if we make a ladder of all that comes to us in our lives, remembering the sides as well as the rounds, we shall gain a victory, and achieve a success far greater than in climbing a mountain.

O. M. RAWLINS.

THE March number of the Mill Hill Pulpit contains a Hospital Sunday sermon by the Rev. C. Hargrove on "The Sin of Not Giving," to which is appended the following note:—

The total income of the charities of Leeds, including subscriptions, donations, and investments, amounts, according to the returns furnished to the Leeds Charity Organisation Society, to somewhere between fifty and sixty thousand pounds. (The exact figures cannot be ascertained, as many of these charities belong only in part to Leeds.) Now, the rental of the City, estimated on its rateable value, is £2,089,647. Supposing that, taking rich and poor together, the rental is about a tenth of the income, we get a total income for the whole city of over £20,000,000. A penny in the pound on this sum would yield from eighty to ninety thousand pounds, and more than suffice for all the present demands of our charitable institutions. Supposing, as would doubtless be the case, that many good people gave far more than this, there would be plenty to relieve all manner of distress and start year by year such new movements as might be generally approved.

Our National Drink Bill amounts to over £160,000,000 a year. The tenth of one-half of this would be about double what all the charities of the kingdom spend annually.

LONDON, MARCH 15, 1902.

WILLIAM RATHBONE.

"In remembrance and humble love of one of God's best and greatest sons, Mr. William Rathbone, of Liverpool. — Florence Nightingale. London, March 8, 1902."

Such was the inscription on one of the wreaths borne with the ashes of William Rathbone from his home into the Ullet-road Church for the service of commemoration at the funeral on Tuesday last, and afterwards laid upon his grave.

Liverpool has lost her foremost citizen, and people of the English race a wise and noble-hearted benefactor; but death cannot destroy his good deeds, nor the spirit that has exerted and will exert an influence so uplifting and beneficent. The linking of those two names at such a time is beautiful. No more touching message could have been sent, no worthier tribute offered. One other woman, indeed, there was, from whom we can well imagine that a message of simple heartfelt sympathy would have been sent, on the death of one who must always be remembered in connection with the Queen Victoria Jubilee Nursing Institute, but she passed before her loyal subject into the Unseen; and it has remained for Florence Nightingale, herself aged and very near to the light of the eternal day, one who in the deepest human sense reigns as no other woman in all English hearts, and in a yet wider realm, to speak this most fitting word. They belonged, indeed, to that worthiest of all communions on earth, the "Church of the Good Samaritans"—among the humblest of its members, and because the humblest in that divine service, with all their great gifts and conspicuous achievements, highest of all in the reverence and love and honour of the rest.

William Rathbone would have laughed good-humouredly, and with amused deprecation, if he had not been shocked, at being called a great man. He was a man of business, a man of the world, in the best sense; he was aware of his own limitations, and of the conditions of the work he set himself to do. But who has there been in our time more truly great, in his single-hearted purpose of doing good? This surely has been worth much more to the world than any brilliance of genius or any triumphs of personal ambition. When last summer the statue of William Rathbone was unveiled in Liverpool, set there in the public garden by St. George's Hall by the willing gifts of the whole community, rich and poor alike, it was said in the Liverpool Daily Post that the statue represented him as he was in real life, "constantly devising wise and liberal things"; and that was the exact truth, while it was his happiness to have the means, and with steadfast purpose to make the opportunity of carrying his schemes through to a successful issue. That wealth is a trust to be seriously accepted was with him a profound conviction to which he gave practical effect throughout his long career. He has himself recorded the purpose with which, as a business man, he determined to regulate his expenditure, and this was well brought out in the Manchester Guardian's memorial article, which, after telling of his early education, went on :—

Shortly afterwards he became a partner in his father's firm, and he now laid down for himself those rules of conduct by which he hoped to escape the ethical disease which he described as "pecuniary paralysis." He noted that as men increase in wealth they usually decline in generosity. So he laid it down that if a man began as he did, by laying aside 10 per cent. of his expenditure for philanthropic and public objects, that percentage should increase with every increment of income, and that it should go on increasing till, if he were very prosperous, his philanthropic expenditure should equal his expenditure on himself and his family. He should also put a definite limit on his private expenditure, beyond which it should in no case go, thus liberating further amounts, in case of wealth, for public ends. The definiteness and deliberateness of these rules, as well as their conscientiousness and generosity, are characteristic of the man; and there can be no doubt that throughout his life he more than obeyed them.

As one who loved to do good, and, as few others, knew how to give, William Rathbone will long be gratefully remembered, and longer still will the fruits of his good deeds continue to ripen for a fuller harvest. Of his manifold beneficent activity we propose to say more next week, and will only add here two tributes from ministers of religion, who as young men enjoyed one of the many privileges provided by his generous kindness. Mr. Rathbone was strongly of opinion that a young man destined to minister to congregations of educated and wealthy people would derive great benefit from the experience at the conclusion of his college course of work among the poor, so that he might be brought practically face to face with the elementary problems of life. Thus in our own immediate circle he provided the Manchester College Missionary Fellowships, which so admirably gave that opportunity, and with the same generosity repeatedly provided the means for young curates of the Church of England to work in the poorest parishes in Liverpool. The first tribute which we quote is from Archdeacon Diggle, who, writing from the Rectory, Birmingham, addressed a letter to the Liverpool Daily Post telling of Mr. Rathbone's many benefactions to the Church of England, and bearing the following testimony to the quality of his religion :—

It was my favoured lot to become known to Mr. Rathbone at the beginning of my ministerial life. Soon after taking my degree at Oxford, I was chosen to be tutor to his eldest son, and was brought by him to Liverpool in 1871. For about two years there was scarcely a week in which I did not spend at least one night at Greenbank, except during the holiday season. Even in the holiday season I was frequently a member of their family circle. I mention these things as an evidence of the opportunities I had of abundantly knowing his real mind and heart. We occasionally conversed together upon religious subjects, and a more deeply spiritual man I have seldom met. Mr. Rathbone did not carry his heart on his sleeve—especially in reference to religion. But when he drew away the veil and let go restraint and reserve, the vision of his inward self was beautiful, reverent, exalted beyond description. He had the heart of a little child, with the moral strength of a giant, and the spiritual devotion of a saint.

His devotion to the Master (for so he always spoke to me of the Christ at these sacred moments) was wonderful in its reality, its vividness, and intensity. So also was his enthusiastic confidence in the guidance of the Holy Spirit. This devotion was the motive-power of all his goodness, his extraordinary truthfulness, his sacrifices, and self-deletion for the sake of his fellow-men.

It was also the fountain and the force of his large-heartedness. For he was not only munificent. His munificence was characterised by a largeness of will and purpose which seemed to scorn all limitations—notably of creed. He was not himself a Churchman; yet it would astonish Liverpool if it knew how great have been the sums which, through my hands alone, he has given to Church of England purposes.

The following is the tribute of the Rev. Henry Gow, who came to Liverpool to work with the Rev. Charles Beard at Renshaw-street Chapel, and at the same time to share in the Domestic Mission work, but by reason of Mr. Beard's illness was prevented from fully carrying out the plan. The following words were spoken to his present congregation at the Great Meeting, Leicester :—

IN MEMORIAM: WILLIAM RATHBONE.

Speaking to the younger men and women in the Renshaw-street congregation in 1854 Mr. Thom addressed them as follows :—"The work that remains for this and the next generation of Unitarians is to hold up before the world the clear signs of a genuine religious enthusiasm; to possess spiritual aspirations that rise into toil and sacrifice as their natural sphere; a practical devotion to God and Christ and the heavenly kingdom upon earth, in combination with a large and reconciling truth, with freedom and with love. This is the work that remains to supplement and to glorify all our controversies; it remains for the young, and in this community it very largely remains for the young of this congregation. Upon you, the rising families of this church, a great work rests. You have knowledge, you have culture, you have position, you have wealth, and I know you have many invitations and quickening impulses from God. To you it will belong to uphold or let fall, to illustrate or to tarnish, the cause of Christian truth and spiritual freedom in this community; on you will come the heritage of your fathers in these happier times when you are asked only to adorn it by your lives, and by your spirit of religious enterprise and love to commend it to every man's conscience in the sight of God." There were many men and women in that congregation fifty years ago who nobly responded to that appeal, and who have been generous, faithful workers for good, and whose characters were a light and a strength to their generation. But there was no man who lived more constantly in the love of that ideal and who pursued it more unwaveringly than William Rathbone. When I ask myself what spirituality of true religion means in commercial life, I think of him. He was one of the merchant princes of Liverpool, and one of the most generous givers to philanthropic objects in that city of princely givers.

But it is not of his wealth or his generosity that I think chiefly as I remember him. He was not eloquent, not a good speaker, he was not of commanding presence or of great intellectual power, but he was a man who had the most simple childlike faith in God, and who gave himself unweariedly to the service of his fellow-men. He was not an ambitious man; he did not court the admiration or gratitude of his city, but there was no one in Liverpool more respected or more honoured. I remember his saying to me, "A man may either seek to write his name or make a mark upon his time. They are different things and sought in different ways. I prefer to try and make a mark." In doing that he has left a name as well which will be honoured for many years to come.

I remember another story of him, how, when unseated at a general election, after some years of Parliamentary life which he had enjoyed and in which he had done good service on Committees, his first words were not words of disappointment but of determination to do something else. "I am defeated," he said; "well, now we will have the Hospital." Thwarted in the direction that he had wished to take, he turned at once to another work which he could not have carried out had he been elected. It was characteristic of his indomitable love for doing good.

The spiritual life, the quiet trust in God, the simplicity of the child, is not a monopoly of obscurity or poverty, it is not confined to those who are outside the great affairs of the world, although religious teachers sometimes almost make it seem that to such quiet lives alone the peace of God is possible. Men great in commerce, great in war, great in adventure, great in affairs of State have known it too. Thank God that there is no station, no power, no circumstance of wealth or poverty incompatible with that inward peace, that spiritual life, that quiet devotion to what is right and good. William Rathbone regarded and used his wealth as a great trust from God. He was a man living in the spirit, using his wealth as a noble instrument of service. He gave unceasingly, and he never lingered over the giving with conscious pride; he sought no recognition from others; he did not admire himself for doing it. It was the right thing to do, it was a plain duty, and he did it simply and gladly. He had a deep care and love for the poor and the sick of his city. Year after year I have seen him with Mr. Thom at the annual Domestic Mission meetings, giving expression to his interested sympathy. He loved to influence and help young men; he tried to encourage them and to give them opportunities for culture and for travel, and for gaining experience through special work. He gave such help in the most simple, generous, and friendly way. It seemed almost as if we were conferring a benefit and not receiving one. I have not known many men whose kindness was so absolutely free from egotism, and who respected so fully the liberty of those he wished to help.

To-day, our friends in the kindred church of Liverpool are mourning his loss, and bringing a tribute of affection to his memory. In this church many of you will know him only for what I have been saying now; but there are others here who know him well, and are aware that I have spoken only a portion of the truth. It is good for us all to join with our friends elsewhere in grieving for the loss of a good and noble man, and in thanking God for the gift of so devoted, so loving, and so pure a spirit.

IN ECCLES PARISH CHURCH.

In the series of Lenten addresses arranged by the Vicar to be given after evening service, Mr. J. W. Graham, Principal of Dalton Hall, Manchester, spoke last Sunday on "The Quaker Movement." Practically the whole congregation, estimated at about 700, remained to hear the address, which was a clear and deeply interesting exposition of the fundamental religious principles of the Society of Friends, based upon the central conviction of the rich spiritual endowment of man and the direct access of the soul to God. We are anxious to publish Mr. Graham's address in full, and hope to do so next week. Meanwhile, it is interesting, and significant of much, to set beside this pleasant picture of last Sunday evening in Eccles Parish Church, the following record in George Fox's Journal, telling of his experience in Manchester in 1657:—

> Thence we came to Manchester, and the Sessions being there that day, many rude people were come out of the country. In the meeting they threw at me coals, clods, stones, and water; yet the Lord's power bore me up over them, that they could not strike me down. At last, when they saw they could not prevail by throwing water, stones, and dirt at me, they went and informed the justices in the Sessions, who thereupon sent officers to fetch me before them. The officers came in while I was declaring the Word of Life to the people, and plucked me down, and haled me up into their court. When I came there all the court was in disorder and noise. Wherefore I asked where were the magistrates that they did not keep the people civil? Some of the justices said they were magistrates. I asked them why, then, did they not appease the people, and keep them sober? for one cried "I'll swear," and another cried "I'll swear." I declared to the justices how we were abused in our meeting by the rude people who threw stones, and clods, dirt and water; and how I was haled out of the meeting and brought thither, contrary to the instrument of Government, which said "none shall be molested in their meetings that professed God, and owned the Lord Jesus Christ"; which I did. So the truth came over them, that when one of the rude fellows cried "he would swear," one of the justices checked him, saying "What will you swear? Hold your tongue." At last they bid the constable take me to my lodging, and there be secured till morning, till they sent for me again. So the constable led me to my lodging, and as we went the people were exceeding rude, but I let them see "the fruits of their teachers, and how they shamed Christianity, and dishonoured the name of Jesus, which they professed."
> Next morning, neither the constable nor the justices had anything more to say to Fox, and he was allowed quietly to go his own way.

The Committee of Manchester College, Oxford, at their meeting on Monday, passed the following resolution with reference to the late Dr. Vance Smith:—

That the Committee of Manchester College are deeply sensible of the great loss sustained by the College in the death of the Rev. G. Vance Smith, B.A., Ph.D., D.D., one of the oldest of its students, having entered the College at York in 1836, and concluding his course in Manchester on the removal of the College to that city in 1840. That the Committee recognise, with gratitude to his memory, the many services he rendered to his Alma Mater, commencing during his student days when he held the post of assistant Mathematical Tutor in York, 1839-40; and continued by him as Theological tutor in Manchester and London, 1846-57, as vice-Principal at Manchester 1846-50, and as Principal at Manchester 1850-53, his tenure of these offices being signalised by his careful and industrious scholarship and his sincere devotion to the principles and aims of the College. That the Committee bear testimony of the further services he rendered as Principal of the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, to his long and faithful ministry, to his literary labours in the cause of theological truth, and to the honour which he won for the College, of which he was one of the most distinguished alumni, by his selection as a member of the New Testament Revision Company 1870-80. That the Committee desire to convey to Mrs. Vance Smith, the Rev. G. Hamilton Vance, and the other members of the family, their respectful sympathy with them in their sorrow.

We may further add to last week's memorial notice that Dr. Vance Smith, with the late Dr. Martineau, was one of the first two holders of the Rawdon Fellowship, a fellowship granted as a mark of distinguished scholarship.

When we cease to long for perfection, corruption sure and speedy leads from life to death.—William Morris.

THE MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The thirty-fifth annual meeting of the Midland Christian Union of Presbyterian, Unitarian, and other non-subscribing churches was held in the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, on Monday the 10th inst. The proceedings began with the business meeting, held in the church at 11. At 1.15 the ministers and delegates were entertained at luncheon at the Great Western Hotel by the members of the Church of the Messiah. At 3.15 there was a conference in the church on "Modern Methods in Relation to Temperance Reform," opened by Professor J. H. Muirhead, M.A., of Birmingham University. At 5 all present were entertained at tea in the schoolroom, and at 7 there was service in the church, the preacher being Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., of Warrington. All the meetings were largely attended, the largest attendance being at the conference in the afternoon.

The Rev. L. P. Jacks presided over the business meeting at the outset. Subsequently the new president, Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, occupied the chair. The minutes of the last meeting having been taken as read, a like course was adopted with reference to the committee's report for the year, which had been distributed among ministers and delegates.

The report notes the large number of changes affecting the churches of the district. Early in the year Rev. J. B. Higham and Rev. A. Ryland entered upon the work at Wolverhampton and Stratford-on-Avon respectively. Rev. F. A. Homer has resigned West Bromwich; Rev. P. Dean, Walsall; Rev. A. W. Timmis, Stourbridge; Rev. J. Howard, Tamworth. At the end of the year Rev. T. A. Gorton became minister at Small Heath.

As regards the Union itself it has been without a president during the year, but the committee were glad to be allowed to nominate Mr. W. Byng Kenrick for the ensuing year. Mr. J. A. Kenrick, treasurer for the past six years, had felt compelled to retire; Dr. James Russell had consented to accept the arduous office.

A series of special week-night services were held in the autumn under the auspices of the Union at Small Heath, Stratford-on-Avon, Walsall, Warwick, Whitchurch, and Wolverhampton, and they had been so far successful that it was suggested to continue and extend the effort. The Lay Preachers' Association has done an increased amount of good work; its members have conducted 109 services as compared with 39 in the previous year.

Great regret is expressed at the resignation, in the course of the year, by the Rev. Joseph Wood of his position as vice-president, as a protest on principle against the adoption by the committee of the suggestion made by the B. and F.U.A. that the Union should ask the various churches of the district to send particulars of their endowments, that a record might be kept by the Union for the sake of security—and that, if the congregation had no objection, a copy of the statement might be sent to Essex Hall. The report bore testimony that for sixteen years Mr. Wood had been prominently identified with the work of the Union, and recorded the committee's sense of the earnestness and value of his services.

Dr. J. Russell submitted the report of the treasurer, an office which he had held for only two months. The balance-sheet, he pointed out, showed for the last year's working a deficit of £51. That, however, did not really express the real state of affairs, because certain sums (£37 10s.) were voted at the end of the previous year, which really belonged to this year. The deficit on the present year's working was, therefore, very considerable. So far as he could gather, their expenditure seemed likely to be greater during the ensuing year rather than less. So that unless they obtained a considerable increase on the income of the Union they would next year have to face a serious deficit. A deficit of £100 would, he emphasised, be a serious matter, considering the limited funds at their disposal.

The Chairman moved that the report of the committee and statement of accounts be adopted, printed, and circulated. He was, he said, only in the character of a stop-gap chairman. For some time the Union had been without a president, but he was glad to say that the position was to be filled that day. The year had been one of great difficulty in the Union; there had been difficulties without and difficulties within. They in that Union had, however, been accustomed for so many years to have a difficult work that he thought he could say that the addition of one or two new difficulties did not make very much difference. Therefore they had to be thankful that a measure of vigour and courage had been given to them, which had enabled them to go on with their work, and to achieve certain results. He thought the right attitude of mind for them to take was, not of complaining that they had not been able to do more, but of thankfulness that they had been able to do anything at all. Yet, he did not want to boast. He thought that a work of that kind was a work which must always be done under certain stress of difficulty, and they must not expect from them brilliant or astounding results. He thought they might truthfully say that at the present time the condition of the Midland Christian Union was somewhat critical. For a long time they had been trenching upon their capital resources, and the time would come when those resources would be at an end. That, of course, was unless a much larger measure of support was accorded to them by the laity of the district than had hitherto been received. They would certainly have to curtail the range of their operations. That was a possibility to which he looked forward with the utmost reluctance and pain: he did not believe that the laity would allow that possibility to be realised. But whatever change for the better was to take place in the work of the Union they must begin, he believed, with a change in the spirit of the Union itself. He thought that the time had now come when they might make an appeal in all frankness and earnestness to the members to pocket any little differences of opinion that might exist, to lay aside small personal prejudices about this or that detail, and heartily to co-operate for the general objects which the Union had in view. For a long time—ever since he had been connected with the Union—they had suffered from a superfluity of candid friends, and he could not help feeling that the work of the Union had been considerably retarded, and the lives of those who had that work to do considerably burdened, by an amount, of petty criticism about this and that which had constantly been levelled against them. They did get tired sometimes of merely standing up to be shot at, and he appealed to their friends who had played the part of candid critics—perhaps a little longer than they ought to have done—to adopt a more cordial and sympathetic attitude of mind towards their work. What they wanted in the Union was not criticism; they had had enough of that for years. They wanted less criticism and more money. If those who had been so lavish of their criticism for years past would now turn round and become equally lavish of their money, they would get on splendidly, and they would have a better record to show next year. Speaking of the chief difficulties which they had had to face, the greatest lay in the fact that at the beginning of the year they were confronted by an unusual number of empty pulpits. Five were vacated during the year—Stourbridge, Small Heath (which had been vacant for some time), Walsall, West Bromwich, and Tamworth. He was happy to say that these vacancies had, for the most part, been filled. He understood that an appointment had been made at West Bromwich of a minister whose name would command great respect in the district—he meant Mr. E. A. Voysey. From what he knew of him by repute, he spoke for all the ministers of the district when he extended to him a very cordial welcome. The Small Heath vacancy had been filled by the appointment of the Rev. T. A. Gorton, to whom, he wished also, on behalf of the Union, to extend a warm welcome. Referring to West Bromwich they regretted exceedingly the loss of the Rev. F. A. Homer, who was retiring from that pulpit, and leaving behind him a name and reputation which was much to be envied. He had gained the affection of his people, and it was to their great sorrow that he left them. There was still another vacancy of which he desired to speak—not of pulpit, but of official position. They had been without a president, but that state of things was to be ended. The committee had to propose for their acceptance the name of Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, as president of the Union. Speaking for himself he should be prepared to accord to that gentleman most hearty support, and he believed he would be a capable and respected leader. His name was sufficient to carry weight with them all. As regards the treasurership, the Union had great cause to congratulate itself upon the appointment of Dr. James Russell.

Mr. George Titterton seconded the resolution. He did not know, he said, if he had been asked to second the resolution as a candid friend, although he was among those who had felt that the Midland Christian Union had never filled the place which it ought to have filled, at any rate in recent years. The report contained many interesting matters—some of prime importance. It was a record of financial decay, but there was a suggestion that the Phœnix would yet rise from its ashes. There was a good deal of natural lament, but there was also a note of hope. It seemed that the Midland Christian Union had arrived at its low-water mark, but it also seemed to suggest that there was coming a flood which would carry them into brighter days. The new president would, doubtless, do much in furtherance of the Union, but neither he nor the Angel Gabriel could make the Union successful unless there was a better, a nobler, and more self-sacrificing spirit in the laity devoted to the cause which the Union represented. There was, he observed, in the report a reference to the lay-preachers, and that a large number of services have been held by them. In his opinion they might make yet further use of their lay-preachers and so greatly strengthen the common work of the churches.

In reply to a delegate, the CHAIRMAN stated that the Rev. Joseph Wood had resigned his position as a vice-president, but he still continued to be a subscriber. The money at the bank (£238) was uninvested capital, and in view of present financial claims the committee was not in a position to invest that capital.

The Rev. J. C. STREET (Shrewsbury) said he did not share the view that there was any crisis in the history of the Union. He did not think that they were in very low water, or that there were signs anywhere of great decadence. The subscription list of the Union was larger than it had been for many years. It was within a few pounds of the largest amount that they had ever had, and though it was a small subscription list, and most inadequately represented their various churches, it did not indicate any falling off of their friends in regard to the Union. It did, however, suggest whether they could not all do a great deal more than they were doing. He should not like their friends or the public to understand that the Union was in a parlous or perilous position. He did not think it was. The difficulties of the year had been extraordinarily great, and he thought they might take satisfaction to themselves that they had got through them as they had. He thought they owed a great debt of gratitude to the lay preachers. They had rendered exceptional aid in carrying out the work of the Union, and he desired to pay honour to the Rev. Rudolf Davis, who had arranged this service, which had been of immense assistance to the weaker churches. What they would have done without him and his fine band of lay preachers he could not imagine, and as one on the outside, though a member of the committee, he desired to bear testimony of great respect both to Mr. Davis and the gentlemen who had been associated with him in supplying the pulpits during a time of great difficulty. He sympathised with the concluding observations of Mr. Titterton. He felt that they were wanting baptism of a higher spirit. There were great openings for them, opportunities for usefulness, and if they had the true spirit of consecration and devotion they would go on to better things in the future. Mr. Street concluded with an expression of regret that there had been a withdrawal from their ranks of one of the best and bravest men among them—the Rev. Joseph Wood. A matter of grave principle was brought before the committee; and he was in thorough accord with the protest made by Mr. Wood. He (Mr. Street) had remained on the committee and intended to do so if desired. He could not, however, help feeling that Mr. Wood's withdrawal from co-operation, even for a time, was to be regretted.

Mr. TITTERTON intimated that it was his intention to re-nominate Mr. Wood, and he had reason for the belief that he would again accept office.

The Rev. J. B. HIGHAM (Wolverhampton), said he did not think the Union was moribund; it merely had certain ailments. He thought that one of the best ways of moving forward was by using the services of lay preachers. At Wolverhampton, where he was single-handed, the lay preachers would be of immense help. He hoped to take his part in services at the workhouse, but without lay preachers he would be prevented doing so.

The resolution was then unanimously adopted.

Mr. T. W. RYLAND moved, and the Rev. A. A. CHARLESWORTH seconded, the election as president of Mr. W. Byng Kenrick.

The resolution was unanimously adopted, and the CHAIRMAN, in calling upon Mr. Byng Kenrick to occupy the chair, accorded him a warm welcome. He did so, he said, with peculiar pleasure, for Mr. Kenrick was a member of his own congregation, and late superintendent of the Sunday-school. They believed that his tenure of office would be faithful, vigorous and efficient, and successful in the highest sense.

The PRESIDENT, on taking the chair, acknowledged the compliment. He took great interest in the work of the Union, and would devote as much time as he could to it.

Mr. E. L. TYNDALL moved a vote of thanks to the officers for their services during the year. He believed Mr. Kenrick's known energy for work and organisation would be most valuable to the Union. £400 was not much, he said, to help their poorer churches during the year; but he felt that if the Union were properly known to the different churches a much larger measure of support would be given to its funds—particularly if they were acquainted with some of the struggling ministers—when they knew that educated gentlemen leaving college accepted £100 a year, which was a far less sum than a good clerk received. He thought it was necessary that a society like theirs should be energetic in obtaining funds to supplement such a meagre stipend. He was strongly of opinion that the lay preachers ought to be more supported. They should have a better position than at present.

The resolution, having been seconded by Mr. W. SMITH (Evesham) and adopted, a cordial vote of thanks was passed, on the motion of Mr. C. HARDING, in recognition of the valuable services of Mr. Archibald Kenrick as treasurer during the past six years.

The officers and committee were then appointed, the Rev. Joseph Wood being included among the vice-presidents.

An account of Professor Muirhead's paper and the discussion which ensued, and of Mr. Lummis's sermon, we must reserve until next week.

NORTH AND EAST LANCASHIRE UNITARIAN MISSION.

THE annual meeting of this Mission was held at Ainsworth on Tuesday, March 4, when there was a large attendance from the churches of the district.

In the afternoon service was held, conducted by the Rev. E. S. Hicks, of Bolton, when the sermon was preached by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, of Liverpool. Taking as text, Luke xv. 18, Mr. Armstrong said that it was because he had been somewhat stirred by something he read not very long ago that he wanted to proclaim once more the essence and the living power of the Gospel of Christ. What he had been reading was a sermon published by that popular, eloquent and earnest Congregational minister, Dr. R. F. Horton, of Hampstead, who had given a most heterodox and quite unrecognisable account of the doctrine of the Trinity. Dr. Horton said that Unitarianism surrendered the revelation of God in Christianity, and fell back on the revelation of God in Judaism. Unitarianism insisted, with every variety of insistance, on the revelation of God given by Christ—the revelation of the Father's accessibility to His children. The very essence of the Christianity, which was called Unitarian, was that it regarded the Fatherhood of God as so real, so close, that the human child was able to approach Him, enter into communion with Him, and fully realise the true essence of sonship with Him. If Dr. Horton had read at all the true spirit of Unitarianism he would have known, whether their theology was right or wrong, that they recognised that God was in their midst and open to approach every instant of their lives. Thus misrepresentation, however unintentional, could hardly go farther than it was carried in the few pages published by this popular Hampstead preacher. Allowing, for the moment, that the doctrine of the Trinity was to be found in the Gospels, Mr. Armstrong argued that if the Trinitarian theory were in the Gospels, it was only found there by a great deal of ingenuity. But the wonderful teaching of the Fatherhood was so very plain that he who ran could read.

The business meeting was subsequently held, Alderman T. HOLT in the chair; the report, which was taken as read, being presented by the Rev. R. T. HERFORD. Our recent Provincial Letter from Mr. Herford gave an account of the work of the district. The report and balance-sheet having been adopted, the rest of the ordinary business was transacted, and Mr. W. Healy of Heywood was elected President.

After tea a public meeting was held in the schoolroom, Alderman T. HOLT again presiding.

The CHAIRMAN said he was very glad they had had a fine day for their meeting at Cockey Moor, and that there had been a good attendance. Among those who helped to start the Unitarian Mission was the late John Wright, of Bury, who took a great interest in it; and who was an able organiser, and greatly to him was indebted the work which that mission had done. Since its commencement it had had its ups and downs; it had been in difficulties, and it had worked out of them, and he hoped it would work out of the difficulties in which it was at present. There was no doubt the Mission had done good work, but there was plenty of room for it to extend its boundaries and to go into very large towns, even in this part of the country, where at present they had no stand. They were still moved by the same great principles which actuated those who began that Mission, they believed that they had a great and a grand mission for the people if they could only get them to think on Unitarian lines. It was an individual religion. They wanted people to thoroughly understand, to hold fast to that which was good, and prove all things as a satisfaction to themselves. They thought that they were right, they did not say that other people were wrong; they tried to reason out and stand by what they believed to be the truth. They had a noble sense of duty, doing what they believed to be right; being good and doing right, not for fear of hell or any reward of heaven, but doing right because it was right. The speaker went on to urge that their students should be taught how to preach extempore sermons before leaving college, in order that their principles might be put before the people in a forcible and eloquent manner.

Addresses were also given by the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, J. A. Pearson and B. C. Constable and Mr. W. Hayes.

LIVERPOOL DISTRICT MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

The annual meeting of the Liverpool District Missionary Association was held in the Ullet-road Church Hall on Wednesday, March 5, the Rev. L. de B. Klein, president, in the chair. Among those present were the Revs. C. H. Wellbeloved, H. W. Hawkes, W. J. Jupp, E. W. Lummis, R. S. Redfern, J. M. Mills, H. D. Roberts, and A. L. Smith, Mrs. George Holt, Miss O. M. Rawlins, Messrs. C. W. Jones, A. S. Thew, R. Robinson, P. H. Holt, H. Jevons, J. Burton, W. J. Pidgeon, C. S. Jones, and Major Evans.

Apologies for non-attendance were received from the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, J. C. Hirst, J. Crossley, and A. E. Parry.

The President, in moving the adoption of the report and balance-sheet, spoke very highly of the work that had been done by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, the Association's missionary, at Garston, Widnes, St. Helens, and Runcorn. At Widnes the difficulties which arose owing to their being turned out of the only suitable room in the town had been met by building a comfortable iron church which was in every way suitable, and they were hopeful of the work proving a success. At St. Helens the week-night lectures were well attended, the audience averaging over 100, and a further series are now being held. The sad point to be mentioned was with regard to Crewe, where the committee had to deal kindly but firmly, for it was felt that the minister, for whom they had the greatest admiration and regard, was working to his utmost, but that the congregation were not helping him as they should. They hoped that the congregation would realise its duties and responsibilities, and before long be working with renewed vigour. With regard to Bootle and Liscard there was little to say, for they were both progressing steadily and satisfactorily, and they were to be congratulated upon what they had each achieved.

Mr. Charles W. Jones, in seconding, said that in his opinion they had taken the right step at Crewe in facing what they had for a long time felt was unsatisfactory, and he hoped in time that matters would be put on a more satisfactory basis. He advocated carrying forward the work in new centres, but it should be in such a building as had been erected at Widnes, in a central prominent position, which should be suitable and attractive, and then, if there were no response by the residents of the neighbourhood, it could be easily removed elsewhere. He was glad to have been at the opening service at Widnes, and to have seen the healthy and encouraging signs of future usefulness there, and considered it one of the most hopeful signs of life of this Association, due very largely to the work of their missionary. He was glad to point to the success achieved by the conversion of the Hamilton-road buildings to the purposes of a Domestic Mission, and thought that more good might be done in that way by using churches (previously not very satisfactory) as Domestic Missions or closing them altogether and devoting their energies to other more promising places.

The Rev. E. W. Lummis moved :—

That in receiving the reports of the Rev. R. Stewart Redfern, J. Morley Mills, and A. E. Parry this Association expresses its cordial appreciation of the efforts they have made during the past year in their respective districts; and that the report of their missionary, the Rev. H. D. Roberts, makes it more evident how much a missionary was required, and also how fully and satisfactorily the Rev. H. D. Roberts has entered into the spirit of the work of the Association.

He expressed the feeling of the whole Committee of the Association in cordially thanking Mr. Redfern for his persevering hard work at Crewe under almost insuperable difficulties, and dwelt upon the work that Mr. Roberts had been doing in full justification of the course they had taken in appointing a missionary.

Mr. A. S. Thew seconded, and the Revs. R. S. Redfern, J. M. Mills, and H. D. Roberts replied.

The Rev. H. W. Hawkes moved the appointment of the Committee for the ensuing year, which Mr. Pidgeon seconded; and the meeting was brought to a close by a vote of thanks to the President, moved by Mr. R. Robinson, seconded by Mr. F. Cook.

MANSFORD STREET CHURCH AND MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual meeting of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, was held on Thursday evening, March 6, at Mansford-street, the chair being taken by the Rev. Joseph Wood, of the Old Meeting, Birmingham.

Mr. Stanton W. Preston read the Committee's report.

The report noted that as the owner of the ground-rent would not sell, the Redemption Fund, including £500 from the Permanent Chapel Building Fund, and made up to an additional £1,000 by transferring £47 17s. 4d. from Mission capital, had been vested in Trustees. The proceeds did not, however, meet the whole charge, which would be covered if friends would provide another £500. The placing of a memorial tablet in the Chapel to the late Rev. C. L. Corkran, was recorded, to the cost of which the congregation and old members of the Spicer-street Mission had contributed. The report referred with great regret to the resignation of the Rev. W. G. Cadman (on account of his wife's health), "after nearly nine years of faithful and untiring labours," and bore warm testimony to the value of his work and that of his family. The approaching settlement of the Rev. John Ellis, of Sheffield, in April, was looked forward to with good hope. The report also dwelt upon the need for more helpers and additional pecuniary support.

Mr. J. G. Foster read the chapel committee's report, which gave particulars of a large amount of active work and noted that during Mr. Cadman's ministry the church membership had risen from 53 to 90, with a corresponding increase in the amount raised by collections and subscriptions.

The Rev. W. G. Cadman, in his report, said that at no time since his settlement had the evening service been better attended, nor had the Sunday-school had a larger average attendance. They had largely overcome the difficulty of retaining elder scholars, the chief factor in their success being personal interest in the individual scholars, not confined to the Sunday, but finding frequent opportunities of intercourse during the week. In addition to Miss Garrett's meeting for women, and that for men conducted by Mr. Christmas, they had some 50 scholars over sixteen, nearly 20 of whom were young men. There was a great opportunity in the school, and with more helpers, including an afternoon superintendent, they could look for even greater success in the near future. Having given particulars of the valuable Provident Society and Convalescent work, Mr. Cadman referred in the following terms to his approaching departure :—

In closing this report, I am reminded how near is the time when I shall leave the work to which you called me nearly nine years ago. I do not leave it without much regret; I am conscious of shortcomings and mistakes. It is a work different in some respects from that to which I had been used. It is a work into which it is impossible fully to enter at a plunge. It takes time to get to know and to win the confidence of one's neighbours, and till this is done one's influence is small. With every additional year, new interests are formed and new influences opened up. My experience is that the longer one engages in work of this kind, the more one loves it and the greater his possibility of doing good.

With a word of cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Ellis the report concluded with grateful thanks to the Committee and all fellow-workers, and heartfelt wishes for the future.

Miss L. Jones, as Treasurer, presented the statement of accounts, giving particulars of the Ground Rent Fund above alluded to, and showing in the general account receipts amounting to £398 4s. 6d., £22 10s. withdrawn from capital for special repairs, and a deficit of £47 11s. 2d., showing the serious need of more regular subscribers.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, congratulated the members on the great activity shown in that work; but while they had many reasons for encouragement it was difficult to escape depression when they thought of the mass of poverty and vice around them, and the great tide of evil which, after all their efforts, seemed constantly to rise to the same level. They must take a larger view and look at England as a whole. Then they would see there had been wonderful progress in the life of the people; not indeed in the submerged tenth, but in the great artizan class, whose labours "maintain the fabric of the world." The children were better fed and clothed and taught; there were shorter hours of work and more means for wholesome recreation. While they must deplore many things—gambling, which was becoming as great a curse as drink, apathy on public questions, the passion for sport—yet the balance was on the side of the good, and they might thank God and take courage.

Never in the history of England had there been such healthy public spirit on the subjects with which they were concerned, never so many earnest men and women devoting themselves with enthusiasm of humanity not simply to the relief of distress, but, if it might be, to the uprooting of some of its causes. The chief work of their missions must still be the uplifting of individuals, the rescue of the perishing, but at the same time they must search out the causes of that misery, and if possible cut off the entail. All true improvement must indeed come from within, and they must continue to take man by man, and house by house. But it was "illpreaching to a man on an empty stomach," and there must be some change in the environment of thousands before they could expect any improvement. In the frightfully overcrowded dwellings of the poor it was idle to expect modesty; and while people flocked from the country to the town, and the wages, especially of women, were so terribly low, there was an inevitable drift into debt, drink, and degradation. They must make life on the land once more attractive, with a fair measure of hope and sustenance; and the drink traffic must be attacked by large public action. Every mission committee should be a vigilant committee, a sanitary committee, a committee on housing reform, to collect data, and face the larger problems, to influence public opinion with regard to those deep-seated causes of evil against which their missions had to fight.

Mr. E. F. GRUNDY, in seconding the resolution, noted with pleasure the hopefulness of Mr. Cadman's report, and reminded the meeting how little of the minister's best work could be put into a report.

The Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS moved, and Mr. A. THOMPSON seconded, the appointment of the Committee, and Mr. Edwards, in urging the need for more workers, deplored the lack of self-sacrifice and consecration in the present generation of young people in our churches. If they could only know something of the joy of self-denial they would be eager to come forward to help in that work.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE moved a resolution of warm appreciation of the untiring services of the Rev. W. G. Cadman and the members of his family. As an old friend of twenty-six years' standing, he bore testimony to the singleness of purpose and devotion of heart and mind with which Mr. Cadman had worked. Speaking of the life of the poor, after a long experience, first living amongst them, and afterwards in what was called a respectable suburb, he believed there was more genuine appreciation of the good gifts of life, and certainly more self-sacrifice and genuine kindliness towards one another, among the poor than among those other people, and he was not disposed to take a dark view of life. He fully agreed with the chairman that there were two sides to their work, and Mr. Cadman had not forgotten it, but had done admirable work in charity organisation, as a school-manager, and in other municipal efforts. During the last ten years he was convinced there had been a great improvement in London. The manners of the children were improved, and the last census proved that the overcrowding was not so bad as it had been. He thought he saw a slackening in the enthusiasm for University settlement work, because people had expected to see results too quickly, and that interest must be revived, for it was the surest way to secure the improvement at which they aimed. Mr. Cadman had worked there in the largest spirit of helpfulness; many lives uplifted and characters moulded for good bore witness to what he had done.

Mr. E. B. SQUIRE very cordially seconded the resolution, which was as cordially adopted.

A vote of thanks to the chairman, moved by the Rev. EDGAR DAPLYN, and seconded by the Rev. V. D. DAVIS, brought the meeting to a close.

MR. GEORGE MEREDITH AND THE WAR.

SIR,—I have to thank you for your courteous reply to my "humble inquiries." I admit that the name of Mr. George Meredith gives importance to whatever he writes; but all the more censurable is he on that account if he writes recklessly or falsely. I am not an Englishman, but I am shocked to see one of Mr. Meredith's standing hurling charges of "fruitless butcheries" and "insensate inhumanity" against his countrymen, in the face of such clear evidence to the contrary. The appeal to Lord Salisbury, at least, shows a distrust of our Commander-in-Chief which, I think, nothing has occurred to justify. ROBERT B. DRUMMOND.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Belfast Domestic Mission.—The annual meeting was held on Feb. 28, in All Souls' Church, and on the following Sunday the annual sermons were preached by the Rev. H. Gow, of Leicester. There was a large attendance at the annual meeting, over which Mr. Adam Duffin presided, among those present being the Revs. H. Gow, W. H. Drummond, J. A. Kelly, T. Dunkerley, R. J. Orr, A. Ashworth, and Dr. H. S. Mellone. Mr. G. J. Slipper, the missionary, presented an interesting report on his work, the value of which was cordially recognised, and thanks were accorded prospectively to Mr. Gow for his services.

Bolton: Bank-street.—The Rev. E. S. Hicks, M.A., has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to stay for a third year as assistant minister to the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B. The congregation having used the "Seven Services for Public Worship" for twelve months once a Sunday, have definitely resolved to substitute them for the "Ten Services of Public Prayer."

Cwmbach: South Wales.—The annual meetings of the Unitarian Church were held on Sunday and Monday, March 9 and 10, when the sermons were preached by the Revs. T. J. Jenkins, Gellionen, and W. Tudor Jones, Swansea. The devotional part of Sunday evening service was taken by the Rev. H. Robinson, Abercynon, and that of Monday evening by the Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., Aberdare. At this service the Rev. D. Rees, Rhondda, and the Rev. W. Jenkin Davies and Mrs. Davies, Belfast, were also present. The congregations throughout were good, the splendid sermons delivered were listened to with rapt attention. It is to be hoped that the good seed sown will bear fruit in due season.

Elland (Resignation).—The Rev. James Taylor has resigned the pulpit of Elland Chapel, and will relinquish his ministry at the end of the present month.

Guildford.—On Sunday, March 9, the services were conducted and the sermons preached by the Rev. T. W. Freckleton, whose friendly and inspiring voice, familiar to many, was welcome to all, through moving addresses which will be remembered for long by all who heard them.

Liverpool: Hope-street Church.—On Tuesday evening last the annual special service for young people was conducted by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. There was an excellent attendance, and those present joined very heartily in the service, and appeared to be genuinely interested in the address. Mr. Armstrong spoke from the words, "The fear of the Lord maketh a merry heart," and dwelt on the fact that a real religious faith is the true condition of life-long cheerfulness and gladness, and even of the spirit of merriment, while the direct and exclusive pursuit of pleasure and amusement led to discontent and weariness and life-long disappointment. He expressed his earnest desire to be a helper to those who were growing into manhood and womanhood, and pleaded with them to be his helpers, too. The south transept, in which the little congregation was gathered, was beautifully decorated by loving hands.

London: Stratford.—A Twentieth Century Pledge Signing Crusade Meeting was held in the schoolroom on Monday evening, March 3, in connection with the Stratford Unitarian Church Temperance Guild and Band of Hope, under the auspices of the National Unitarian Temperance Association. The chair was taken by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, who was supported by the Rev. R. H. Greaves, of Highgate (late of Troy, U.S.A.), Mr. Chancellor, of Highgate, Mr. A. W. Harris, Joint Secretary of the Association, and others. There was a very good attendance, a number of strangers being present. The Chairman spoke of the importance of effort in combating the evils of drink. All classes are affected by it, and even some who profess to be religious Christian men and women are debased by it. The Rev. R. H. Greaves said he had attended many temperance meetings before, but this was the first Unitarian Temperance meeting he had ever been present at. He reminded the audience of the text from St. James: "To him that knoweth to do right and doeth it not, to him it is sin." Is alcohol a good thing? Those who believe that it is not, and yet refuse to help in the cause of temperance, are deliberate sinners. Health is injured by the use of alcohol. Dr. B. W. Richardson has proved by experiment that the heart is made to do excessive work, and is deprived of necessary rest by the use of alcohol. Total abstinence often means a bright intelligent old age, as against the physical and mental debility of the habitual drinker. Alcohol deprives many of necessary food and clothing, and many of the wretchedly poor would be in better circumstances but for its use. The drink trade may employ a great number of persons, but if industrial pursuits were substituted, a greater number would be employed, and there would be increased prosperity. He instanced a brewery in America employing twelve men which was closed, the building being subsequently turned into a factory employing 100 men. With the reduction of the drink traffic there would be fewer paupers, fewer criminals, less taxation, less poverty and wretchedness. Politics and social life would be purer. Mr. Greaves illustrated his remarks by reference to his experiences in America, and closed by quoting Lowell's lines—"Once to every man and nation." Mr. Chancellor and Mr. W. J. Noel also spoke. Several fresh pledges were taken.

London: Wandsworth.—The annual meeting of the church was held on Wednesday evening, when there was a very good attendance. Mr. A. W. Biggs, who presided, drew attention to the loss by death of several members who had long and generously helped the church, and he urged the members to endeavour to supply, as far as possible, the void thus created in their ranks. The balance-sheet was presented by Mr. Hugh James (treasurer), and the report by Mr. H. B. Lawford (secretary), and both showed much cause for gratification. In the course of the evening's business, Mr. J. F. Schwann expressed doubt as to the wisdom of sending delegates to the Provincial Assembly, where matters about which strong differences of opinion existed had been introduced without notice, to the disadvantage of the proper business of the Assembly. It was ultimately decided to nominate delegates, but to ask the Assembly's Committee to furnish the congregation in advance with an agenda paper showing the resolutions which would be submitted. A vote of thanks to the minister (the Rev. W. G. Tarrant) was passed by acclamation, and in responding he pointed out that the congregation was now entering on its twenty-first year, and should endeavour to make it more vigorous and useful than any year in the past.

Manchester: Pendleton.—On March 3 Mr. John Harwood, a member of the church, gave an excellent recital in the schoolroom, to a crowded house. On Saturday, March 8, the annual congregational meeting was held. Twenty-two new members joined the church during the year, and seven names disappeared from the roll of membership owing to death and removal from the district. There has been a steady increase in number of subscribers and total amount of subscriptions during the last three years; but the income from rents and other sources has decreased somewhat this year. The special effort fund instituted for the purpose of painting the school and purchasing new hymn-books, cushions, &c., amounts to £60 ; £40 more are required to complete the plans. The Rev. T. P. Spedding delivered an admirable illustrated lecture before the Literary Society on March 10, entitled "A Trip to the Transylvanian Unitarians." The heartiest vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Spedding, on the motion of the minister, the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, seconded by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin. The congregation have to mourn the death of the organist, Miss Annie Balshaw, L.R.A., which took place on the 6th inst., in her 22nd year. Miss Balshaw secured her diploma as Licentiate of the Royal Academy of Music in September, 1900, in organ-playing and theory of music, being the second lady and the youngest pupil in the kingdom to secure this diploma for organ-playing.

Preston.—The annual congregational tea-party took place at Percy-street on Monday last, March 10. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. S. Lee, J.P., who spoke of the satisfactory financial position of the chapel, and of the healthy condition of affairs generally. He extended a cordial welcome to Mr. W. Haslam, J.P., and family, who had recently taken sittings. The Rev. N. Anderton, B.A., made reference to the death of the Rev. Joseph Harrison, and spoke of the year just past as a very eventful one for himself. He took the opportunity to thank the congregation most warmly, on behalf of his wife and himself, for their kind gift at the time of his marriage. He spoke of the year's work as on the whole satisfactory. The marked improvement in the amount of pew rents noted in the previous year had been maintained and slightly increased, and the total amount raised by the congregation for various purposes throughout the year was most creditable. He united with Mr. Lee in extending a hearty welcome to the new members of the congregation. Their motto was religion before doctrine. Their fellowship, a fellowship in the worship of God and the service of man.

Southend-on-Sea.—At the weekly meeting of the Social Union on Wednesday evening, the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, B.A., of Hackney, gave an interesting recital of selections from Tennyson, Browning, Kipling, and others. The recitals were interspersed with songs by Miss Hyde, which were very well rendered. There was a large and appreciative audience present, on whose behalf Mr. Dear, at the close of the entertainment, expressed a hearty vote of thanks.

Swansea.—It is with great regret that we record the passing away of Mrs. James Rosser, in her 85th year. Mrs. Rosser had been connected with the church for nearly eighty years. Her reminiscences of Unitarianism in Swansea during the first half of the nineteenth century were very interesting. She was a character admired by all who knew her. Another prominent young member, Mr. W. B. Hughes, passed away in his 33rd year. He was the son of the late Rev. W. B. Hughes, Unitarian minister, of Cefn. Mr. Hughes was superintendent of the Sunday-school as well as local treasurer of the British and Foreign Association. He leaves a widow and three little girls to mourn his loss. References will be made next Sunday morning by the Rev. W. Tudor Jones to the memory of both.

York.—On Sunday evening last, at the end of the service, the Rev. H. Rawlings made allusion to the recent death of Dr. Vance Smith. Special mention was made of his long association with St. Saviour-gate Chapel, in his capacity as minister, and of his work as a member of the New Testament Revision Company. On the following morning the Yorkshire Herald printed a summary of what was said.

Some Opinions of the Press.

"We can promise the intending reader that he will find in Mr. Mellone a theologian singularly free from prejudice or bias, and a logician of great lucidity and no little dialectical skill. Such a book as this—brief, spirited, and scholarly—is bound to stimulate thought, and may be of direct service to that broad-minded and sincere religious enthusiasm which can accept Newman and Martineau, Comte and Browning, with equal interest, finding in each some broken light of that evasive truth towards which the thought and imagination of the ages are ever slowly but surely progressing."—The Academy and Literature.

"Mr. Mellone approaches his task with so much philosophical acumen, and with so penetrating an insight into the significance of the speculations which have most influence on contemporary thought, that his work could not fail to instruct and stimulate any attentive reader."—The Scotsman.

"The book is written with great ability, and is specially memorable for its interpretation of Browning's contribution to the solution of the supreme problem."—The Glasgow Herald.

"Mr. Mellone gives us a masterly analysis of Newman's famous 'Grammar of Assent.' . . . His chapter on the philosophy of Browning displays an insight into and appreciation of Browning's position, which should in itself be sufficient to commend his book to a wide circle of readers."—The Irish Times (Dublin).

"We recommend Dr. Mellone's book to those who are interested in the philosophical and religious theories enshrined in the writings of the five great leaders of thought with whom the volume deals."—The Pall Mall Gazette.

THE BEST IS THE CHEAPEST.

New Church for Unitarian Congregation, ABERDEEN, N.B.

For sixty years the Congregation has struggled to exist and let its light shine amidst stern sectarian prejudices and strong social antipathies.

After long and painful experience of the hindrances to progress connected with the present habitation, an earnest effort has been made to acquire ground for a proper home, and a good site is now possessed.

The site is at the very centre of the city, stands open to important thoroughfares, and has near it some of the newest and finest buildings in the city; and in the immediate neighbourhood there is a numerous population of the kind likely to be influenced by the presence of a Unitarian Church.

Plans have been prepared with an idea of usefulness, and the result is a well-devised set of buildings, in which work of various kinds may be carried on effectively.

The cost of site and buildings, &c., will be £6,500. To meet this £2,500 will be got for present church, £500 will be raised by the Congregation, and £750 has been granted by the McQuaker Trustees. The additional sum required is £2,750. For that sum the members of the congregation are obliged to appeal to distant members of their household of faith, and other sympathisers.

They make their appeal anxiously, in view of their vocation as instruments of a liberalising religious movement in a Northern outpost, and having due regard to the desirability of having a modernised Church and other buildings as a centre of work in a growing University city.

Donations may be sent to the Rev. A. WEBSTER, 2, Mackie-place, Aberdeen, or to Mr. T. M. SPIBY, Treasurer, 92, Bonaccord-street, Aberdeen.

Mansford-street Church and Mission.

The following Resolutions were passed at the Thirteenth Annual Meeting of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, held at Mansford-street on Thursday, March 6th, 1902, the Rev. Joseph Wood in the chair. Reports read.

1. Moved by the Chairman, and seconded by Mr. E. F. Grundy:—
"That the reports now read be received, adopted, and printed for circulation, under the direction of the Committee."

2. Moved by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, and seconded by Mr. A. Thompson:—
"That the following ladies and gentlemen be the Committee and Officers for the ensuing year:—Mrs. Squire, Mrs. J. C. Drummond, Miss Norton, Rev. Dr. Herford, Rev. E. Daplyn, Sir E. Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P., Messrs. T. Adams, W. J. Clark, J. G. Foster, E. F. Grundy, H. B. Lee, and E. B. Squire. Treasurer, Miss L. Jones. Secretaries, Mr. S. W. Preston and Mr. J. E. Drummond. Auditors, Mr. Squire and Mr. Heald."

3. Moved by the Rev. W. C. Bowie, and seconded by Mr. Squire:—
"That this meeting desires to record their high appreciation of the untiring services of the Rev. W. G. Cadman and his family during the nine years he has been in charge, and of the manner in which he has overcome serious difficulties. They hope his example will induce others to come forward and assist some of the many agencies now being carried on."

4. Moved by Rev. E. Daplyn, and seconded by Rev. V. Davis:—
"That the best thanks of this meeting be given to the Rev. Joseph Wood for his kindness in coming from Birmingham to preside."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE preliminary advertisement of the anniversary meetings in Whit-week, which will be found in our present issue, shows a programme of great interest. It will be seen that the Sunday School Association, of which Lady O'Hagan is this year the President, again holds the first place, with a Tuesday morning meeting. In the evening the Essex Hall Lecture is to be given by Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, his subject being "Some Thoughts on Christology." The annual sermon of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association is to be preached in Little Portland-street Chapel on Wednesday morning by the Rev. Henry Gow, of the Great Meeting, Leicester, and at the Public Meeting in the evening the speakers will include Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mr. V. Tchertkoff, and the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, T. J. Hardy, and Frank Walters. The Conference on Thursday morning should prove of unusual value, as it is to consist of papers on "Types of Religious Experience," by the Revs. G. V. Crook, E. W. Lummis, L. de B. Klein, Alexander Webster, W. Wooding, and others. There will thus be no thought of discussion, but each speaker, having had formerly experience of the religious life of some other communion, will have the opportunity of bearing testimony to its worth, and contrasting its strong and weak points with the conditions of religious life among Unitarians. At the ministers' meeting on Thursday afternoon we are glad to see that Mr. Hodgson Pratt, the veteran advocate of Arbitration, has consented to read a paper on "Tentative suggestions as to some of the causes which have restricted the progress of Unitarian Churches."

THE following note appeared in the Daily News of March 10 :—

"We have much pleasure in announcing that the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke has consented, in response to the wishes of many friends, to undertake a six months' preaching ministry at Little Portland-street Chapel, Regent-street, beginning in October of the present year. Mr. Brooke's health has so much improved recently that he has felt able to engage in this extra work. The congregation at Little Portland-street and their minister, the Rev. H. S. Perris, M.A., are cordially co-operating in the scheme. Many old hearers of Mr. Brooke at Bedford Chapel and the innumerable admirers of his lectures and printed works will read this announcement with pleasure. Little Portland-street Chapel was formerly the scene of Dr. Martineau's London ministry, and is in a readily accessible part of Central London. Mr. Brooke will preach at the morning services."

IT is good news that comes with the March reports as to the condition of the Concentration Camps in South Africa. Thanks to the energetic measures which have been taken at the instance of the Colonial Secretary, there is a very great improvement in the death rate. Whereas in the dreadful months of October and November last year (according to figures given in the Manchester Guardian) the deaths per thousand were 338 and 284, in January they had sunk to 165, and in February to only 72. The number of deaths in October were 3,156, in February 638. The mortality of children under twelve shows a similar diminution, having been 2,633 in October, 2,271 in November and only 391 in February. The Natal camps have proved exceptionally healthy, where there are now over 18,000 of the people. Corrugated iron huts are to be substituted for tents, and every effort is being made to be prepared for the coming winter.

THE Jubilee of Owens College, Manchester, was marked on Wednesday week by the presence of the Prince and Princess of Wales, who opened the Whitworth Hall, and paid a high tribute to the public spirit of Manchester men, who had done so much to secure the great prosperity of the college. Subsequently at luncheon at the Town Hall, the Prince expressed his pleasure, as a sailor, that the first two cities he had visited as Prince of Wales should be Bristol, one of the oldest, and Manchester one of the youngest, of British ports, and ranking sixth among them. He congratulated Manchester on having found her sea legs. On the following day Lord Spencer, as Chancellor, presided at a presentation of honorary degrees. Among those who received the hon. Litt.D. were Dr. Alexander McLaren, the Dean of Manchester, and Mrs. Rylands, founder of the Rylands Library; among the hon. Doctors of Science were Principal Oliver Lodge and Professor J. H. Poynting of the Birmingham University.

THE annual gathering of the Evangelical Free Church Council at Bradford last week seems to have been thoroughly successful, some 1,100 delegates and 200 personal members taking part in the proceedings. The new president, Dr. W. J. Townsend, of Prestatyn, who belongs to the Methodist New Connection, took for the subject of his address "The Free Church of England: Its Divine Call." That Church, he said, must stand for righteousness in the State, in society, and in the home. Subsequently he referred to the education crisis, and maintained that the School Board system was a stronghold to be maintained against the Sacerdotalists. The system must not be abolished, but perfected.

WE have received from Mr. Frederick Jevons, chairman of the congregation of the Birkenhead Unitarian Church, the following resolution passed, with one dissentient, at a special general meeting held on Sunday, March 16 :—

That in view of the endless controversies arising out of religious teaching in Board Schools, this meeting desires to affirm its belief that the only satisfactory solution to the question lies in the exclusion of all religious teaching from the schools supported by municipal rates, and desires to impress upon all congregations the importance of extending their Sunday-school systems.

THE attention of all who are interested in the Guild movement is called to the advertisement of the first annual meeting of the National Conference Guilds' Union, to be held on Easter Tuesday at the Old Meeting, Birmingham, when an address will be given by the Rev. Joseph Wood, the President, and among the speakers will be Miss Edith Gittins and the Rev. J. J. Wright. In the evening a service will be held in the church, with addresses by the Revs. Charles Hargrove and Henry Gow.

ULLET-ROAD CHURCH, LIVERPOOL.

Mr. Gerald Moira's Decorative Work.

On the last Saturday in January the new Church Hall, given by Sir John Brunner and the late Mr. Henry Tate to the congregation of the Ullet-road Church, Liverpool, as a memorial of the donors' fathers, was formally presented; and in giving an account of the proceedings we quoted from the Liverpool Daily Post a description of the decoration of the library and vestry, by Mr. Gerald Moira, which is a further special gift of Sir John Brunner's.

Of this work a most interesting account will be found in an article by Dr. G. C. Williamson in the March number of The Artist, "an illustrated Monthly Record of Arts, Crafts, and Industries" (27, Chancery-lane, London, W.C. 1s.). Dr. Williamson's article is comprehensive in its scope, giving first a brief sketch of the chief forms of decorative art, as seen at Pompeii, Ravenna, and in later Italian work, and then lamenting the modern decadence under baleful mechanical and mercantile influences.

As to this he writes:—

> How seldom is an artist allowed to render the walls and rooms beautiful as they should be, with all the wealth of skill and device with which he has been equipped, and how bare and uninteresting are in consequence many of the greater buildings which have been and are being erected, when with the same outlay of means upon them they could be beautiful and delightful!
> How often is the artist hidebound by hard and fast rules; governed by a niggardly expenditure or by a want of real taste, and how often, too, it happens that the artist himself, not being a real craftsman, is unable to do the work which he ought to do and has to leave the execution of his own ideas to someone of lesser capability, because, forsooth, he cannot use the tools himself and can only prepare the drawings and leave the actual work to others.

But in Mr. Gerald Moira he recognises a genuine craftsman and artist,

> One of our rising artists, who in so many ways affords a fine example of the very reverse of what I have been lamenting and who so closely resembles the Italian artist of mediæval times in the variety and character of his personal work.

Examples of Mr. Moira's varied activity may be seen in moulded plaster-work at the Shoreditch Free Library, in the Mosaics of the King's Hall at the Holborn Restaurant, in the plaster decoration of the Bechstein Hall, in various church windows and in the Shakespeare Memorial at Stratford-on-Avon, and in the Frescoes now being produced in the Council Room of Lloyd's Registry in Fenchurch-street; but Dr. Williamson's article is chiefly concerned with the decorations of the Ullet-road Library, of which a number of illustrations are given, including some most interesting reproductions of the original studies for some of the figures.

One full-page illustration shows the six panels of the library ceiling, representing "The Triumph of Truth" rescued by Time from her four great enemies, Ignorance, Intolerance, Envy, and Calumny, and surrounded by some of the world's great teachers, of such various ages as Moses, Plato, St. Francis, Shakespeare, Newton, and Pestalozzi. Near the portrait of Pestalozzi, Dr. Williamson says:—

> The artist has wisely introduced the figure of Sir John Brunner, M.P., the donor of the work, who, in accordance with the charming tradition of the Old Masters, is represented in the allegorical picture which he has so generously presented.

Another full-page illustration shows, on a larger scale, the panel in which Moses is the central figure, with Luther, Milton, and others grouped about him, in quaint mediæval style.

The figure of Time upholding Truth is also shown, in a beautiful unfinished drawing, in which the artist first presents the "Naked Truth," to be afterwards clothed in becoming raiment. Among the first studies for figures is that of St. Francis, and the first coloured study for the head of "Luther" (shown in a full-page illustration) is particularly fine, though it appears to us the likeness of some other noble man, rather than of Luther.

Over the mantelpiece in the vestry there is a coloured bas-relief, representing the rising sun, and above it the inscription: "Then shall thy light break forth as the morning." Of this also there is an illustration in Dr. Williamson's article.

Thomas Pargeter's, of Foxcote, Charity.—The thirty-fifth annual meeting of the Trustees of this Charity, was held at the offices of Messrs. Harding and Goode, 32, Waterloo street, Birmingham, on the 17th inst. The following Trustees were present:—The Revs. E. D. Priestley Evans, Henry Eachus, E. P. Hall, J. B. Higham, L. P. Jacks, H. McKean, J. H. Matthews, A. H. Shelley, and Joseph Wood. The Rev. Henry McKean was elected chairman for the ensuing year, Mr. F. H. Jordan (of Lloyd's Bank, Limited) was appointed treasurer, the Revs. J. H. Matthews and J. B. Higham were appointed auditors, Mr. Charles Harding was re-appointed secretary, and Mr. Charles Copeley Harding was appointed deputy secretary. Eight vacancies in the list of annuitants occurred during the past year, six being elected to supply the vacancies, which were as many as the income so released would bear. The number of annuitants at present receiving benefit from the Charity is 104; of these ninety-four are entitled to £20 each, and ten being sisters receive £16 each per annum, by quarterly payments. The Trustees have, of late years, been able to materially increase the number of annuitants, owing to the contribution of liberal gifts by friends of the Charity, and also to the fact of a donation of £100 contributed annually to the funds for some years past by a friend of the Charity. These gifts bespeak the appreciation in which the Charity is held, and are an example which it is hoped may be followed by others. The number of applicants is exceedingly large, many of the cases of an urgent character. Applicants must be ladies, not less than fifty-five years of age, never having been married. In the selection of annuitants preference is given to candidates who have received the education and occupied the position of gentlewomen.

A COMMENDATION.

Sir,—May I call the attention of your readers to the advertisement headed "Education in Germany," which appears in your columns.

Parents sometimes find it extremely difficult to hear of a suitable home for young people whom they wish to send to Germany for general education or for special study of the language; and the difficulty is especially great when it is desired that the religious atmosphere of the foreign home should resemble that of the English home. For Unitarians the difficulty is met by Herr Schwarz, who is not only an experienced school-teacher but also an apostle of the liberal faith who has been compelled to withdraw from the ministry of the State Church of Baden on account of his courage and consistency.

I write particularly to say that his daughter, who is now in York, and whose acquaintance I have had the pleasure of making, may be returning home after Easter, and that any boys whom their parents wish to send could travel with her.

It is the angel-aim and standard in an act that consecrates it. He who aims for perfectness in a trifle is trying to do that trifle holily. The trier wears the halo, and therefore the halo grows as quickly round the brows of peasant as of king. This aspiration to do perfectly—is it not religion practicalised? The smallest roadside pool has its water from heaven and its gleam from the sun, and can hold the stars in its bosom, as well as the great ocean. Even so the humblest man or woman can live splendidly.—W. C. Gannett.

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

THE meeting of the donors and subscribers to this Fund, adjourned from Feb. 26 to complete the consideration and adoption of the constitution and by-laws, and to elect the first managers and officers, was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday afternoon, the President, the Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, in the chair. There were also present Mr. J. Cogan Conway (hon. secretary of the Special Committee), Mrs. Bartram, Miss M. C. Martineau, Miss A. L. Browne, the Misses E. J. and L. K. Garrett, Messrs. W. Colfox, David Martineau, J. Harrison, F. Monks, W. Blake Odgers, K.C., T. Grosvenor Lee, Ion Pritchard, T. P. Young, Howard Young, A. T. Young, A. Wilson, and Bryan Johnson, the Revs. W. C. Bowie, A. A. Charlesworth, V. D. Davis, A. Farquharson, F. K. Freeston, H. Gow, J. E. Odgers, W. C. Pope, W. H. Rose, F. W. Stanley, J. E. Stronge, F. Summers, W. G. Tarrant, Joseph Wood, and W. Wooding. Mr. Wooding's name should also have been in the list of those present on Feb. 26. Altogether, at the two meetings, fifty-six donors and subscribers took part in the proceedings.

At the meeting on Feb. 26, as recorded in THE INQUIRER of March 1, the first seven clauses of the constitution had been adopted, practically determining its chief features; and the remainder of the constitution, with the bye-laws, was adopted on Wednesday, though not without a good deal of discussion on matters of detail.

In modification of the constitution as drafted, it was determined that while the general meetings of the Fund are to be triennial, at the time of the meeting of the National Conference, a report and statement of accounts shall be bublished annually. As regards possible alterations of rules, the decision was that these should be made only at a triennial general meeting, to be confirmed at a further general meeting held not less than three months afterwards, and provided that not less than thirty persons be present at each meeting.

When the whole of the constitution had been adopted, the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD moved, and the Rev. J. EDWIN ODGERS seconded:—

That the constitution now adopted by the donors and subscribers be referred to the National Conference for approval.

Mr. WOOD pleaded that as the Conference had originated the movement for the establishment of this Fund, and a committee of the Conference had appealed for donations and had conducted the whole business, it would be discourteous, as well as unfair, not to submit the constitution to that body for confirmation; and that was the view strongly taken by the Conference committee at its last meeting. [The resolution of the Conference committee is reported by the secretary in a letter in our present issue.]

Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS said that as a matter of course they, as a special committee of that body, should report to the Conference what had been done, but as a matter of law those who had given the money must determine its object and the method of administration.

The CHAIRMAN pointed out that even if they submitted the constitution to the Conference, no vote of that body could alter what had now been determined.

On a show of hands, nine votes were given for the motion and a large majority against.

The by-laws were then considered, and with modifications adopted. These determine, among other things, the particulars of the ministers' insurance, to secure an annuity of £52 or £104 after reaching the age of sixty-five, and, if desired, a further insurance of £250, with or without profits, at death. The Fund to share in the payment of premiums, under certain conditions.

On the motion of Mr. W. COLFOX, seconded by the Rev. W. WOODING, the following first managers were then elected:—The Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter, C. J. Street, W. G. Tarrant, and D. Walmsley; Messrs. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, T. Alfred Colfox, John Harrison, J. Cogan Conway, C. Sydney Jones, William Long, David Martineau, and W. Blake Odgers, K.C.

On the motion of Mr. T. GROSVENOR LEE, seconded by Mr. HOWARD YOUNG, the Rev. J. E. Carpenter was elected chairman, Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke treasurer, and Mr. J. Cogan Conway hon. secretary.

On the motion of Mr. J. COGAN CONWAY, seconded by the Rev. F. W. STANLEY, the following were elected trustees:—Messrs. David Ainsworth, Howard Chatfeild Clarke, F. J. Kitson, and Oswald Nettlefold.

On the motion of Mr. ION PRITCHARD, seconded by the Rev. A. FARQUHARSON, Mr. Harold Wade and Mr. Bryan Johnson were elected auditors.

Mr. F. MONKS then moved, and Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS seconded, a vote of thanks to Mr. Carpenter for presiding, which was carried by loud and long continued acclamation, acknowledging not only his services at that meeting but throughout the whole arduous business of raising the Fund and working out the scheme. The meeting then terminated.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT ASSOCIATION OF PRESBYTERIAN AND UNITARIAN CHURCHES.

THE annual meeting of this Association was held on Saturday last. The proceedings began with a service in Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, at which the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, of Liverpool, preached. The sermon was from a text taken from one of Dr. Martineau's prayers, "Thou hast laid upon us a mighty trust," and was a vigorous appeal for religious loyalty and activity. The service was well attended.

After tea, which was served in the Lower Mosley-street Schools, the public meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, under the chairmanship of the Rev. CHARLES ROPER, President of the Association. Mr. Roper's address, moving the adoption of the report, was a stirring one, full of the enthusiasm which has made his own work so successful and so much appreciated. The Forward Movement Churches, he said, were well established amid growing populations, and he could not expect anything of them but vigorous life. All the churches in the district had settled ministers; and the churches at Middleton and Oldham-road, in spite of their peculiar difficulties, had made both ends meet. The Strangeways Church would have soon or late to follow the Christian population if it were to maintain its best traditions, and show enterprise in matters of religion. Services had been started at Lower Mosley-street schools, and a good regular congregation gathered, whilst the Sunday-school also had increased since the settlement of the Rev. Cobden Smith.

The President referred with gratification to the fact that more churches than usual had sent in statistics, which made the 13th page of the report an object lesson.

The finances of the Association did not cause him satisfaction. The income was steadily decreasing. Of the Bazaar Fund only £524 remained unvoted, though, in view of repayments to be made by Urmston and Heaton Moor, there was unspent practically £1,300. He called for a zealous effort to increase the annual income. Though carriage-folk were fewer, the financial resources of the district were as strong as ever. During the ten years ending 1864, £4,937 was raised in the Manchester district and spent upon church-building, &c.; in the ten years ending 1874, £47,007 (including the private munificence that built the churches at Monton and Gorton); ten years ending 1884, £28,727; ten years ending 1894, £47,589; and in the seven years since (notwithstanding the extinction of millionaires), £33,000. There was muscle and sinew in the body yet, and the democratic element in the churches must be more extensively represented on the subscription lists.

Referring to the Association's desire to help the churches which compose it, Mr. Roper spoke of a new scheme of work calculated to quicken the religious life of the people, and make them more enthusiastic for the cause. How anyone could help growing enthusiastic about the Unitarian Faith, he confessed himself unable to understand. To him it was the most uplifting, inspiring and glorious gospel ever preached. Not to desire to communicate it to others was a piece of unforgivable selfishness and self-satisfaction, diametrically opposed to the true Christian spirit. No true Unitarian could wish to make his neighbour a Unitarian against his will and conviction, the very suggestion was absurd; but he did feel that they had shaken themselves free from many of those superstitions and prejudices which obscure religious thought, and, therefore, it was a matter of duty to let it be known what is believed by Unitarians, and why. Sometimes folk in the pew were too sleepy, too comfortable, too self-satisfied to care; and some of the parsons too neglectful of the intellectual difficulties which beset an increasing number of men and women. True religion was more than creed; it was life. Character was higher than creed; but character was influenced by belief. There was a grander work than that of creating litigious theologians, a fact upon which every church in the Association was agreed. For example let them take the work of the Pendleton friends done last summer in the congested parts of their parish; of the Oldham friends and their district services; of the Upper Brook-street friends and their cinderella work; all work that was included in his idea of the Unitarian Gospel. Might God strengthen the hands and inspire the hearts of those engaging in it!

And finally, was it too much to hope for a Self-Denial Week among Unitarians? The Salvationists of Manchester had raised £1,100 in their Self-Denial Week for the work of the Army. If the Unitarians of the district sent in their theatre and concert money for a fortnight, the Treasurer's financial anxiety for a whole year would be removed, and it would be possible to make things hum all round.

Mr. Percy H. Leigh seconded the motion in a terse speech, and the report was adopted.

The Treasurer's statement called forth some interesting observations. Its adoption was moved by Mr. G. H. Leigh, who insisted on the necessity of congregations strengthening themselves, and so helping the common work of the Association.

Mr. Wigley, in seconding, referred to the distress caused to ministers and worshippers by Unitarians who settled near a place of Unitarian worship from a distance, but would not join in the work and worship of their fellow believers.

In support of the motion Mr. Wm. Marcroft urged that a "Thousand Guineas Fund" be raised for furthering the work of the Association.

Mr. W. Barton Worthington spoke of the encouraging features presented by Manchester Unitarianism—the work at Moss Side, the manly effort at Bradford, and the new departure at Lower Mosley-street.

Mr. Wm. Lord having spoken, the statement was adopted.

Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., delivered a joyous and encouraging speech. The retention of "Presbyterian" in the title of the Association pleased him, because it reminded all of our connection with those who, to his mind, introduced the "open trust." He spoke as President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, a doctrinal society with distinct objects to which it was faithful in the broadest spirit, as witness its third "object." Having conveyed the greetings of his Association, he sympathised with the treasurer over his deficit. Being a treasurer or two himself, he thought deficits were rather common, but sometimes they went too far! As to congregational principles, he insisted that each congregation must stand on its own legs, but not resent counsel, for counsel might often well be offered, and to the general good, too. One especial thing he had to say to congregations, and that was that they should look after their young people; teach them why they had been brought up Unitarians; give them the positive aspects of the faith. Those who wished young people to believe must believe themselves, and set an example of faith and works. Besides, let them be given work to do, and be trusted to carry it out.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, who also represented the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, having cleverly veiled a plea for the increase of ministers' salaries, insisted that the work of the movement was not the concern of ministers alone. They must work as hard as laymen in their ordinary callings; but laymen should not be above encouraging and stimulating ministers, nor be themselves lacking in missionary spirit. As to those people who, when they had removed from one district to another, did not join the church in whose neighbourhood they found themselves, he would leave them alone till something within their own hearts moved them. There were others to whom appeal might be made with better effect, who are looking for the leading which Unitarians alone can give; and as examples, Mr. Tarrant mentioned those two faithful men, Admiral Sir George Elliott and Field-Marshal Sir Neville Chamberlain, men who became earnest Unitarians late in life.

The Rev. R. Travers Herford, representing the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, of which he is secretary, compared notes between the two societies. The object of both was to spread the Unitarian religion. There were various ways of setting about this. He would sketch one plan:—(1) It was possible to have a short course of lectures in some new district for £5 or £10; (2) If the course proved successful it had to be followed up, a cottage could be rented for six months, and supplies engaged for the time, but it would now cost much more than £10; (3) And when what a correspondent of his once termed the neculeas of a congregation had been gathered, the fact of growth would have to be faced and preparations made for the settlement of a minister. From his experience he should say that a sum of £5,000 would have to be spent on the "cause" from the time of its inception till independence was reached. That money would be spent for the sake of religious ideals, and it was no wonder, in the face of such cost, that Unitarians were not free to do all the work that lay before them. He asked if it would be right to weaken any support for the sake of breaking new ground, and gave it as his opinion that work that had been begun should be carried on to a satisfactory outcome.

Mr. Wm. Simpson, of Heaton Moor, was the next speaker. The guiding principle of freedom had secured his adhesion to Unitarianism. He felt that all were convinced there was apathy in the body; that it was suffering from a sort of diseased respectability; that a level of duty was recognised but carefully not exceeded! He asked why Unitarian churches succeeded better in some places than others, and declared it was not all a question of pulpit and pew. Conditions and conventionalities had to be considered. He looked forward to an extension of Unitarian work among the masses rather than the classes; he thought more direct appeal should be made to the emotions; and suggested that opportunities should be afforded for men to meet together to talk about their faith and so get to understand each other's difficulties.

Votes of thanks, proposed and seconded by friends from various churches not hitherto represented among the speakers, were carried most enthusiastically by the audience.

Then all joined in singing

> From all that dwell below the skies
> Let the Creator's praise arise; and the President pronounced the Benediction.

The Oldham Choir led the singing at the service and during the evening, rendering also several part-songs, which were thoroughly enjoyed.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

The sixty-eighth annual meeting was held on Tuesday afternoon in the Lord Mayor's Parlour at the Town Hall. The chair was occupied by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, and there was a large attendance. The Committee, in their report, emphasised their sense of the continued and increased necessity of the work of the Society. In these days, when the tendency of popular thought was to lay stress on the consideration of practical social needs and on the solution of pressing problems of poverty and distress, they believed that the work of the missions and their ministers was assuming not a less but a greater importance than ever before in their long and varied history. The Committee wished again to remind the friends of the mission of the need, which the missionaries were constantly emphasising, of a larger number of helpers, so that the work of the missions might be more efficiently done. There was no doubt that in recent years the demand for voluntary assistance in all kinds of philanthropic work had largely increased, but it was a regrettable thing that old-established institutions should be allowed to suffer.

Mr. D. A. Little, treasurer, said the unsatisfactory feature in the accounts as compared with the two previous years was the fact of an adverse balance, amounting to over £26. The income last year was over £100 less than in the year before, due to decreased income from an investment, and also to a decrease in the amount received from donations. The donations in 1899 amounted to £387, in 1900 the amount was £215, and last year it was £111. Donations being an unreliable source of income the Committee were anxious to increase the subscription list £100 per annum. He was glad to report progress in this direction.

Mr. Alderman Rawson, writing to the Rev. W. E. George, hon. secretary, said he was exceedingly sorry to say that he would be unable to attend the meeting. He would have liked to renew the expression of his unabated confidence in the unsectarian and purely philanthropic character of the mission and his satisfaction with the result of its last year's operations.

The Chairman moved the adoption of the report and accounts. The meeting also expressed its welcome to the Rev. A. W. Timmis, and declared its sympathy with him and the Rev. J. W. Bishop in their labours.

Mrs. Bosanquet (London) seconded the resolution, and delivered an address on work like that undertaken by the Manchester Domestic Mission, of which we regret that we have not received any report.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. Timmis and Mr. Bishop, the missionaries, also spoke.

On the motion of Mr. George Leigh, seconded by the Rev. Priestley Prime, the officers and Committee were reappointed; and on the proposal of the Rev. Dendy Agate, seconded by the Rev. George Knight, votes of thanks were passed.

There is no sure stronghold of faith unless the God who spoke once is speaking still, and unless revelation is a continuous process.—Professor A. M. Jones.

THE SHAREHOLDERS' MEETING.

SIR,—As your columns inform the readers of THE INQUIRER of the general result of the recent Shareholders' Meeting, it is right that they should be informed with more exactitude. They must know, then, that the holder of fifty £1 shares had ten votes, and the holder of five shares only one. Thus a very small group of the larger holders could outvote a much larger number of ministers and others who are small holders. Again, the proxy votes were, of course, given by those who had not heard the discussion, and were only in possession of the case put forward by the majority of the directors. These facts modify the significance of the figures of the division, 82 to 31. At the show of hands the majority was in favour of the amendment.

Your readers are, I think, further entitled to know that the motion put forward by the London directors—though disapproved by their only provincial colleague—was for the dismissal of the present Editor, and a large reduction of the very moderate outlay for editorial services; while the amendment favoured the retention of the present Editor, the engagement of a Sub-editor of professional journalistic experience, and the endeavour to raise a substantial subvention fund with a view to the further improvement of the paper.

We are most anxious to avoid, if possible, the importation of discussion on this grave matter into your columns. But, as mover of the amendment, I feel myself entitled to claim that your readers should be relieved from the inaccurate impression of the balance of opinion among the shareholders, which the figures quoted must necessarily produce.

RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG.

Liverpool, March 17.

[We felt it right last week to make the bare announcement of the result of the Shareholders' Meeting, as to which anxiety was felt by many friends throughout the country, and we cannot refuse to publish this further statement in Mr. Armstrong's letter; but it must be obvious to our readers that we cannot open these columns to any general discussion of the subject.—ED. THE BRAHMO SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

SIR,—I wonder if I may be pardoned if I send you a word in view of the appeal for the Calcutta Brahmo Somaj School and College for Girls, which you published in your issue of Feb. 22. My interest in both England and India is my excuse.

As I read the letters and papers that come to me from India I am more and more impressed with the strength and value of the work done there by Mr. Williams, and with the importance of the service which the Unitarians of England have rendered, are rendering, and may continue to render, to the Brahmo Somaj in its difficult but extremely important mission among the Indian peoples. I trust that Mr. Williams's lamented death will not cause any falling off of interest in the Indian work. Rather, should not a knowledge of the large service which he rendered, and of the strong hold which he obtained upon the confidence and love of the people wherever he went, open English hearts and hands still more widely, and strengthen the determination to extend the brotherly hand of helpfulness in every way possible to a land which so deeply needs England's sympathy and aid.

The appeal for the Calcutta Girls' School and College may well receive wide and general attention. The men whose names are attached to it are the most influential, reliable and careful of the Brahmo leaders, and all of them are men who would under no circumstances make such an appeal for outside help were not the need very great. It is almost impossible for the people of England to realise how extremely poor all but a very few of the people of India are. I have seen a good deal of self-sacrifice, and very noble self-sacrifice, in America and in England; but I have never witnessed self-sacrifice in either country to be compared with much that I saw and learned of among our Brahmo Somaj brethren in India. When in Calcutta I visited this Girls' School for which an appeal is now made, saw the work it was doing, and became convinced of its great importance. Its need for a better location and for better buildings is certainly very great. It will be a severe blow to the Brahmo cause if the school is compelled to discontinue. No effort should be spared to prevent such a disaster. Almost every Hindu and Englishman in India with whom I talked told me that the key to the social and religious regeneration of India was to be found in the education of her girls and women. The Brahmo Somaj is leading in this important work earnestly and heroically, but under very great difficulties. If it can be helped sufficiently to enable it to establish this school on a permanent basis, the results for good in the future cannot fail to be great and lasting.

I remember with grateful admiration the generosity with which English Unitarians have responded to appeals to help India in other ways in past times. I trust and believe that they will be equally generous in the present case.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—I have to inform you that at a recent meeting of the Committee of the National Conference it was resolved to postpone the further consideration of the Circular regarding finance and the appointment of a paid secretary until the next Conference.

I am further to state that the following resolution was also passed at the same meeting:—"That in the opinion of this Committee the constitution for carrying out the superannuation scheme of the National Conference should be submitted by the Special Committee entrusted with the carrying out of that scheme to the National Conference for approval or otherwise.!' CHAS. FENTON,

Acting Hon. Sec.

10, Vineyard-hill, Wimbledon,
March 17.

Inquiry having been made as to who are members of the Conference Committee we append the following list:—

Members of Committee of the National Conference, 1900-1903:—President, Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A.; Vice-Presidents, James R. Beard, J.P., W. Blake Odgers, K.C., LL.D.; Treasurer, H. Chatfeild Clarke; Hon. Secs., A. W. Worthington, J.P., Chas. Fenton, Rev. F. W. Stanley, Rev. J. Ellis.

Elected by the Leicester Conference.—Rev. R. A. Armstrong, E. Clephan, J. Cogan Conway, Rev. W. H. Drummond, Rev. F. K. Freeston, H. P. Greg, Rev. C. Hargrove, Rev. Brooke Herford (resigned October, 1901), Miss F. Hill, Rev. J. C. Street, Grosvenor Talbot, Rev. J. Wood.

Nominated by Societies.—Rev. F. Walters, Northumberland and Durham; Rev. A. Chalmers, Yorkshire Union; J. Dendy, Lancashire and Cheshire Provincial Association; Rev. R. T. Herford, North and East Lancashire; Rev. S. A. Steinthal, Manchester District Association; Rev. B. C. Constable, East Cheshire Christian Mission; Rev. H. Gow, North Midland Association: Rev. L. P. Jacks, Midland Christian Union; John Harrison, London and South-Eastern Counties Provincial Assembly; G. H. Clennell, London District Association; H. Blessley, Southern Unitarian Association; Miss Tagart, Central Postal Mission; L. N. Williams, South-East Wales Unitarian Association; J. Graham, Scottish Unitarian Association; Rev. J. A. Kelly, Ulster Unitarian Christian Association; Ion Pritchard, Sunday School Association; Rev. Dendy Agate, Home Missionary College.

Co-opted.—David Martineau, A. H. Worthington, Rev. J. E. Odgers.

The Special Committee on Superannuation is constituted as follows:—Rev. J. E. Carpenter, President; H. Chatfeild Clarke, treasurer; J. Cogan Conway, secretary; the Revs. C. C. Coe, J. C. Street, W. G. Tarrant, and J. Wood, Messrs. David Ainsworth, C. Fenton, David Martineau, W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Frank Taylor, and A. W. Worthington.

SIR,—I should be obliged to you for an opportunity of addressing your readers on some points in the present discussion, on the ground that, along with others amongst us, I have been thinking for several years on the subject of Church life, and particularly on the true destiny of our Free Churches.

First let me deprecate the supposition that those who have high expectations of the Conference are antagonists of the Unitarian Association. Nearly all of us are attached to both societies by our principles and affections. The question is, what is the proper sphere of each?

After the discussions and experiences of more than half a century, it ought to be quite clear that the Unitarian Association, while it has a greater educational work than ever, cannot be the representative body for those free "open-trust" Churches with which this discussion is concerned. It represents a splendid, comprehensive type of theology; but it is theological in name and object, and is a society of individuals. The "Conference" is the only national society representative of the Churches, and alone of existing institutions can be so.

Many of our friends seem to be forgetful of our past experiences and blind to our present needs. When the Dissenters' Chapels Bill had to be introduced, and our very possession of the chapels was at stake, the Unitarian Association was rightly considered to be disqualified by its name and nature for the defence of the non-subscribing congregations.

A special society had to be got up for the purpose. If any action were taken now for the defence of these Churches throughout the kingdom, the National Conference would be the proper organ for it.

As for our present needs, there are more things to be said than this letter has space for. Our greatest need is that all our members should see that the unique gift of our Churches to the religion of the nation is an ecclesiastical principle and an ideal of Church life. This ideal, which attracts most attention and sympathy in all our successful missionary enterprises, is the principle of non-subscription to articles of belief and the perfect mental freedom of our members. Thousands of religious people are sick of sectarianism; they want to feel their way cautiously and reservedly towards the truth. They are glad to associate with others in worship and good works, so long as they are not labelled with another doctrinal name or enrolled in just one more sect.

Besides the personal and spiritual service which our Churches render every week, and will render still more thoroughly in future, the basis on which they are formed is surely the only possible basis for a large, national, popular, and even international Church. The Conference even now represents in a comparatively passive manner the Church of England (and more) which is to be. What might it not accomplish for the reformation of Church life throughout the Empire if it became really active in cultivating the community of aims in its own Churches, and promoting therein an intense universal missionary activity, strong by the co-operation and economy of its forces, but so much more liberal and spiritual than the Churches of the past. Its strength would lie in its freedom from the old "ecclesiasticism," and any desertion of its fundamental principle, the sacredness of private intuitions, would mean its own decay and death. If is infringed an individual or local liberty, it would lose influence. Now, the so-called Evangelical Free Churches are moving in this direction. At present they exclude Unitarians; but some day they will arrive at our present ecclesiastical comprehensiveness. Then they will have anticipated us; they will have taken the name and position of "The English Free Church," or some more fitting title, which already belongs by right to us; and they will do the leading part in the future Reformation, unless we rise to the height of our calling and make clear and definite to the world the sublime ideal of spiritual communion and co-operation which has been born in our midst.

If this letter is submitted to your readers, you will perhaps allow me to address you again on some other considerations which give importance to this subject. A. LESLIE SMITH.

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

SIR,—Mr. Howard Young appears to misunderstand what I said in my letter. I had nothing to remark about sections in the meeting held at Essex Hall, as I knew nothing about them, and I was glad that your report did not say "who was for which" proposition, as it is most undesirable to appear to be arguing against any person or persons. Two clear and definite objections ought to be stated, and these I endeavoured to express.

1. The Conference originated the Fund, and should have had the decision as to its constitution.

2. A meeting held in London at that time of the year was not likely to be a representative meeting, and, as a matter of fact, was not representative.

We have in Manchester our District Association which is representative of the churches, through their ministers and delegates. From time to time special work has been undertaken through a vote of the Association, and money has been collected. I never heard even a suggestion that the subscribers to such special funds should be called together to decide what should be done with the money. Invariably the Association and its committees administer the funds and carry out the work. The National Conference is in like manner representative, and it appears to me that a similar course of procedure would alone be satisfactory.

ODIUM THEOLOGICUM.

SIR,—I feel it to be my duty to lay before your readers a case of theological narrowness which ought to convince us that the work of our churches, both destructive and constructive, is still very much required.

Recently my son, Alfred Graham, who is a thoroughly trained musician, applied for the position of organist in a leading Presbyterian church in this city. The usual inquiries were made, with the result that he was recommended for the post by the committee and musical expert, and in due course was informed in a letter from the clergyman that he had been "unanimously and cordially chosen as organist." The same evening, in course of conversation with the clergyman, it transpired that my son had been brought up in a Unitarian family. This one fact entirely altered the aspect of affairs. Instantly all further confirmation of the appointment was suspended; and after a few questions of the nature of a theological examination, it was intimated that the matter must be reconsidered by the session. The final result will be best seen from the following letter:—

Glasgow, March 13, 1902.

DEAR MR. GRAHAM,—Our kirk session met last night and considered with very great care the whole case of one with your sincere convictions being organist in the Stevenson Memorial Church. They ask me to say that they think it wise in the interest of all concerned—your own interest as well as that of others—that another appointment should be made. They came to this conclusion with a deep regret, in which I very fully share. They regret that one of whose character and gifts they have formed so high an opinion should be ineligible for the post of choirmaster because of a difference of theological view. That seems to them so fundamental that they feel they cannot do otherwise. With kind regards, yours sincerely,— W. M. CLOW.

This letter gives me the impression that in the estimation of the writer, though one had all the genius of a Handel and the saintliness of a Channing, he would not be qualified for the position of organist in this Presbyterian church unless he held similar views on theology. It is some satisfaction to get such a clear, outspoken statement of the position. To be consistent such people should exclude from their services all hymns by Unitarian writers, and even inquire into the creed of the composers of the tunes they sing. Consistency, however, is not to be expected, for not only are such hymns sung, but it is well known that many members are to be found in these churches compared with whom we Unitarians, are conservative. Perhaps the saddest result of this position is that such tests are frequently bribes to insincerity. It is certainly hard on the man who, with every qualification for such an appointment, finds his prospects of advancement and pathway to usefulness blocked by such a theological toll-bar. This case is rendered all the more glaring from the fact that my son has been organist during the past two years in a Congregational church, where his relations with minister, members, and committee have been most harmonious and cordial.

OBITUARY.

MRS. ELIZABETH KEMPSON.

THERE passed away, on the 11th inst., a lady who was one of the oldest inhabitants of Leicester. Mrs. Elizabeth Kempson was born in 1816. She was the only daughter of Mr. John Flower, an artist of provincial reputation. Mr. Flower was a pupil of the celebrated painter P. de Wint, and had the same strong love of nature as his eminent master. From her father Mrs. Kempson inherited a love of art and literature. Of rare intelligence, with a wonderful gift of memory, she was an authority on all the events of art and history. Possessed of a large and valuable library, and a well-cultivated mind, there were few subjects of general interest with which she was not conversant.

Mrs. Kempson was a member of the Great Meeting from her childhood, and until the last few years of her life was rarely absent from her pew, and to the last she took an interest in Unitarian proceedings. Her husband, Mr. William Kempson, died a few years ago. He was an alderman, and had been twice Mayor of Leicester. During his life the house in Southfields was a centre of hospitality. Such scholars as Professor Knight and Henry Morley, and many of our Unitarian ministers and laymen, were warmly welcomed, and many friendships were formed between them and their genial hostess. Such memories are pleasant, and we of an older generation look back upon them with feelings of subdued pleasure. E. C.

MRS. F. MONKS.

THE congregation of Cairo-street Chapel, Warrington, have lost a true friend by the death of Mrs. Monks, the wife of Mr. F. Monks, J.P., of Walton Old Hall, which took place at Matlock on Monday, March 10. Mrs. Monks, who had suffered for some time from heart disease, had gone with her husband and other members of her family to Matlock, in the hope of recovering strength, but there came to her instead the summons of release. In accordance with her express wish her body was cremated at Manchester, and on Thursday morning, March 13, the ashes were privately interred in the Cairo-street burial-ground. On the afternoon of the same day a memorial service was held in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. E. W. Lummis, and largely attended. Among those present were the Warrington District Nurses, in whom Mrs. Monks had long taken a deep interest. She had served also on the ladies' committee of the Warrington Infirmary, and had given ungrudging service in other philanthropic work in the town, as well as in connection with the Cairo-street congregation. Mr. Lummis, in his memorial address, speaking of Mrs. Monks, dwelt upon the simplicity of her character, her quiet persistence and strength of will, and the absence in her of self-seeking. She was wise with the wisdom that cometh down from above, and wonderfully kind. The first hymn sung was "O God, Our help in ages past," and at the end of the service the Dead March in Saul was played, the congregation standing in solemn silence.

MISS DARE, OF SIDMOUTH.

MISS CLARA DARE, whose death on March 8, in her fifty-fifth year, we announced last week, was the daughter of the late Rev. Joseph Dare, and sister of the Rev. H. M. Dare, formerly minister at the Old Meeting, Sidmouth, of which Miss Dare was an attached member. She had been resident in Sidmouth for the last twelve years, and was well known as a teacher of music, at one time having weekly engagements also in Exeter. A pupil of Garcia, Saloman, Madame Mary Davis, and Caldecott, she was proficient both in singing and as an instrumentalist, and had a special gift for teaching, gaining the warm attachment of many pupils. To her friends she was always ready to sacrifice herself for the pleasure of music, and ever willing to help them by taking her place at the piano, or accompanying their songs or instruments. To many her death will prove a painful loss, but to those who knew her more intimately she will leave behind her the happy memory of one who was the kindest, the most gentle, and the most sympathetic of friends.

She was buried at the Cemetery on Tuesday, the 11th inst., the Rev. W. Agar officiating.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Sanctuary Knocker.

ON the north door of Durham Cathedral hangs what is certainly the most celebrated knocker in all the world. Altogether different from any knocker you have ever seen, its curious shape would cause you much amusement; but strange as is its shape the use it was put to is even more surprising. I hope that one day you will see a photograph of this wondrous piece of metal, or, what is better, that you will pay a visit to the Cathedral—one of the most beautiful in our country—and see, not only the knocker, but all its treasures, for yourselves.

Meanwhile let me try to describe it as best I can. A bronze ring of great thickness hangs from the partly-opened mouth of a most hideous head, which seems itself to start out of the wooden door; the head resembles one of those curious figures one sometimes sees on the outside of buildings, forming waterspouts and known as "gargoyles": not quite animal, not quite human, the sort of thing one sees in dreams and fairy-books; this head has ears that stand up straight like those of a horse, only not quite so long. It has enormous eyes—or rather eye-sockets—and most fierce-looking teeth; the ring is shaped somewhat like the letter "D," two dogs' heads holding on to the bar that works between the angry teeth.

A long time ago there were pieces of crystal or enamel in the great holes that now do duty for the eyes, and even to-day you can see the little pieces of metal that held the "eye" in its place. The whole is much the worse for wear, which is not to be wondered at when we remember that for some seven or eight hundred years it has faced the wind, rain and snow of a most exposed position.

It is known as the "Sanctuary Knocker," and was for a great many years one of the most important possessions of the district. The law was that anyone who had committed a crime or was in danger of being arrested for debt or any offence could flee to the Cathedral and, once having placed his hand upon the ring, would be safe from all harm.

Day and night there was always someone ready to receive any such visitor—one knock at the door and it was immediately opened; the rank or the offence of the person made no difference; all shared alike; the porters admitted without any question. Once inside the Church a bell was rung to announce to the city that someone had taken "sanctuary"; then a black gown, with a yellow cross upon it, was placed upon the refugee, and he was led to a special room where he remained in safety for thirty-seven days.

This old custom of sanctuary—by no means confined to Durham—was first heard of in connection with St. Cuthbert in the eighth century, and the last recorded use of the Sanctuary Knocker at Durham Cathedral was in the year 1524. In the old days, when laws were less strictly administered, when in the wilder parts of the country men took the law into their own hands and were often cruel and unjust in their methods of taking revenge or of punishing offences, this privilege of sanctuary was a very useful and a truly Christian institution; the progress of civilisation and the more efficient carrying out of the law which followed the making of roads and improvement of the means of communication led at last to the abolishing of the rights which Durham shared with other cathedrals. To-day only the old bronze knocker remains to tell us what has been.

Looking at it, as I often do, one cannot help thinking of the hands that at different times have grasped it—hands wet with fear, hands wet with blood, hands delicate and unused to toil, hands hardened by exposure and bruised in many fights, hands of cowards fleeing from a fate they had often brought to others, hands of brave men anxious to live that they might yet undo the evil they had done; little hands that could never reach the knocker, for children often had to take sanctuary in those violent times; hands of old men hardened in sin—what a long story of dread, of horror, of violence, and of Christian charity which sought to come between vengeance and its victims!

Now the privilege of sanctuary is done away, the old knocker is fastened and remains a mere relic, but sometimes we feel that it is not quite all dead and gone, and that in some form or other the thing remains.

Have you not read of that large estate wherein every little bird is sheltered and protected, where the owner will not allow a shot to be fired or a trap to be set, and all the wild things are allowed liberty and security from the persecuting sportsman? Have you not also heard of that good woman who will not allow the huntsman across her grounds, who protects and provides for the hunted deer and fox? These, and there are not a few like them, are modern instances of "Sanctuary," not for men—men now very largely can protect themselves— but for the weaker members of the family—the "little brothers and sisters" who need so much our consideration and love.

When some of the grown-ups have looked at the old knocker on the Cathedral door and remembered that though they may not be thieves or murderers, nor have bloodhounds on their tracks or fierce men shouting for their blood, yet all have so far departed from God's ways that they must cry "guilty," then while you youngsters play on the green outside, looking at the quaint carvings on the walls and reading the strange epitaphs on the graves, we are glad to slip into the Cathedral and in its solemn companionship remember Him who is the great Sanctuary and refuge for us all."

ARTHUR HARVIE.

No reform in theology is more needed at present than one which shall teach us how to prize and how best to possess this mortal world. We make too much of death and hereafter. We seem to be wandering at the foot of a mountain, behind which lies the land of our dreams. The mountain exists only in our conceit; the land of our hopes and our fears is in the soul. To be in eternity is to be spiritually transformed; it is not to be disembodied, but disenchanted, unselfed. To fill the moment worthily is everlasting life.—F. H. Hedge.

WILLIAM RATHBONE.

WE claimed last week the privilege of silence, standing by the grave of WILLIAM RATHBONE, conscious of how much there was to be said of the lofty purpose and the manifold achievements of his life, and of the profound influence of such a character on the community in the midst of which his life was spent. But neither can we now give anything like the record that would be fitting, to show how much he did and with what quiet persistence and singleness of purpose, with a wonderful self-effacement and devotion to his fellow-men. So much of the good he did was done in secret, and so far-reaching was the influence he exercised over other men, compelling them to something of his own nobleness of purpose and largeness of heart in generous giving, that we may rejoice indeed in the thought of such a life and gladly submit to the persuasion of its excellence, but must acknowledge that no complete record is possible.

At a meeting of the Council and Senate of University College held in Liverpool last Saturday some true things were said of Mr. RATHBONE, which it is a pleasure to repeat. He was "the incarnate conscience of a great city," said the Principal, and Sir EDWARD LAWRENCE, an old friend and fellow-worker, though an opponent in politics, bore witness that it was "love for the well-being of mankind" that was the mainspring of his actions. Professor MACCUNN said that during all the time he had known Mr. RATHBONE he had never heard him speak a word of depreciation or disparagement except of one thing, and that was his own deserts; and, further, that if he were to pick out one quality above others that marked Mr. RATHBONE'S pre-eminence, it would be "the concentration and the sure instinct which enabled him to lay hold of so many high and noble ends, and to cling to these with a tenacity quite invincible; and not only to pursue them for himself, but to inspire other men likewise to pursue them."

The letter, which we here reprint, addressed to the Liverpool papers by Mr. RATHBONE'S son, the seventh bearer of that honoured name, presents to us a happy picture of the closing days of a long and beneficent life. We are grateful, especially, for that characteristic protest against the lament that "there is no one to take his place," and for the reminder of his generous confidence in those whom he himself had done so much to inspire for service of unselfish devotion to the public good.

Sir,—My mother and the other members of my father's family feel that some attempt, which must be quite inadequate, should be made to express their gratitude for the evidences of affectionate esteem for him which have reached them, and which have been generally manifested during the last few weeks.

My father's attachment to Liverpool, and to his neighbours and fellow-citizens, whether known to him or not, was of a peculiarly personal character. It resembled, in perhaps a more than common degree, the affection which men have for individual friends. If, as we believe, the last two or three years were in some respects the happiest of his life, we know that nothing contributed more to that happiness than the many tokens which he received that the sentiments of personal attachment to which I have referred were reciprocated not only by his friends and the associates of his public work, but by very many fellow-citizens to whom he was personally little known or not known at all. The message of confidence and affection, which is often spoken too late to bring comfort or happiness, came to him in full measure, and was a source of deep and sometimes wondering thankfulness.

It is impossible for me to acknowledge as we should like to do the sympathetic care and completeness which have marked the leading articles and notices in the columns of the Press, and the extreme kindness of the resolutions and private letters that have been sent to us. I can only say that all this kindness has been profoundly felt, and will never be forgotten. One form of tribute, however, has been in many instances rendered, as to which, if you will permit me, I believe my father would wish me to make known, in justice to others, what we know to have been his own thought.

It has been said that, in several directions of his public work, "his loss is irreparable," and "that there is no one to take his place." That there should be among his friends and fellow-workers, as a question of personal feeling, the consciousness of a vacancy not easily to be filled would have been to him a matter for renewed gratitude. But, in any practical sense, he would not have wished the words I have quoted to pass without protest.

I have alluded to the happiness of the last years of his life. Our impression on this point especially applies to the last eighteen months, since his dangerous illness in August, 1900. On his partial recovery from that illness he withdrew from almost all his public positions, and seemed at the same time to divest himself from the sense of personal responsibilities in many directions from which he had never before, in the memory of any of us, been free. The thought that enabled him with a quiet mind to lay aside the harness, if I may express it so, that he had worn so long, the reason that the last months were untroubled by anxiety as to the future of the causes that he had most at heart, was the complete confidence which he felt in the younger men with whom he had of late years associated. He believed implicitly that whether in local government, nursing, educational, or in most other matters, his younger colleagues had not only the ability to carry on his share of the work, but the energetic and hopeful spirit of initiative with which he had so much sympathy, and which he felt assured would carry the benefits he had worked with them to attain to far wider issues than had been, in his lifetime, possible. No tribute would have more strongly appealed to my father, would have more warmed his heart, than that of Mr. Archibald Williamson, when he spoke of my father having enlisted for public work young men like himself, who perhaps first joined in his labours for his sake, but were impelled to continue to give their thought and their leisure by their own sense of the interest and value of the work.

The one duty which he could never quite reconcile himself to surrender was his attendance at the Select Vestry, and he constantly urged on his doctors that he would make any effort and submit to any treatment that would enable him, as he expressed it, "to go down and save some poor devil from going into the workhouse."

Except when this particular disability troubled him, the line of thought which I have tried to indicate was constantly present in my father's mind during the past year. Of my many visits to him in that period I do not think there was one in which he did not speak of it. It recurred again and again on his sick-bed, in his bath-chair in the garden, at his fireside, and always as a source of comfort and as enhancing the peace of mind and contentment with which he was enabled at last to lay down his active duties and to enjoy, with his friends and his family, the rest and quiet of his closing days.

It is only after much hesitation that I have ventured to attempt to convey this message to my father's friends, known and unknown, because I believe he would have wished it.—Yours, &c.

WILLIAM RATHBONE.

Greenbank, March 16, 1902.

We had fully intended to publish a memoir of Mr. RATHBONE this week, but find that it will be impossible to find space in our present issue for all that we desire to include. Instead, therefore, of dividing the memoir into two parts, it seems better to reserve the whole until next week. It will thus very fittingly appear in our Easter number.

THE QUAKER MOVEMENT.*

BY J. W. GRAHAM, M.A., PRINCIPAL OF DALTON HALL, THE OWENS COLLEGE, MANCHESTER.

I FEEL as though a happier and brighter day were dawning in the religious world, when you and I, each remaining loyal to our own measure of recognised truth, can yet meet and consider in friendly fashion one another's position.

My own task is perhaps a more delicate one than that of any other of your lecturers, for the Society of Friends for which I speak is, perhaps, further removed from Anglican practice than any other church. But I can speak, with no simulated respect, of methods and means which do not appeal to myself, but which deserve respect because you and countless congregations like this value them as means of grace.

Well, the Society of Friends has only one principle; it exists as a testimony to one great truth: the exceeding richness of the spiritual endowment of man, and the power of the human soul when in touch with the Divine Soul and unaided by any outward help. Our belief is in the strength of soul that is at the service of the faithful man who lays hold on the Divine Power; in the light and guidance that come to the eye kept single; in the fruit-bearing power of the seed of the Divine life in the souls of men.

Now it is not common to hear much of human strength in religious talk, it is far more common to hear of human weakness; and though that may often be uttered in a somewhat conventional manner, so that people would not like others to say about them what they are ready to say about themselves, yet human weakness is doubtless a great fact of experience. We Friends recognise it; as, on the other hand, those who start with a strong realisation of human frailty do not deny that strength is available too. But these truths are held in different proportion and with different emphasis, and this single fact has been a kind of watershed which has caused us to go far apart in our practice from other churches. The Society of Friends makes its arrangements and orders its worship on the belief that men are vehicles of the Divine Spirit, whereas all the organisation of the Church is really nothing but a series of helps to human weakness: the beautiful buildings with their glowing windows and carven stone produce an atmosphere and an influence not exactly that of common earth, and so assist the mind to devoutness; the creeds are meant to guide the believer's erring feet to truth; the ritual service is to provide a safe and dignified expression for his feeling; and the educated and separated order of clergy are provided as teachers, counsellors and confidants in spiritual things to their weaker flock. Truly the differences work out to some complexity between those who feel that each man is, or may be, close to the Divine Presence without external aid, and those who rely much on means of grace.

Most churches in the seventeenth century acted on the belief that man is by nature a sinner. Quakerism really arose as a testimony against the doctrine of Calvin, which began, like the rival system of Rome, with a statement of human degradation. We believe that, in the truest sense of all, man is by nature a saint; and that when he fails to reach that ideal he is proportionately uncomfortable and out of his true relation, and missing his natural development. Doubtless he has a double nature. We fix our mind on his better one, and I incline to think the Church has considerably joined us here as time has gone on.

Let me at once admit that those who have a vivid sense of human weakness, blindness, and dulness have much to urge; and, Quaker as I am, I recognise the wisdom, for many people, of external aids—experience has proved that the majority of people prefer them. We elect to do otherwise. We work on the nobler and stronger hypothesis of human nature, and simply wait listening for the Divine Voice. To us a silent meeting is not a vague and bare vacuity; it may throb with the Divine life, and be as silent and as fruitful as the dew or the gentle rain—and the spirit of it as quiet as the breathing of the air.

We think that this is a more bracing experience for the soul than to rely on the stimulus of music, to follow forms of words, to listen to appointed sermons, to learn belief from traditional creeds. All those things appear to us to be of the nature of tonics or stimulants useful for invalids and probably for all of us at intervals, but, to the healthy man, weakening, and they mostly make their appeal through the gate of the flesh. Man is, indeed, a compound of flesh and spirit; but religion, after all, is an activity of the spirit. What is called in the religious world nowadays, since Henry Drummond's book, "Parasitism," is what we dread. Our meetings are sometimes dead and often weak; but, at any rate, we at once know that they are. We cannot hide our feebleness behind a musical service, nor live on the eloquence or earnestness of our minister. Perhaps it is better that the nakedness of the land should be unconcealed, that there may be a chance of reform.

If the access of the soul to its Divine original and basis be a reality, we prefer to leave the way open for spontaneous expression; thinking that there is no sacredness like the sanctity of a human soul, the only real temple of the Divine Indwelling. So we meet on a basis of silence, give liberty for all to speak, or to offer prayer, and wait for the consequences. The consequence has been what we should expect, a revelation of Divine life mixed with human dross, at its best veritable inspiration, and even at its weakest disciplined by the general sense of solemnity in the congregation. It is remarkable that for 250 years a solemn quiet, rather than an ebullition of excitement, has been the Divine way of manifestation with us.

We have no celebration of Holy Communion. This will strike you more strangely, perhaps, than anything else, and more coldly and unpleasantly. And it is generally said that there is a direct command of our Lord to perform this rite. On that point I cannot now do more than refer you, if you care for my opinion, to a little pamphlet on the Lord's Supper, of which I still have a number of copies available; but the true Quaker argument is that no religious observances were contemplated by our Lord; that he left behind no organisation, but a spirit to inspire many organisations; and that the true Communion is a daily feeding upon Christ; and that days of special religious excitement are apt to be followed by reaction between the great days.

The tendency to shirk effort—to do things in the easiest possible way—to make cheap substitutes for costly things—is ever present in our nature. Now the communion with the Infinite, which we seek as the very fountain of religious strength, is not an easy or a lazy experience. It is the most active energy of the soul. And how easy it is to substitute a ceremonial for the reality. If the Eucharist does become a substitute for true communion, its very beauty and impressiveness become evil instead of good for us; further, there has inevitably arisen the tendency to lay stress on the outward act in itself, and even to assert that without the outward act, performed under proper ecclesiastical sanction, no communion is possible. Such assertions are quite familiar, and the service of the Society of Friends is to experimentally demonstrate their error. These are, then, the kind of grounds which have led us to eschew the outward means through which our fellow-Christians receive, as I am sure they do, Divine blessing; and to be our own priests, no one coming closer to God than we. I hope I have not been too controversial. I was bound to explain our position on this central point of divergence. The processes of the soul are real: all else is but regulation, and regulation on such a subject spells hindrance.

It is too true that when one of the great needs of mankind has become officially recognised and institutions organised to supply the need, these institutions tend to stand in the way of the free and simple satisfaction of the need. The recognised authorities come to regard it in a technical light, and only in a narrow and official way. But the spirit bloweth where it listeth, still. So that we stand as a testimony to the dangers of over-organisation. We are not organised even into clergy and laity.

The whole of our little spiritual strength, then, has been devoted direct to the help and salvation of man, and has not been devoted to the support of institutions. We have built no costly churches, maintained no clergy, either in wealth or poverty, furnished no choirs and organs; we have devoted ourselves to freeing the slaves, to teaching our adult schools, to fighting intemperance, to humanising gaols, to foreign missions, to helping the victims of war and famine whenever they blast the face of the world. We have time and money for these things largely because they are not absorbed in providing means of grace for ourselves.

The secondary place which religious observances have with us makes us appear quite irreligious to some. There is so little to see; no sacraments, no creeds, no baptism, no clergy, no choirs. But, correspondingly, the whole of human life and experience is in a measure transfigured to our minds. The concerns of business and recreation are all part of Divine Service. It is a common-place with us that there is no line between sacred and secular. We shun amusements which weaken the moral fibre. Even our peculiarities of speech and dress, now abandoned, were a perhaps misplaced expression of sensitive aloofness from contamination. We love simplicity of life, that the soul may not be hampered by the swaddling clothes of luxury. We try to live all the time sub specie æternitatis, in the very presence of the Eternal. We believe that pure religious service is to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction and to keep ourselves unspotted from the world. All this, you will see, leads to a distrust of any localising of the Divine Presence, any materialising of the Spirit. We each have our own holy places where we have met with God; but they are independent of buildings and need no consecration.

A creed to us is a thing impossible. If it is consciously felt, it is a slavery of the soul; if not felt, it is a nullity. Each man must be free to make his own creed. And our bond of union is in a united reliance upon individual guidance. Our attitude towards the Bible is more like the intimate familiarity of friendship than the ceremonious deference of a slave. We are in sympathy with modern critical studies, and have no rubrics to be affected by their results. Our authority in religion is within. Great variety of belief is permitted on the large theological questions which concern all Christians.

The testimony always borne by us against war is, perhaps, the fact which has made the most impression upon the public. It is due to our founders' quick recognition of the evil spirit behind war, the lusts from which it came. They were free from any connection with Governments, and their whole attention was directed to the true inwardness of things; to a spiritually minded man moral and spiritual influences are the only right ones. Force is no remedy; and the slain soldier is a temple of the Lord destroyed.

Such is our ideal. I have given that to you because that is what you want from me to-night. But we, the actual Friends, "in this poor miserable hampered actual," let me confess in the same breath, carry out our ideal most imperfectly. We stumble and fail, and are victims to temptation and all the various influences which harden and corrupt the soul.

Yet we are encouraged by the knowledge that our simple worship has been found helpful by many saintly souls, and has been a source of the strength of many a brave servant of the Cross.

MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING: CONTINUED REPORT.

We reported last week the annual business meeting of the Midland Christian Union, held in the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, on Monday, March 10. Here follows a report of the afternoon Conference and the evening service:—

THE CONFERENCE.

After luncheon the President took the chair, and at once called upon Professor J. H. Muirhead (Birmingham University) to read his paper on "Modern Methods in Relation to Temperance Reform." The following summary can do little more than suggest the contents of a very important, closely reasoned, and interesting paper.

He believed, Professor Muirhead said, that of single social causes of demoralisation, it would probably be generally admitted that intemperance was by far the greatest. The expenditure of something like £100,000,000 on drink alone by the working classes annually, and the loss on an average per individual worker of some thirty days a year, represented not only an appalling amount of individual poverty and misery, but an economic, political, and, as recent writers had reminded us, a military danger of the first magnitude. The question, however, for consideration was not as to the extent of the evil, but as to the way of getting rid of it. He had therefore chosen the subject of methods rather than the need of temperance reform. Noting at the outset one or two of the most outstanding differences between the spirit and policy of the early phase of the movement and the present, he showed how the end aimed at and so habitually thought of by the early reformers, was the total abolition, rather than the improvement of, the drinking habits of the people—teetotalism rather than temperance. And then he showed how circumstances had, in the opinion of many men, so completely changed the situation as to require a corresponding change of attitude in the true reformers. Science was coming more and more to recognise that the craving for strong drink in its extreme forms was in a large number of cases an inherited disease which, like others in the same class, could only be effectively treated by isolation and systematic extermination of the morbid stock. The more comprehensive view of the problem brought home by facts of the past made it impossible any longer to place the same reliance upon any single line of attack, least of all upon any merely negative or prohibitive policy, and recent writers had done good service to the cause by insisting upon the necessity of combining constructive with controlling measures. They were faced with the failure of the policy of prohibition, taken as a whole, to effect its object; and secondly, there was the present state of organisation in the "trade" representing a policy, in part at least, adopted as a measure of defence against the attacks of the older Temperance party. Evidence gathered from all parts of the world, showed not only failure of the older policy to effect its purpose, but a tendency to bring with it unforeseen effects, in contempt for law and the corruption of its officers. The opposition the Temperance party must acknowledge was enormous. There was a trade interest representing £300,000,000 of capital, distributed over thousands of shareholders of every rank, with tens of thousands of employés thoroughly roused to a sense of its danger, and on the other hand the tightened hold over the licensed houses obtained by the great brewers through what was known as the tied-house system. This system was not a new thing; they heard of it so early as 1818. What was new was the phenomenal rapidity of its recent development, resulting in the inclusion within it of some three-fourths of the licensed houses. As to the general effect of this extension there ought to be no mistake, and it could not be too widely known or too strongly insisted upon that the general effect was to increase drinking. The 1899 Minority Report of the Royal Commission left no doubt upon this head. He believed that nothing short of the organised action of the community as a whole would avail in the future to check the abuses of the liquor traffic. He did not undervalue attempts, either through agreement, as was being done in Birmingham, or through State action as Lord Peel proposed, to reduce the number of licensed houses. When they had done their best in that direction they would still find themselves face to face with a serious problem. They would still have innumerable houses in our larger cities, each with a larger clientèle of customers, each provided with the means, as well as the motive, to expend its attractions by a still more palatial glare and glitter over an even wider area than at present. The more one considered the limits to the extinction policy, the more he believed were they driven to the conclusion that the only ultimate means of coping with the problem was by asserting the claim of localities to have the traffic managed in the way best suited to the welfare of the community as a whole. The most valuable suggestion he thought in the Minority Report was not the proposal for the reduction of licenses, but that for the control of their issue by a body more directly answerable to the ratepayers, and indeed largely consisting of representatives of the county or city councils. This was entirely in the right direction, though short of what he believed would be found to be ultimately necessary. The true line of development was in the direction of reinstating the public-house in the true sense of the word—as a place of rest and recreation, of diversion and reasonable enjoyment. Any new policy should relegate the sale of drink pure and simple to the background, and make the public-houses again what they were in intention, and at one time in fact. The intention was undoubtedly that in most cases the public-house should be a place where it would be possible to obtain alcoholic drinks, but it was also intended that these should form only a small part of the attraction, as in most Continental restaurants. It was because the new Public-house Trust Association was likely to prove a suggestive experiment in this direction, rather than because it offered a final solution of the problem, that it deserved every encouragement from temperance reformers. In the meantime, there was another direction in which they might look for assistance. The Town and County Councils, they were told, were going to have secondary education entrusted to them under the new Education Bill. Here was a form of secondary education which was already in their hands—the education which could be conveyed to adult citizens through judicious arrangements for rational enjoyment. The Glasgow Exhibition and the recent Industrial Exhibition in Birmingham proved the lamentable want of cheap and respectable places of indoor recreation in the city and neighbourhood. Both places were regularly crowded; the same people came to see one another, to hear good music, to look at some good drawing or colouring, to have a meal, or merely a drink and a pipe in pleasanter surroundings than any public-house could yet supply. The results were unmistakable, and some municipalities, notably Glasgow, had begun to apply them. In that city there was a great system of winter gardens, municipal concerts, listened to by 10,000 people on Saturday evenings, which did not cost the ratepayers a penny, and a new concert-hall and winter garden were likely to be added to the municipal resources of enjoyment. More and better results would follow when the City Council there had the courage to attack the problem of the people's refreshment, so closely bound up with the people's recreation. His opinion was that no programme of reform was likely to be successful in the coming century, or at all, to meet the situation which did not take a broad and tolerant view of the ideal to be aimed at, which did not include a large measure of collective control, perhaps collective management, of the sale of intoxicants, and which did not include such indirect methods as the improvement on the one hand of the homes, and on the other of the public enjoyments of the people.

The discussion was opened by Mr. GEORGE BASNETT (Birmingham), who spoke in favour of the introduction of a superior and attractive class of coffee-house, provided with all reasonable modern attractions in the way of games. He insisted also that a strong condemnation of juvenile smoking was desirable.

The Rev. J. C. STREET, while admiring the spirit and masterly character of Professor Muirhead's paper, stated that he was very largely in disagreement with it, He did not admit that the whole statement of facts was accurate, having regard to the success of prohibition in America. He was still strongly of opinion that total abstinence was one of the best forms which could be employed of promoting temperance. He knew of no method that had been so powerful, influential, or successful as the method of total abstinence. It had saved innumerable multitudes, not simply from drinking, but from drunkenness. Upon the total abstinence principle he placed his implicit faith, although he, of course, recognised with gratitude that there were subsidiary agents which might be employed leading to personal abstinence, and in the direction of sweeping away from a district certain temptations. Certainly a solution would not be found in the municipalisation of the drink traffic.

The Rev. J. B. HIGHAM gave his experience as missioner among the navvies in the Elan Valley. In the Corporation canteen it was, he said, impossible for an habitual drunkard to get served, it was also impossible for a man to obtain drink there during working hours. He believed that very much might be done in the direction of modifying drinking propensities. What was necessary was a palatable light beverage, free from alcohol. They also found as a most effective counter-attraction Saturday night "socials," in which popular music and a little dancing were introduced, as well as a temperance buffet.

The Rev. L. P. JACKS, in moving a hearty vote of thanks to Professor Muirhead, said the type of public-house which Professor Muirhead had in mind was something very different from the ordinary public-house of to-day. He could not help feeling that some of the old planks of the Temperance party needed at least modification.

The motion was seconded by the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, who observed that they could scarcely be Christian folk without having the drink question a constant burden upon their minds and consciences. He admitted the need for transforming the public-houses, but in front of that he put the transforming of private houses. Local option and prohibition were heroic remedies, but they were quite impossible in the present state of public opinion. He was strongly of the view that the question should be tackled on the side of the housing of the people, the education of the people, and the improvement of the workshops in which so many men were condemned to pass their lives. What also was necessary was the provision of counter attractions under healthy conditions to the public-house for giving the people some taste of the joy of living.

The motion was unanimously adopted, and Professor MUIRHEAD briefly replied. He hoped, he said, to see the public-house of the future more after the style of the Continental restaurant. He believed that the publican could then be fought on his own ground by any company like the Public Trust.

THE EVENING SERVICE.

Service was held in the Church of the Messiah in the evening, when the Rev. E. W. Lummis, of Warrington, preached a sermon on "The Knowledge and Love of God," taking for text James iii. 17., together with the episcopal benediction from the Prayer-book.

We regret that we can only offer a very imperfect report of the sermon, which dealt with what had been and what ought to be the relations between Theology and Religion.

Too often in the past there had been a dissipation of religious force in theological polemic. Again and again the knowledge of God has degenerated into fanaticism and schism. The epistle from which the text was taken was itself a mediating document, striving to reconcile two sects—was man justified by faith, or was he justified by works? Here is the beginning of the great controversy, and the difference led to schism. But the difference was not a difference of religion; it was a difference of theology alone. It belonged to the mind alone, apart from the heart. Sometime later the idea came forward that Jesus was the Logos, and the Church was divided as to whether he was the Logos or not. Then came questions as to the nature of the God-man: Had he two wills, or one only; two natures, or one? a question settled for the Church at Nicœa. And following this was the question as to the nature of the Holy Ghost: What relation did it bear to the Father, and what relation to the Son? This question was settled for the Church towards the close of the fourth century, So question after question arose. But always in the field of theology, and not of religion.

Then to clear souls it occurred that this was not what Jesus meant, and there was made the protest of a practical discipleship by such a one as St. Francis. Later came the protest of Luther, who spoke true words about the right of every soul who recognised God as Father to speak directly with God as his Father. But by and by the knowledge of God degenerated again to fanaticism or sectarianism, and a theological standard of orthodoxy was set up. So with Calvin and with others, and in the Puritan revolt in this country. Bearing in mind these lessons of history, it must be clear to us that the knowledge and the love of God cannot be really separated; but theology must not be allowed to dominate religion, as has too often been the case. On the contrary, our theology ought to be founded on religion. Not that in our churches of Open Trust we are to be silent as to theological truth.

It is only by making our heart guide our intellect, and our intellect guide our heart, that we can be right. We exist to find new truth continually, and to preach new truth continually. There is a wisdom that cometh not from above, earthly, fanaticism. Out of it come schism and hatred, and it leads men to hypocrisy—tempts men to profess with their lips what they do not believe with the heart. But there is also the wisdom from above in those who teach the truth, but do not seek forcibly to impose it on the world—a wisdom pure, peaceable, gentle, full of good fruits. For all the nobler issues of religious effort the one road to success was to lay aside the lower wisdom, fanatical, impatient, based on self-love, and cultivate the wisdom which is not only pure and fruitful, but also merciful, peaceful, and gentle.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

A FRIEND told me the other day of a service which he had been induced to attend at the principal Wesleyan Methodist chapel of Leeds. It was a Sunday evening, and there was no special attraction. The preacher was the one most often heard in the place—an able and earnest man with a natural gift of oratory, but not a Spurgeon, or even a Price-Hughes. The place was seated for 2,500; it was "packed"; there must have been nearer 3,000 there. The sermon was an old-fashioned one on "The Bible: Its Infallibility, and its Adaptability to all Modern Uses." "All our errors and our blunders arose from the neglect or the misunderstanding of it. Even the mistakes and failings of scientific research might be traced to ignorance of the Scriptures." I am told that the usual offertory is from £18 to £20, not, it may be said, a large amount for so great a number to raise; but it must be remembered that they are for the most part very poor people, and an average of twopence a head is more than "respectable" congregations generally raise for the ordinary weekly collection. Indeed, I have heard of a former vicar of Leeds Parish Church reproaching the large evening congregation by contrasting the average amount of the offertory with that which would result from a contribution of one halfpenny a head! Moreover, large sums of money are raised here in other ways; many thousands must have been spent during the last few years in additions to and improvement of the school and chapel premises, two nurses are supported for the benefit of the poor of the mission, and an active religious and philanthropic work is being carried on under the direction of the ministers of the place.

Now, why is it that work on so large a scale, so well supported, and showing such satisfactory results is utterly beyond Unitarian reach? We are more or less successful, judging of success by our own standard, but judged by Methodist standards we fail uniformly and altogether. We do not reach the masses although we go to them and try every means to get a hearing of them. We have mission churches in densely-populated neighbourhoods; they are for the most part small—I suppose not one would accommodate more than 600—but is there one of them regularly filled? Then we appeal to the classes, and it cannot be said that they respond any better than do the poor. Our best churches are rarely or never filled. The people who attend are often of the salt of the earth, but, however select the audience may be, it is not numerous.

Now it is childish to shut our eyes to the fact, and worse than childish to deny that it is fact. If we are adult in mind we shall face it boldly, and ask what it means. "Who and what art thou?" is the proper way, according to our old story-books, of addressing the spectre which waylays us in a dark lane by night, or awakes us by stealthy tread across our bedroom floor; and we used to read, to our great relief, how, so addressed by the terrified mortal, the object of his apprehension would turn out to be a white cow got astray from the herd, or a cat which had concealed itself under the bed to escape its enforced seclusion in the coal-hole. We are not successful—there's the white-sheeted ghost which haunts our meetings. Well, why not? Our opponents say it is because we do not deserve success, we have no gospel, we do not hold the truth of God, we have no ministry which meets the spiritual needs of men. But does the success or failure of any religious movement depend upon its own merits? Or how is it that Romanism is a failure among the poor of England, and Protestantism a failure among the poor of Ireland? Take away the Irsh element, and English Romanism would be left very much in the position of Unitarianism, with the advantage, of course, that its adherents are bound to make open profession of their faith. Again, put out of account the English and Scotch families settled on Irish soil, and all the Protestant churches there together would not be more, or more influential, than we Unitarians are in England. It is abundantly clear by this time that success of the common type is not for us, and boasting is a poor substitute for it. We must be content, ay and be proud, to bear our witness, "whether they will hear or whether they will forbear." If it is often under much discouragement that we speak for what is to us the cause of God and of right, so much the more the merit. There is little credit in bearing witness to the truth of commonly received opinions; we may share the reproach and the reward of the prophet and martyr if we uphold our protest against a frowning or scornful world.

These reflections are not, I am sorry to say, at all inappropriate to my report on Yorkshire Unitarianism. They are, on the contrary, directly suggested by a mental review of the state of our scattered churches. It would be so gratifying to your correspondent and your readers alike if there was some one or other notable success to chronicle; but it would be a poor thing to set down the real figures even where there has been progress.

Perhaps the most encouraging feature of recent months has been the improvement at the old chapel at Wakefield. The building, whose beautiful sunburnt brick is a pleasure to the eye, may be seen by travellers northwards from the railway station, which overarches part of its graveyard. It has always seemed to me the model of what a Unitarian Chapel should be, by no means to be mistaken for a ritualistic church; inside and out just looking what it has always been, the place of worship of solid, unpretending people, content to be in a small minority but determined to maintain their own. At one time, as I have been told, it was well attended, and the coaches of country families would be seen at the gates waiting for the conclusion of service. But for many years the congregation has been thin, and it seemed almost beyond hope of revival. But revival there certainly has been of late, as I have been assured by outsiders as well as by members of the congregation. Mr. Chalmers lately completed twenty-one years of ministry at Wakefield, and more gratifying to him than even the presentation made to him at the time must be the increase of numbers and interest which has followed.

It is good news to us all that the congregation of Park-street, Hull, has at last found a pastor, after nearly a year spent in search. And it is a compliment to our College, that after hearing many men of age and long experience in the ministry, it is a student whom they have finally preferred. Mr. F. H. Vaughan, B.A., who will finish his course next June, is the minister-elect, and I hope I may write next September to tell you that we have all joined with our friends at Hull in giving him a hearty welcome to Yorkshire. But he may be fully assured of it beforehand.

It is the season of bazaars, and we are talking of a great county bazaar to be held next year. The only doubt is whether the individuals who care at all about Unitarianism, as distinct from their own chapel, are numerous enough to warrant any hope of success. If we could promise ourselves results which should bear to the whole Union the same proportion that the results of the bazaar just held at Hunslet bear to the congregation there, we should do magnificently. Over £125 has been raised without any exceptional effort, and without appealing beyond the boundaries of Leeds. Holbeck follows with its bazaar this week, and we trust it will not suffer from coming so soon after its near neighbour.

I hear that Mr. Taylor has resigned the pulpit at Elland. I trust that the fact that he has not succeeded in a place of exceptional difficulty will not prevent his soon obtaining another pulpit. The perseverance and patience with which he has so long stood to a post where there is much to discourage and little of reward, ought rather to commend him to churches in need of a minister.

Dewsbury and Huddersfield are two churches which have this misfortune in common, that they have been closed for a longer or shorter period at some crisis of their history. Both are at present asserting their right to existence, and neither is now to be numbered among the weakest of our churches. Mr. Mellor and Mr. Whiteman are doing all that can be done under adverse circumstances, and their congregations are rallying to their side.

There is no real reason for discouragement in this review of our affairs any more than there is for exultation. The only thing which we have to deplore is the departure from among us of Mr. Ellis. London gains what Yorkshire loses, but this is poor consolation to the congregation at Upperthorpe which owes so much to him and is so warmly attached to him. We hope they may not have to wait long to find a minister who will not be unworthy of his predecessor; but they cannot offer much in the way of remuneration, and good ministers are not waiting about for hire.

Charles Hargrove.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Colyton.—The children of the Sunday-school had their annual tea on the 4th inst., about thirty-two (including helpers and some older scholars) being present. Gifts were afterwards distributed to all the children now attending the school, besides special prizes of books for regularity of attendance and for success in the recent examination. The funds for the tea, &c., were kindly given by Mrs. Sweetland, the late Miss Powell, and Mr. Kittle jun., to whom thanks are due, as also to those who kindly assisted by personal services.

Hastings.—The Free Christian Church has been thoroughly renovated, beautified, and put into complete repair. The congregation, aided by numerous friends, with a grant from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, have raised the amount required. One member of the church has contributed as his offering a beautiful piece of decorative work, in the form of a text, 1 Cor. xiii. 13, painted in black and gold on the wall behind the pulpit. The gallery of the church has been altered, so that it may be used as a schoolroom, for guild meetings, &c. The reopening services will take place on Sunday next, when the Rev. Gardner Preston will preach at both services.

Heaton Moor.—The past season has been one of increased activity. Monthly social evenings have been established, and with the exception of one particularly cold and uncomfortable evening, the attendance has been good: they have been a valuable addition to the social life of the church. Good music has been provided on these occasions with the help of many friends, including members of the choirs of our churches at Moss Side, Longsight, Stockport, and Bradford, and the Rev. G. A. Payne gave an interesting lecture on "Mrs. Gaskell." The Young People's Guild has entered on more active life, and has had frequent and interesting meetings. It is a pleasure to record that the attendance at the ordinary services has noticeably improved, and that several new members have joined the church with the New Year.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—The annual meeting of this Society was held in the Hope-street Church Hall, on Thursday, 13th inst., the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst (president) in the chair. There were present representatives from eight of the thirteen schools affiliated to the society, a very wet evening probably preventing those from a distance from coming. The report of the Council showed that the past year had been a profitable one, all the meetings of which there had been six, having been very well attended, and proving of greater interest and more full of life than in some recent years. Another school—namely, Southport, had affiliated itself to the Society during the year, making thirteen in all, with 1,972 scholars on their books and 141 teachers. The treasurer's statement of accounts was also satisfactory, showing a balance in hand of over £2. After the business, the President read a most interesting paper on "Our Duty to Animals, as a subject for Sunday-school Teaching," in the course of which he said that cruelty to animals by human beings was often caused by thoughtlessness, bad temper, ignorance, and fashion, but most often by the real indifference of human beings towards the feelings and sufferings of dumb creatures. Such indifference tended to undermine character, and it was therefore of great importance that all our scholars and young people should be trained to be kind and sympathetic towards animals. The teachers would find their scholars always interested in stories about animals, and much might be done in this way to teach them to be kind and gentle, and above all to have real love for animals. A discussion followed, in which the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, W. J. Jupp, A. Leslie Smith, Miss O. M. Rawlins, Mr. Zeper, and the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones took part.

London.—A Conference of Lay-Preachers in connection with the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties was held in the Council Room, Essex Hall, on Thursday evening, the 13th inst. There was a very good attendance. After a social and friendly chat around the tea-table, the chair was taken by Mr. John Harrison, President of the Provincial Assembly, who expressed his pleasure in occupying that position, and also their indebtedness to the lay-preachers for the invaluable help they were rendering to the smaller churches. The Rev. J. Page Hopps gave a very characteristic address on "The Cathedral, the Salvation Army Barracks, and the Footpath Between." He regarded the Cathedral as the symbol of an Æsthetic and Musical Religion, the Salvation Army Barracks as the symbol of a Religion of Rescue, the Footpath Between was a Religion of Average and Comprehensive Human Life. The Footpath suggested (1) Being in the Open; (2) Freedom and Variety; (3) Reality; (4) Moderation. Mr. Hopps emphasised the need of going forth into the open, away from churches and chapels, and thus endeavour to come into contact with the masses who go to no place of worship. He urged the duty of adapting themselves to existing circumstances, to guard against unreality and over-emphasis, and not to express what they themselves did not feel. They might learn from the Cathedral, grace and beauty and musicalness; and from the Salvation Army, reality, ardour, solidity, vigour, and emotion. A short discussion followed, and hearty votes of thanks were passed to Mr. Hopps and the chairman.

London: Essex Church.—"The Daughter of Jairus," by Sir John Stainer, will be given on Sunday evening by an augmented choir. Collections will be taken for the musical expenses.

London: Little Portland-street.—On Thursday, March 6, a very interesting address was given at the Portland Institute, on the subject of "Women's Suffrage," by Miss Isabella O. Ford, of Leeds. The Rev. H. S. Perris presided, and amongst those present were Miss Jenner, Miss McKee, and others interested specially in women's work and progress. Miss Ford made a powerful plea for an immediate grant of the franchise to properly qualified women; claiming that it would add a new dignity and worth to woman's labour; help to raise the rate of wages in factories and workshops; and largely contribute to the solution of the terrible social problem, with which the wages question is closely associated. After some friendly discussion, a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Miss Ford for her able address.

London: Mansford-street.—On Tuesday evening the members and friends of the Mansford-street Church and Mission gathered together to bid farewell to the Rev W. G. Cadman and Mrs. Cadman, who are leaving London for Macclesfield. In the absence of Mr. W. S. Preston, the chair was taken by the Rev. F. H. Jones. Mr. Foster, on behalf of the workers in the chapel and school, presented Mr. and Mrs. Cadman with a set of fish knives and forks and slice, and a handsome walnut coal-cabinet, and in so doing spoke warmly of the friendship and esteem in which the minister and his wife were held among them. Miss L. Jones, on behalf of the Committee and many friends and supporters of the Mission, handed Mr. Cadman a purse, with Mrs. Cadman's initials, and containing a draft for £98. Letters were read from the Revs. E. Daplyn, W. C. Bowie, V. D. Davis, and J. P. Hopps expressing regret at their inability to be present, and their admiration of the excellent work that Mr. Cadman has done. Mr. Squire, in bidding farewell to Mr. Cadman, conveyed to him the expression of regret on Mr. Preston's part at being prevented by an accident and injury to his hand from being present. The Chairman, in opening the proceedings, referred to the deep and lasting influence of Mr. Cochrane upon London Mission work generally, and the unbroken unity that exists among all workers for good and great purposes and the true improvement of human life, and assured Mr. Cadman that they would still feel that they were all working with him and he with them. Mr. Cadman, in responding to the various speeches, and thanking for the farewell presents of his friends, referred with earnest feeling to his work in London, and with gratitude to all helpful workers at the Mission and in the schools and other institutions. Mr. Ion Pritchard said farewell on behalf of the various friends and fellow-workers outside the Mission and Mr. Lee for those within. The proceedings were interspersed with music, and brought to a close by the singing of a verse of "Auld Lang Syne."

London: Peckham.—The Lecture Hall attached to the Peckham Unitarian Church was well filled on Friday week on the occasion of an entertainment on behalf of the Avondale Band of Hope funds. The first portion of the programme consisted of vocal and instrumental music, contributed by friends; this was followed by an operetta entitled Red Riding Hood's Rescue, performed by members of the Band of Hope. The choruses were delightfully rendered, and solo parts well sustained. The charming dresses and excellent singing reflected great credit on the organisers of the entertainment, and especially on Mrs. Cooley, who had undertaken charge of the rehearsals and general arrangements.

London: Plumstead.—A very successful bazaar was held at the Unitarian Church on Thursday, the 13th inst. It was opened by Lady Durning Lawrence, supported by Sir Edwin Durning Lawrence, Bart., M.P., Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Mr. J. Harrison, Mrs. Martineau, Mrs. Tarrant, the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, T. E. M. Edwards, G. W. Tarrant, F. Allen, W. C. Pope, and others. The chair was taken by Mr. David Martineau. After prayer, offered by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, a report, briefly stating the origin and progress of the movement in Woolwich, was given by the Secretary of the Bazaar Committee, Miss Ada Burrows. It was stated that the hall in which the people now worship, and the site which admits of the erection of a church yet to be realised, cost the sum of £2,204. The bazaar was held for the purpose of clearing off the debt of £700 which still remained. In this help would be received from the Committee of the London Bazaar. The Chairman then called on Lady Durning Lawrence, who, in an appropriate speech, declared the bazaar open. A vote of thanks, moved by Dr. Odgers, and seconded by Mr. J. Harrison, was acknowledged by Sir Edwin on behalf of Lady Durning Lawrence, and business at once commenced. The bazaar realised, between donations and sales, £239, and the land and hall are now practically free from debt. The church and congregation, which are steadfastly increasing, will probably ere long contemplate the completion of the plans of their architect, Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, in the erection of a church on the land adjoining the hall.

London: Stamford-street.—In December last one of a series of aggregate meetings of local Bands of Hope, arranged by the Southwark Bands of Hope Union, was held in Stamford-street Chapel. At each meeting the same address was given and prizes were offered by the Union for essays upon the management of the meetings; musical programme, &c., was entrusted to the home society at each centre. In his report to the Union upon the meetings, just issued, the lecturer, Mr. H. F. Morris—a member of the Church of England—says: "The gatherings were nearly all successful. Personally I enjoyed most those held at Southwark Park Congregational, St. Winifred's, Manor Chapel, St. Augustine's, The Ark, and above all, that of the Unitarian Church, Blackfriars." We are also gratified to find that one of our members (Edward Turner) has secured first place for his essay among fifty sent in from Bands of Hope in the boroughs of Southwark and Bermondsey.

Manchester: Moss Side.—The Committee and minister consented to the Hulme Corps of the Salvation Army holding a service in their church on Sunday afternoon, March 2, when the Rev. Charles Roper led the devotions, and Captain Frank Prideaux delivered an address on "The Social Work of the Army." There was a good attendance of the congregation, and their sympathy with the "Self-denial Week" effort received tangible expression in a collection amounting to £4 2s. 6d. It was probably the first time the Salvationists ever held such a service in a Unitarian church, and certainly the first time a number of Unitarians ever joined them in such common worship.

Stockport.—Preaching on Sunday week on "Signs of the Times," the Rev. B. C. Constable referred to Archdeacon Wilson's recent utterances on the "Atonement," Canon Henson's on "Apostolical Succession," and the Vicar of Eccles's address on "The Unitarian Movement." This last he recognised as a brave utterance, and trusted that it would help to break down the walls of partition between Churchmen and Nonconformists.

Todmorden.—On Saturday last a reopening party of the school was held after decoration. A large number was present. The entertainment consisted of a quartette party, with two reciters. Mr. H. Barker, the chairman, said that within eight years over £,2,030 had been raised for the enlargement of the school. The minister said that the roll of church and school was now at its greatest height. But the work was begun—namely, to fill the church and school. On Sunday a scholar's service in the school celebrated the reopening. Two addresses were given and two solos sung. Six teachers' prizes were presented for complete attendances during the year. Three gold medals were given for ten years' complete attendance to three scholars, and one silver medal for five years' similar attendance.

Torquay: Unity Hall.—On Monday, March 3, Rev. C. Stovell, Baptist minister, of Chudleigh, gave a lecture on "Longfellow" to a large and attentive audience. The interest in the proceedings was much increased by several songs, duets, and trios from Longfellow's poems, rendered by friends who were kind enough to give their services. On Friday evening the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., of London, on a brief visit to the West of England, lectured on his "Visit to India and the Bramo Somaj." Owing, unfortunately, to the short notice and counter attractions on the same day, the attendance was extremely small, but those who were fortunate enough to attend were amply rewarded by what they heard. The Rev. A. E. O'Connor presided at both lectures.

West Bromwich (Presentation).—On Tuesday week a congregational meeting was held in the schoolroom, under the presidency of Mr. J. J. Bowater, for the purpose of making a farewell presentation to the Rev. F. A. Homer, who has been obliged to resign his ministry on account of ill-health, and is going for a time to Canada. The Chairman and other speakers bore high testimony to the value of Mr. Homer's work in church, school, and guild, and in connection with the recreation classes and the Congregational Society; and on behalf of the congregation, the school, and guild, Mr. A. Underhill made the presentation of a beautiful gold Waltham lever watch, with a suitable inscription. Mr. Homer, in acknowledging the gift, said that his friends in the too kind things they had said of his work had described rather the ideal of his ministry that what he had been able actually to accomplish. He should always take the warmest interest in the church, and it would be a great joy to hear of its progress, not merely in numbers but in energy and enthusiasm, in its broad and fearless outlook, and in large-hearted charity.

Whitchurch (Resignation).—The Rev. W. F. Turland has resigned the pulpit of the Church of the Saviour, having accepted an invitation from the congregation in Walsall.

Some Opinions of the Press.

"We can promise the intending reader that he will find in Mr. Mellone a theologian singularly free from prejudice or bias, and a logician of great lucidity and no little dialectical skill. Such a book as this—brief, spirited, and scholarly—is bound to stimulate thought, and may be of direct service to that broad-minded and sincere religious enthusiasm which can accept Newman and Martineau, Comte and Browning, with equal interest, finding in each some broken light of that evasive truth towards which the thought and imagination of the ages are ever slowly but surely progressing."—The Academy and Literature.

"Mr. Mellone approaches his task with so much philosophical acumen, and with so penetrating an insight into the significance of the speculations which have most influence on contemporary thought, that his work could not fail to instruct and stimulate any attentive reader."—The Scotsman.

"The book is written with great ability, and is specially memorable for its interpretation of Browning's contribution to the solution of the supreme problem."—The Glasgow Herald.

"Mr. Mellone gives us a masterly analysis of Newman's famous 'Grammar of Assent.' . . . His chapter on the philosophy of Browning displays an insight into and appreciation of Browning's position, which should in itself be sufficient to commend his book to a wide circle of readers."—The Irish Times (Dublin).

"We recommend Dr. Mellone's book to those who are interested in the philosophical and religious theories enshrined in the writings of the five great leaders of thought with whom the volume deals."—The Pall Mall Gazette.

BUILDING FUND.

Notwithstanding the most strenuous efforts of the Congregation, there remained at the close of 1901 a debt of £298 on the new Church, in addition to the £1,000 borrowed from "The Permanent Chapel Building Fund." And as the repayment of this must commence next year, it is most important that the present debt should be cleared off. To encourage this, the London District Unitarian Society has promised, in addition to its previous contribution, a further £25 if the balance is raised by the end of the present month. The congregation, which has already raised £668, will give another £50. Various other kind friends have contributed £168, which with the £25 from the London District Society, leaves £55 still wanting.

Towards this sum subscriptions are invited, and will be thankfully acknowledged by

J. SUDBERY, Esq.,

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

EASTER falls early this year, and with bright sunshine seems to promise to holiday-makers some remnants of the equinoctial gales; but the early spring flowers are here, and we commend to the special attention of our readers the article on "Birds—and the Coming of Spring," which will be found on another page. In South Africa, however, we remember that it is not spring or summer but winter which is coming—for the camps and for the men in the field. Our earnest prayer must be that the fresh hope of peace negotiations may not prove in vain, and that the end of this cruel conflict may be near at hand.

WE have received from the Rev. W. Mellor, of Huddersfield, another strong letter on the subject of the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund, and the independent action of the subscribers to the Fund, as apart from the Conference. It is as well that the doubt which exists in a good many minds on this subject should be cleared up, and we shall publish Mr. Mellor's letter next week, hoping for further elucidation. Meanwhile, there is no doubt as to the great achievement of the Fund, and the immense benefit it will be to our ministers and congregations alike. We understand that the managers are about to commence work at once, and that every minister who has passed his fortieth year, yet still looks to benefit from the Fund, should apply at once to the hon. secretary, Mr. J. Cogan Conway (Brooklands, Ringwood), or he may lose the special benefit conferred on such seniority. Congregations will remember that an annual subscription of a guinea gives them the right of representation at general meetings of the Fund.

THE new Education Bill of the Government was brought into Parliament on Monday by Mr. A. J. Balfour, and was read a first time. Mr. Balfour's statement in exposition of the Bill was extremely moderate and conciliatory in tone, and claimed that the Bill was framed not to serve any sectional interest, but with the one object of advancing the cause of education, and making an end of the present "system of costly confusion." Although the full text of the Bill has since been published, there seems to be a good deal of vagueness on many important points, and one chief section of the Bill is left merely permissive, so that what its fate may be is more than doubtful. But Mr. Balfour is quite clear as to his own ideal. A system of Universal School Boards he declared to be impossible, though why he did not explain. The object of the Act of 1870 was only to make good defects in the existing system, but it had led to unexpected results. There were at present about three million children in voluntary schools, and two and a-half million in Board schools; but the voluntary schools were being starved, and they must be preserved by rate-aid from extinction. The School Board system had been extravagant. An educational authority, elected ad hoc, with unlimited rating powers, ought not to be tolerated; there must be a new authority, and the educational and the rating authority must be one and the same.

THE Bill, therefore, proposes to make the County Council in counties, and the Borough Council in county boroughs, the educational authority, to work through committees, according to an approved scheme. Boroughs of over 10,000, and urban districts of over 20,000, are also to be allowed to act as independent authorities; and these authorities are to have control of the whole system of primary, secondary, and technical education. On the education committees the majority of members must be appointed by the Council, but representatives of other bodies, and persons of expert educational experience may also be appointed. Whether any of these latter may be women is not stated. The new authority is to be responsible for the maintenance of voluntary and "Board" schools alike, out of the rates, the managers of the voluntary schools being charged only with the due maintenance of their buildings; and in return for the rate-aid to voluntary schools, the Council will have the right to appoint a third of the managers, and will have other control, but not over the religious teaching. It will thus be seen that the education authority is to be removed from direct popular control, such as exists under the School Board system, and that the control granted over voluntary schools is even further attenuated. While the new authorities are allowed to supersede the School Boards they are not as yet to be compelled to do so! London is exempted from the operations of the Bill, and is left over to be dealt with separately next year.

IN the discussion on the Bill Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman insisted that if rate-aid was given to the voluntary schools there must be genuine popular control. Mr. Bryce expressed the opinion that unity of authority as regards elementary and secondary education might be too dearly bought; it was by no means certain that the authority, which was best for secondary, would be best also for elementary education; but if there was to be one authority, it should be, as in Scotland, specially elected for that purpose. The Borough Councils already had their hands full, and the splendid work of the School Boards ought not to be sacrificed. As regards the facilities given by the Bill for the multiplication of small denominational schools, such a result was very much to be deprecated. The case of Roman Catholics was exceptional, but what the majority of Protestant parents wanted was sound Bible-teaching and moral instruction based upon it. Nothing could be worse for the children than to divide them up on lines of dogmatic separation, of which they could have no understanding. He wished the Government had confined their Bill to the subject of secondary education, when it might have been of great value.

THE Easter number of the Art Journal, published as "The Easter Art Annual, 1902" (Virtue and Co. 2s. 6d.), is devoted to the Life and Work of Dante Gabriel Rossetti. The story of the artist-poet's life, which includes notes on a large number of his pictures, is most interestingly told by Helen M. Madox Rossetti, and the number is very amply illustrated. There are seven full-page reproductions of pictures, including the exquisite "Annunciation" and "Beata Beatrix," which are in the Tate Gallery, and "The Beloved," one of the most perfect of Rossetti's pictures, though in the print its marvellous richness of colouring is, of course, absent. In the text there are a large number of smaller illustrations, "Dante's Dream," the original of which is in the Liverpool Art Gallery, holding the place of honour on the first page. There are also some interesting portraits and sketches of the studio and drawing-room in Rossetti's house at Cheyne-walk.

THERE is a Thrush that sings all the year round, and it costs fourpence a month to hear him sing. He wears a suitable brown coat, and certainly has a good opinion of himself, with a large wide-open page and plenty of margin. Mr. T. Mullett Ellis, of 28, Essex-street, Strand, is his editor, and Simpkin, Marshall and Co. are publishers. January began the second year of his perennial song, and provided fourteen sonnets by Miss May Virginia Lake—these, and nothing more. The sonnets are pleasant reading, if of no very striking originality; but is it lawful for a line of a sonnet to end like this?

And there is none more solitary than—

The sonnets have been commended by Sir Richard Garnett and by Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge, and they do undoubtedly deserve friendly recognition, as from a young writer with a delicate perception and a musical ear. Miss Lake is a lover of Nature, and as time goes on will perhaps write with more concentrated force. What she can already do may be seen from this one sonnet—but best of all by asking the Thrush for the whole fourteen:—

Oh, see how glorious shows the waking earth!
From her long sleep she springs, and everywhere
Shakes forth the golden tassels of her hair,
While all the woodlands echo with her mirth:
See, she is clothed, as for a festival,
In clinging robes of tender shining green,
Broider'd with silver stars and golden sheen,
And round her brows a fragrant coronal
Of purple violets and windflowers pale.
She calleth forth the butterflies and bees
From their dark winter haunts, and in the trees
A choir of singing birds her wakening hail.
Oh, leave your works, ye grave philosophers!
And come into the fields to study hers.

So on "the first mild day of March" Wordsworth called to his sister to leave her work and come out into the open air:—

One moment now may give us more
Than years of toiling reason:
Our minds shall drink at every pore
The spirit of the season.

. . . .

Then come, my sister! come, I pray,
With speed put on your woodland dress;
And bring no book: for this one day
We'll give to idleness.

A recent issue of the Manchester Guardian had a note on the "Ancoats Brotherhood," from which we take the following:—

"The work of the Ancoats Recreation Committee is by no means confined to those refreshing Sunday afternoon gatherings which have just come to an end. It seeks to open the eyes of the 'brothers' as much to the truth and beauty of nature as to the truth and beauty of literature. Through the winter months the members have listened to lectures about books, and much has been taught about the most stimulating and progressive writing of the last ten years. All this has been of enduring value in widening the sympathies and setting the mind at work in new directions. In another month or two the Brotherhood will bid a truce to roofs and go abroad for learning into the fields and woods. Meanwhile there will be gatherings on Sunday mornings to hear addresses on a diversity of things. The subjects down for discussion at the Brotherhood Sunday morning range from the philosophy of Plato to the evolution of the Cremona violin. All alike give promise of good talk, and, as Dr. Johnson observed, 'there is great solace in talk.' On the first Sunday in May there is to be a festival of flowers in the Ancoats Museum, and a discourse on 'The Poet's Garden,' as well as music. Then from May onwards to the end of August the members spend the Sunday, or the greater part of it, in rambling abroad into the country. Moor and woodland, hill and dale, far and near round Manchester will be well explored. The Brotherhood members always know how to spend delightful hours when they turn their back on Ancoats for a shining summer day and voyage afield into the heart of the Cheshire woodlands or the Derbyshire moors. There is also a Brotherhood Cycling Club, which 'runs' on three days of the week through the spring and summer."

The Governors of Willaston School have issued a booklet of information concerning the school, with eight admirable full-page pictures, showing the buildings from various points of view, and interiors of the dining-hall, reading-room, gymnasium, a class-room and a dormitory, and also plans of the grounds and buildings. Willaston is in the heart of Cheshire, a mile from Nantwich and four miles from Crewe station. The building is quadrangular, surrounding a court, and there are ample grounds, with the playing-fields close at hand. On a subsoil of gravel and sand, with a good water supply, and the most enlightened sanitary and house arrangements, the foundations are laid for a thoroughly healthy and happy school-life. The booklet tells of the course of instruction on both the classical and the modern side. In the lower forms the instruction is the same, and elementary science is taught, chiefly by object and diagram lessons.

The aim of the Religious teaching is to instil a simple Christian faith and personal Religion. The history of Religious liberty and rational faith will receive attention. This instruction will be in the hands of teachers free from tests of Religious belief.

Careful and individual attention is given to the physical training and development of the boys, and the whole system of school recreation is compulsory. The boys are taught practical gardening in the grounds, under the school head-gardener, each boy cultivating a separate allotment. What the booklet promises, we have reason to believe, is amply fulfilled at Willaston. If any doubt it, let them go and see, or inquire more fully of the authorities. Mr. A. H. Worthington, 1, St. James-square, Manchester, is Secretary of the school, Mr. E. W. Marshall 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester, the Clerk. The Head Master, Mr. Guy Lewis, should be addressed at Willaston School, Nantwich, Cheshire.

"RETROSPECT."

"I shall go softly all my years."—Isaiah, xxxviii. 15.

Softly, softly, must I go
For the rest of my years in this world below:
Sure no longer of prosperous days,
Shattered to earth as a broken vase,
Matched and mended with infinite care,
To the outward show just passing fair.
But softly, softly, must I go
For the rest of my years in this world below.

In the rosy dawn of life's young day
Visions of greatness before me lay;
Heir of the ages with proof-armour mailed
I grappled with fate and almost prevailed.
But the Angel of God on my hip laid his hand,
And I bowed to the Will of my God's command.
Softly, softly must I go
For the rest of my years in this world below.

The battle is past, the wrestle o'er,
Alive from the conflict, halt and sore,
But blessed of the Lord who alone can give
The trials by which a man can live!
All bitterness past, the love remains,
And faith that to heaven itself attains.
Softly, softly, must I go
For the rest of my years in this world below.

The flush of the morning is gone, 'tis true,
Giving place to evening's golden hue,
A new-risen joy the soul sustains,
The peace of God in the heart now reigns:
And calmly one waits the midnight cry,—
"Go forth to meet Him, the Bridegroom is nigh!"
Softly, softly, must I go
For the rest of my years in this world below.

In the British Weekly of March 20, "A Man of Kent," in his column of "Rambling Remarks," had a reference to The Inquirer, for which we desire to express our cordial acknowledgment. After quoting our recent announcement as to the result of the shareholders' meeting, and adding a friendly word about the editor, the note continued:—

There is no paper I value more. One is always sure of finding in The Inquirer at least one article or review of special mark. It is obvious that such a paper must be conducted under great difficulties, but the literary ability and the ethical fervour of Unitarians are not surpassed in any Church in this country, and they have been well represented in The Inquirer. In his early days Mr. R. H. Hutton was editor of The Inquirer, and he took over to the Spectator much of the best that he had learned among his own people, adding, no doubt, other elements which greatly increased his strength.

As we are not in danger at present of suffering from the woe which befalls him of whom all men speak well, it seemed to us right that the friends of The Inquirer should be permitted to share the pleasure with which we have read this note.

GOD COMING TO HIS TEMPLE.

"Behold the Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to His Temple."

"But who may abide the day of His Coming? and who shall stand when He appeareth? For He is like a refiner's fire."—Malachi iii. 1, 2.

THE prophet Malachi was looking forward to a time when the sumptuous shrine at Jerusalem should receive in fulness the Holy Spirit of the Lord—so that He should rule through the hearts and lives of all His people throughout the land. It was his anticipation of a Golden Age—an age to be made golden, not by gold, but by the spirit of all righteousness having become the kingly power governing life—the very soul and conscience of the nation.

I borrow these fine words of the prophet, that we may give them a present significance.

"Behold the Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to His Temple."

What Lord do we seek? What is His Temple? And how shall he suddenly come?

It is not the Temple on Moriah or Gerizim, on this mountain or on that—it is the temple of the whole earth and heaven, and the Coming of God suddenly into it is His return in the glory and strength of life in the days immediately before us. Is not every Spring-time an Advent of God?

As we have gone forth life has seemed to rush in upon us in an overwhelming tide. We have felt the first fresh intimations of—

A presence that disturbs us with the joy
Of elevated thoughts: a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean and the living air
And the blue sky and in the mind of man—
A motion and a spirit that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things.

Some of us, perhaps, have been conscious of a certain receding of the spiritual tide within us with the annual diminution of the light and suspension of the vitality of Nature. Others are alive to the fact that they too would have had the same experience but for an element of moral defiance in their hearts which prompts them to oppose the braver spirit to depressing circumstance, and to live by the exercise of hope when the present sources of strength fail them. For where physical energy and health are liable to fail, spiritual energy is prone to follow. When Nature has lost her mirth we are more likely to lose ours. The strain is put upon us, rather than the support given to us, to play the man and be ourselves during the slower, duller days of the winter and early year. Therefore we are all expectant of the spring and of the Easter resurrection. Along with Nature let the soul arise in new life. Therefore the sight of the crocuses' "thousand cups of gold," of the silken willow buds, and the dusty catkins, gives us the gladness which comes by promises about to be fulfilled.

We are prone to grumble at the length of our winters; yet, if physically somewhat trying even in their dilatory pace, they have an ethical value which we cannot afford to lose. Spring-time and summer come round quite quickly enough, and last long enough for our behoof. Nay, if this enchanting outburst of life which is now imminent occurred but once in ten or twenty years it might not only fill our souls with awe as some stupendous miracle, but we should want for language to define our gratitude and to measure our praise. But whereas this prodigy of life is repeated twenty times for once, our wonder and thankfulness diminish in opposite proportion.

Into this temple not built with hands, whose floor is the varied earth, whose altars are mountains, with clouds for smoke of incense—which for frescoes has the sunrise, and for windows the sunset—draped with forests and with the dome of sky for roof: into this Temple of Nature comes, in majesty unknown to any temple rites of old, the Lord of All—the Eternal Spirit of Life; and comes suddenly, with proclamation of the winds alone. Suddenly, as we soon shall see, He will have come, and all the land will be one pageant of beauty.

But who may abide the day of His coming? and who shall stand when He appeareth?

In earlier times, when men looked for God to come and judge the earth and rule in glory, their minds clung to the notion of a Deity with a "mailed fist," to be worshipped in dread. Such a conception even influenced the creation of the great works of the Italian masters. Thus, in Michael Angelo's "Last Judgment," where Christ has come to judge the earth and reign amid the saints, he has degenerated into a pagan colossus, from whose fierce attitude his own mother shrinks in fear,—a mountain-smashing Thor hurling the avalanche of his wrath at the paralysed multitudes who have missed his path or defied his will. Who shall abide the day of His coming? Who shall stand when He appeareth? Who, indeed?

But this is not the truth. This is a blasphemy which we willingly consign to the past. God's method of coming to us, to render judgment and to rule the earth, is not the method of merely punishing us when we break His law—giving gladness for goodness and sorrow for sin—but of overwhelming us with such a force of loving-kindness and mercy that the resistance of sin and selfishness within our hearts is broken down. Our redemption lies in the measure of our amenableness to His reason or truth, in the degree in which we are capable of being subjugated by mercy and love—by our not being able to stand against the glory of God in the earth and the glory of God in the soul. Who may abide the day of His coming? Who shall stand when He appeareth?

You or I or anyone may, if only we are sufficiently stolid in heart and dead in conscience. But who may abide complacent and indifferent—who can withstand Him when He appeareth? Who of us can fail to be lifted up, to be chastened in conscience and quickened in life by the refining fire of His glory ascending over the earth?

'Tis life whereof our nerves are scant,
More life and fuller that we want.

It may be that this Easter morning we shall rise from our beds and, looking forth over hill-side and meadow, it will seem as though, by one touch of an invisible hand, earth and heaven have been made anew—the Spirit has come—the Easter Spirit of a Divine resurrection; and in every vernal breeze—in every breath of nature palpitating with the song of birds—in every fragrant exhalation from the furrowed soil, He will be saying: "I am come that ye may have life—and that ye may have it abundantly."

BIRDS—AND THE COMING OF SPRING.*

THROUGH the dark days the jubilant thrush sang on. From the highest bough of his favourite tree, just within the park gates, he greeted the dawn, as each day it glowed one or two minutes earlier in the chill north-east. While the snow was yet on the ground and the frost still held the waters, he sang of the new year—of the young child soon to be born, whose name is Spring. And when the rain fell, and the wind blew still from the east, he held to his prophecy; and then on a day—Nature's "New Year's Day," the first of March, when the sun shone warm, and a soft breeze came up from the south, my thrush went wild with delight. It was no longer a "song without words" that he sang. "I told you, I told you," he shouted. "Did I not tell you? Did I not say it, did I not sing it—winter was going, spring was coming? And now it has come—it has come—it has come." And as I heard him exulting thus and beheld him there, against the sky, on his topmost bough, I fell to thinking of the birds—of those who, in dark days, herald the bright, and when they come make them brighter with their presence; and of those who will return with the bright days to our shores—I thought of them all in their relation to our human affairs, of how much they are to us, and how real a part in our life they play.

For these winged creatures are so near to us, and yet so strange and elusive. We love them, yet fail to understand them. So much in their life delights and yet baffles us. Their gift of flight, their skill in building, their charm of song, their beauty of form, their vivacity, their swiftness and grace of movement—who does not rejoice in these things, yet who knows the secret of the marvellous manifold life they express? Some of them are always with us—even in our great cities the sparrow and redbreast find a home. How we should miss them from our world! How desolate and lonely, how silent and sad would the earth be without them!

Many of us have curious ways of showing affection for these bright and beautiful beings. Some like them when killed, for the sake of their flesh; even the lark, who can sing "at heaven's gate" in the light of dawn, is brought in thousands to the London market every week in winter time, to be eaten. Others show their love of birds by shutting them up in cages, condemning to life-long imprisonment in a few feet of space these wild creatures of the sunshine and sweet air. Strangest of all, many like to wear their wings and feathers on their heads, as if for adornment, knowing that this must mean the slaughter of countless numbers, often in the nesting season, and their young left to die of hunger and cold. Yet some of us still love them for their life, and for that alone. Is it foolish to ask, now that their own glad time of spring, and ours, has returned, what they mean for us, in their own free life, as God made them? They will be coming to us the next few weeks in multitudes from other shores to mingle with those who have stayed the winter through. Their many and varied notes will be heard over the land in field and valley and forest; and spring, in this old England of ours, will be joyous with their presence and their praise, just as it was 10,000 years ago. What is it that they mean to us? What is their message and ministry to our hearts? "Ask now the fowls of the air, and they shall tell thee," said the ancient Hebrew poet. "Behold the birds of the heaven. . . whom your heavenly Father feedeth," said the great nature prophet of Galilee. And when we "ask" or "behold," what wisdom of life and of love may we learn?

They are a link between earth and heaven. They belong to the homely ground where our feet must always tread; but they sing in the trees or the air above us. Among all the higher forms of life that wondrous, glorious gift of flight is theirs alone. They are at home and at ease in regions where only the eye can follow—or some cruel missile of death devised by man's murderous skill. They move, joyous and free, over us where the light and air commingle; and often lift us thither—often make us look up, when our eyes would be on the ground. They take our thoughts away from life's fretful cares, and call us in spirit to soar with them in clearer, brighter realms. I have watched the seagulls floating on wide wing above this great city on the Mersey; I have seen eagles mount in great spiral curves over a Swiss lake, high above Mount Pilatus; I have heard the lark sing from his "privacy of light" over English fields; and it has seemed to me that they helped man's thought to soar, and gave to his spirit wings, and made life more heavenly, serene and pure.

I have often wond ered how much of his gift of aspiration man owes to the birds, with their power to soar and sing. The stars have done much for him, doubtless. They have lifted his soul, and bidden his thoughts roam through the deeps of space. "Come up hither," they have seemed to say; and Newton "voyaging through strange scenes of thought alone," has been, to many, the type of man's soaring intellectual strength; and the "new star in Perseus" has exercised the mind and deepened the wonder of a great company of seekers after knowledge during the past year. But it is often difficult to "hitch your waggon to a star." They are so far away. They hold themselves so coldly remote. They have no link with earth, except the few rays of their light that reach us, after wandering, sometimes many years, through the great silence of space. But the birds belong to our little earthly dwelling-place. They live with us here, and however far they soar, they come back to the homely ground. Like the clouds, which are born of the waters held in the hollows, or flowing down the channels, of the earth, and which will return to earth when their travels in the air are ended, the birds share with us our planetary home, and know its changes of day and night, of cold and heat, of life and death. So their song and their flight in the air above lift us without too severe a strain. They raise our thoughts without bewildering them, and to each of these winged creatures belongs some of the praise which Wordsworth gave to his skylark:

Type of the wise who soar but never roam,
True to the kindred points of heaven and home.

Then, too, there is something very pure and intimately human in the pleasure they bestow, when we are receptive and willing to be cheered. They seem, indeed, for the most part, very indifferent to us. They go their own way when we let them alone. They sing their songs for their own delight. Their loveliness is for themselves—for one another. Their nests, often so exquisitely fashioned, are hidden away for the most part in secret places. The wren, who builds that perfect little house of moss and dried grasses and fern-fronds, conceals it from all but the keenest seekers. The splendid palace of the Bower bird, fashioned and adorned with such lavish care and skill, is found in lonely uninhabited spots, where no foot of man is expected to intrude. The mocking-bird and the hermit thrush—two of the most wonderful songsters of the Western continent—sing in the deep woods, far from the haunts of men. Birds do not seem to care to give us pleasure; but they do. And one of the most careful students of bird life has hazarded the opinion that it is something very closely allied to our human experience which makes them so full of interest and delight to us. Mr. W. H. Hudson, in his latest book, entitled "Birds and Man," has tried to explain some part of the secret of our joy in them; and he suggests that what we value most in a bird's song, e.g., is the degree of its approach to the tones of the human voice. In the chapter, "The Secret of the Willow Wren," after describing its song, so sweet and constant from March till June, and telling how he sat, one Sunday morning, in Kensington Gardens, listening long to its dainty aud leisurely cadence, he says, "The secret of the charm, I imagine, is traceable to the fact that there is something distinctly human-like in the quality of its voice, its timbre." And he says that a foreigner coming to this country many years ago, and hearing the same bird's song for the first time in a London suburb, tried to describe it afterwards, and said it "was like a wonderfully bright and delicate human voice talking or laughingly saying something rather than singing." Other of the minor minstrels Mr. Hudson finds more pleasing in their notes than the great singers, because of their "more human-like tones." However this may be—and I quote his words because, of all living writers, he speaks with a knowledge and affection which come of intimate acqaintance with their life and doings—to me the joy they give us seems a part of some close and tender fellowship between their life and ours. Something in them must be in sympathy with something in us. We do not merely admire them; we love them; and they waken thoughts and feelings in us that prove our kinship with them, deep and real. The Power that placed us here speaks to us through them, and the pleasure we have in their soaring flight or joyous song or grace of form, is one of the purest and most innocent and most healthful human sensations which nature can inspire.

But their deepest and divinest ministry to us, perhaps, is in that hopeful, trustful spirit which so many have found awakened in them when watching the birds or listening to their voice or musing on their ways. I am not sure whether Hope or Trust is the best word for that inspiring sense of cheer which they have so often given to me. Their life is a very eager, busy, exuberant life. They sing often as if their souls were full to overflowing with some wild and sweet excitement. They fly about in the air above us or from tree to tree, as if motion itself were the supreme luxury of existence. And in nesting-time and when caring for their young, they are as energetic as a modern man of business, or a child in the full excitement of a favourite game. But there seems no anxiety, no restless, carping care, about it all. They have found that happy secret—known to so few of us—of work without worry, of activity without fretfulness and vain distrust. I am afraid it is very unscientific to talk thus. The birds haven't "found" anything; they simply obey the impulse of instinct, and are neither anxious nor unanxious, fearful or fearless. These human words are meaningless as applied to them. Be it so, yet the impressions one receives are real.

Something of childhood's trust and hope comes back to me when I watch the birds or hear them sing or think upon their ways. I cannot tell why it should be thus, more than when observing other creatures, doubtless as wise as they; but so it is. They bid me rest and rejoice in the good that now is, in the work that's to be done to-day, and yet hope or dream of some unknown good that is yet to be. When I had heard my thrush sing so well in winter days, and then had listened to his wild shout of happiness at the first sure promise of spring, I took down a volume of George Meredith's poems, and read again his fine lyric, entitled "The Thrush in February." And there was this one verse that said in four lines all, or nearly all, that I had felt—

He sings me, out of winter's throat,
The young time with the life ahead;
And my young time his leaping note
Recalls to spirit-mirth from dead.

"Nature's eternal message to the heart of man" is told us in many ways; and the birds are among its best interpreters. Through them the Unseen Wisdom speaks, bidding us be ever young in Trust and in Hope—strangers to worry and to fear. "Ask of the birds and they shall tell thee," that though they are surrounded with dangers, and have numberless foes, though their life is short and their strength is small, yet, if their ways are wonderful and their songs are sweet and their presence bright and beautiful to us, it is because they innocently trust the Power that gives them life to-day, and harbour no fears of what to-morrow may bring.

LITERATURE.

ADMIRERS of Lowell, who read his letters published in 1894, will gladly welcome the excellent biography by his friend Mr. H. E. Scudder which has recently appeared. In American reviews it has been recognised as a substantial and enduring memorial of one of the foremost representatives of the literature of the nation. The Life will appeal also to the English public to whom Lowell is so well known by his writings, and specially to the large circle to whom he became personally dear during his residence here as American Minister, and in his frequent subsequent visits to this country. And not only for his own sake will this Life be studied; but also because it admits the reader into companionship with the group of literary men with whom he was in close intercourse, men who, with himself, have made a little corner of Massachusetts into a shrine dear to all cultured pilgrims to the United States.

In the two volumes, containing some 900 pages, interest never flags, so skilfully and sympathetically does the biographer unfold the story of the many-sided character of his friend, who was at once poet, moral enthusiast, critic, politician, reformer and humorist; yet, with all his broad interests, so tender and true in the daily details of home affections and friendships. In the opening pages we read of the environments of Lowell's boyhood; of the old country home, Elmwood, near Cambridge; of his conservative father; of his mother, with occult tendencies handed down from her Orkney forbears; and we picture the little lad drinking in his first love of Nature as he gazed day after day on the river Charles, winding through the sunny meadows, and his first love of poetry from Spenser's "Faery Queene" with which his young sister fed his opening mind.

At school, and at Harvard University, as boy and youth, his imaginative powers developed fast. He was a sort of Scheherazade to his appreciative companions; and, turning aside too readily from set tasks, he fell to "delightful browsing" in fields of literature to which his instincts led him. "A college training is an excellent thing," said Lowell, in after years, "but, after all, the better part of every man's education is that which he gives himself." Yet the authorities at Harvard were of a different opinion, and, owing to his neglect of college regulations, the future poet was "suspended" for a time, during the absence of his parents in Europe, and underwent rustication at Concord with a tutor.

Here Emerson comes upon the scene with his wonderful influence, and young Lowell records, "he showed me how man makes himself eternal." From this time begins the new development, the "stirring of the soul within" to hatred of evil and to a strong purpose in life.

It is difficult to condense within needful limits the rich abundance of details with which this deeply interesting biography abounds. Lowell falls in love and marries in course of time. Under this new influence his power of poetic expression grows and, with it, his moral enthusiasm, His first volume of poems which appeared in the year 1841, entitled "A Year's Life," was the outcome of this new affection which was so influential in the development of his character. In Chapter iv. we find ourselves "In the Anti-slavery Ranks," and read how Lowell cast in his lot with the men and women who were leading a forlorn hope. He declined to cultivate the popularity which awaited his acceptance, and resolved to serve the unpopular cause as a poet, thus cutting himself off from profitable literary openings. "My heart leaps up before me into the conflict," he cried, and when urged to suppress an anti-slavery song in the volume of poems he was about to issue, replied: "Let all others be suppressed, that will I never suppress."

It was during this period of strain and stress that Lowell's power of satire developed. Never did censor more boldly condemn expediency, and the cowardly reluctance of politicians to support the highest moral standard.

Yet even in his most caustic expressions there is a genial ring. Comparing Lowell with the English satirist Swift, his friend Mr. Thomas Hughes remarked: "Lowell wielded an equally keen rapier, but it is the rapier of good humour." In 1846 the first number of the "Biglow Papers" appeared anonymously in the Boston Courier. It is easy to understand the half jealousy with which he watched the popularity of these humorous poems. As his biographer tells us, "he felt it was unfair to the other half of him;" and the poet in him almost apologises when he says, "If I put on the cap and bells and made myself one of the court fools of King Demos, it was less to make His Majesty laugh than to win a passage to royal ears for certain serious things which I had deeply at heart." Lowell was by nature a man of letters and a lover of beauty, and the sphere of politics and party strife gave no opening for the expression of his best thoughts in either verse or prose. But the passion for truth and freedom was strong within him, and he must give his message in the form in which it would best strike home to the minds of his fellow-countrymen.

Owing to the many-sided character of its subject this biography is full of variety. The reader turns quickly from Lowell the satirist and reformer, to Lowell the poet of delicate sentiment and deep feeling in his home and among his friends; to the simple life at Elmwood, with its nobly chosen poverty lightened by his constant tenderness and gleams of humour. He described his own nature truly when he wrote—

> To me Fate gave, whate'er she else denied,
> A nature sloping to the sunnier side.

Yet sorrow was no stranger to his home. Lowell wrote his well-known poem "The Changeling" when the first break in his family occurred and "troops of wandering angels stole his little daughter away."

Another side of his character comes out in the record of his first visit to Italy, when he gave full vent to his love of art and his reverence for the memories of the past. This visit was shortly afterwards followed by the death of his wife. Professor Stillman tells us how out of the "deep shadows of his wrecked life" he roused himself to show kindly sympathy with the grief of other men, and at last "fresh enthusiasms began to knock at his garret door." Longfellow and Stillman were his chief intimates in that time of trouble. In 1855, as successor of the former, he was elected Professor of Belles Lettres at Harvard, and went abroad to devote himself to a long period of study in preparation for the post.

It is interesting to read of Lowell's influence over his students; how he stirred and quickened their thoughts, giving them of his best, and inspiring them with his own love of literature. His counsel to them is recorded—to read the best books, and to do so not for the sake of attaining scholarship, but for the love of great thoughts and of elevating companionship which "will make men scholars before they are aware." In due course we come to the account, probably familiar to most readers, of the delightful summer sojourn in the Adirondack wilderness, where Emerson, Stillman, Agassiz, and other literary men met to "frolic in the forest," and where Lowell, bringing forth treasures of wit and imagination, was the soul of the company. It was about this time that new hopes of a happy home-life arose with his engagement to Miss Frances Dunlop, an intimate friend of his late wife, who, during his long absence in Europe, had been caring for his only remaining little daughter since her mother's death.

During his editorship of the Atlantic Monthly, and afterwards of the North American Review, Lowell's critical faculty underwent the highest cultivation. In his political writings for these papers he shows the deep feeling with which he witnessed the subserviency of the Government to the increasing demands of the Slave power, and his contempt for the political degeneracy of the times. He preaches the need for national integrity, and points with scorn to the treason against the ballot-box "as dangerous as treason against a throne." At times an expression of some high ideal breaks forth, or a poem for some special occasion, written at a white heat; but he found his college and editorial work combined dulled his imaginative powers, and he says, "I long to give myself up to poetry before I am so old that I have only thought and no music left. I cannot say as Milton did, 'I am growing my wings.'" Amid constantly changing experiences the rich inner life develops, however; and the reader cannot doubt that, unnoticed by himself in the press of duty and amid the uncongenial tasks of political life, the poet's wings were growing.

Another visit to Europe and a season of study of old French and English poetry and mediæval literature, as preparation for college work, made breaks in his life as a political writer and worker. A rare intuitive perception seemed to guide him in his treatment alike of literature, affairs, and men. It is noteworthy, too, that his sympathy for commonplace, ordinary life grew deeper with the flight of years; and it was very sincerely that he wrote, when a popular edition of his poems came out in 1876, "I would rather be a fireside friend and the Galeotto of household love than anything else."

Not the least interesting part of his life are the years spent in diplomatic service. Passing over his experiences as Ambassador to Madrid we come to the story of his life in London as American Minister, a post for which his quick perception and tact, which had been called forth by practice in literary criticism, and his experience in the diagnosis of political conditions and opinions in the United States, admirably fitted him. It was a difficult matter during the time of the disturbances in Ireland, when the arrest of American citizens was of frequent occurrence, to keep up the entente cordiale between England and the United States; but we are told that by his perfect sincerity and delicate tact he accomplished the feat. One can well believe that, during this responsible life, the editor of the Atlantic Monthly might appeal to him often in vain for literary contributions to his paper. "I am piecemealed here," he once wrote in reply to such a request, "with so many things to do that I can't get a moment to brood over anything as it must be brooded over if it is to have wings. It is as if a sitting hen should have to mind the doorbell." Yet the poet's inner life found expression again and again, and he gained refreshment in writing poems during his short intervals for rest.

Thoroughness, we are told, was a marked characteristic of Lowell's work, whether in his professorship, in his political life, or in the field of literature; yet how prolific a writer he was may be learned from the long list of his works with which the appendix to his biography furnishes us. He differed from many literary men in that he was no recluse, but used his culture, his varied mental powers, and practical sagacity for the help of the world by throwing himself into the public movements of the times he lived in. Probably his poems are better known in England than his prose works, yet his studies of great men are specially characteristic alike of his fair criticism and his generous judgment, while some of his addresses, notably the address on American literature, testify to the position he held in the world of letters in the United States.

In 1885 the return of the Democrats to power in the United States brought to a close his official residence in England. While still uncertain as to his future movements, his wife died; and, in this new sorrow, he declined to be nominated for the Professorship of English Language and Literature at Oxford, and sailed for America. But to the satisfaction of a large circle of friends he revisited England three or four times.

Our last picture of Lowell is in the old family house, Elmwood, where he made his home with his married daughter. In 1891 he had a severe illness, after which he had to give up his professorship at Harvard, and with it occupations that were the great interests of his life; for the seizure had left keen suffering behind it, destined to prove fatal in a few months. Yet to the last he was forming cheerful plans for future work, writing delightful letters, rejoicing in his little grandchildren, and watching with great enjoyment from his window the gambols of his favourite grey squirrels in the tree-tops.

"The kind of world one carries about in oneself is the important thing, and the world outside takes all its grace and colour from that." Thus Lowell had once written; and now, in old age, notwithstanding constant pain and loss of power, he was in his own experience proving the truth of his words. He still found the outside world beautiful, for within he was "true to the dreams of his youth," and looked onward in faith to the realisation of ideals he had always cherished. On a summer day in 1891 "the spirit climbed and had its eyes unsealed."

In his later years both America and England gave honours to Lowell. Among other testimonies he received were the titles conferred on him by the Universities of Oxford, Edinburgh, and Harvard; but it was genuine feeling that led him to say, "I should best like to be remembered by kindly acts and helpful deeds."

BIBLE STUDY.*

It is a standing taunt against the Higher Critics of those who repudiate their conclusions that the challenge to defend themselves is never taken up; and it is sought to establish an inference that judgment must be entered against them by default. But there is a good old rule that when people "oppose themselves and blaspheme" the teacher shall pass on to address himself to those of another temper; to those who at least are willing to examine a question on its merits, and, when the question is whether a certain Image did or did not fall down from Jupiter, to weigh the evidence before promulgating a conclusion.

The minutely laborious road of criticism cannot be escaped by any royal short-cut of à priori methods. Nor are the postulates of criticism in any way invalidated by the demonstration of errors in detail. If venerable names have become associated with gravely erroneous views, the error of the views must be recognised, but not to the distortion or negation of the facts they failed to interpret. Samson, for instance, may not be a Sun-myth; it does not follow that the traditional view of the historicity of the story of Samson is correct. In black and white this looks so laughably obvious as scarcely to call for express statement. Nevertheless it is just these seemingly "obvious" fallacies which are the points of departure of much argument which for its very wordiness suffices to impose upon persons not given to probe down to premises. The on-rushing stream of progress cannot but leave its backwaters; and it is not for those who sail on the former to waste time in arguments with those who prefer to gyrate on the latter. But forasmuch as there are many who have merely mistaken the backwater for the stream, it is the part of all who pass them at least to give a friendly "hail," which will indicate the existence of a different course to any who may have the heart to exploit its possibilities. Not that we wish to encourage a tendency to mere criticism: far less with any "shadowed hint confuse a life that leads melodious days." But where the critical attitude obtains, and critical criteria—the criteria indispensable to any criticism worthy of the name—are lacking, we should be able and ready to furnish inquirers with something better than vague generalities. If a man loses his belief in God, because he has lost belief in Moses or John, what has been destroyed is really no more than a subtle idolatry that had made to itself a God under the forms of a definite intellectual presentment; the possibility of a real religious belief in God remains where it ever was and where it only ever can be, in the ultimate necessity of the human soul. Euclid did not create the geometrical principles which his volumes are still adequate to demonstrate. Nor can we admit that spiritual truths are less "necessary" in the order of the universe than those of mathematics. Our apprehension of them is indeed less "exact"; it may not be, on the whole, "scientific" at all. But we live by them, apprehended or not; and whatever the Bible does towards their demonstration, is unaffected by attempts to show what the Bible does not do.

We have not left space to say anything in detail of the Book this article is intended to introduce; but the introduction will be none the less adequate if it serves to emphasise the necessity of acquiring facts before entering upon discussion of theories about such facts; and to reassure those who, equally afraid to believe and to doubt, pass ineffective lives in the unstable ways of the double-minded. Doubt is the first condition of belief. When you have followed every doubt to its utmost consequence you have discovered the "things which are not shaken" and "remain."

This volume is an excellent summary of the results of all the work hitherto done towards the elucidation of the literary composition of the Old and New Testaments.

It is a striking monument upon the confines of a century that saw the question as to whether a hare chews the cud a criterion of orthodoxy between Authority and Colenso.

You may buy this book, reflect it in your examination papers, get ordained, and preach it now-a-days. It is quite consistent with the Thirty-nine Articles. It has come to be so recognised by the happy method of eliminating objectors. Only the fittest survive. Hence there is general complaint of a dearth of curates.

Let us, at all events, keep a reverent memory alive of such men as Colenso was, and willingly "go forth unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach."

"THE WHITSUNTIDE MEETINGS."

Sir,—On behalf of the Committee charged with the arrangements for the Whitsuntide Meetings, I am desired to say that they will be glad to assist visitors, as they did last year, by keeping a register of hotels and lodgings, and the rates that are charged. Those who wish for assistance in this way are requested to communicate with the Secretary of the Hospitality Committee, Essex Hall, stating what accommodation they require and at what cost. There is every prospect of a most interesting series of meetings, and it is hoped there will be a large attendance of friends from different parts of the country.

OBITUARY.

MR. THOMAS DORNAN.

The Oldham congregation has sustained a serious loss by the death of this esteemed and faithful member on the 17th inst. in the seventy-sixth year of his age. Descended from a staunch old Yeomanry family, long settled on their own extensive farm in Westmorland, he commenced business at an early age in Oldham, and brought into commercial affairs the high sense of honour and integrity which marked that fine ancestral type. Indeed, if ever a commendation of sincerity and fidelity could be given unhesitatingly of any man, it could be said that these qualities dominated his life in all its relations. He had the good fortune to become the son-in-law of Mr. Jonathan Taylor, the veteran upholder of Lord-street Chapel, and bore with him the brunt of an unpopular cause through weary years, when almost all the congregation was of one family as well as one faith. And when better times came he continued to do invaluable though unobtrusive service till his health and strength failed.

For nearly half a century the home of our deceased friend has been gratefully associated far and near with hospitality to the brethren, and there will be many an interchange of sympathy between his widow and family and those they have kindly entertained in bygone days. During the last few years Mr. Dornan had suffered from a painful internal malady, but even under the most sorrowful conditions his resignation and courage never faltered, and the religious faith that had been so long habitual to him became more real and deep and sustaining. And when the end came it it was the calm close of a career that had been free from all sordidness of spirit, marked by moral elevation and usefulness in manifold spheres.

The service in the house and at the grave was conducted by the Rev. J. A. Pearson, minister of Lord-street Chapel, and the Rev. Andrew Chalmers, of Wakefield, the latter a friend of the family ever since his first pastorate in Oldham nearly thirty years ago. The assemblage at the funeral was large and representative, and all seemed under the shadow of a great loss, and all of one mind that their departed friend had left a noble example and a record of earnest and consistent service in every good word and work.

Longing is God's fresh heavenward will
With our poor earthware striving;
We quench it that we may be still
Content with merely living;
But would we learn that heart's full scope
Which we are hourly wronging,
Our lives must climb from hope to hope
And realise our longing.—J. R. Lowell.

I do not believe the world is dying for new ideas. A teacher has a high place amongst us, but someone is wanted, here and abroad, more than a teacher. It is power we need, power to help us to solve our practical problems, power that shall help us to realise a high individual spiritual life, power that shall make us daring enough to act out all we have seen in vision, all we have learnt in principle from Jesus Christ.—*C. THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Good Friday and Easter Day.

Capri is a small island near Naples, in Italy. Every year, at Easter time, a curious and rather beautiful festival takes place there, which, I think, you will like to hear about.

I daresay you have heard much lately of Lent, and of keeping Lent. It comes from an old Saxon word leneten, which simply means to lengthen, and the season we are now living in—that is from Ash Wednesday to Easter Day—was first called Lent because it is the season when the days begin to lengthen. It is about the same as Spring—the time when things begin to spring. As the Bible says:—"The winter is past . . . . and the time of the singing of birds is come."

But since Jesus lived and died on earth, this season has gained a further meaning. As you remember, just before he began his ministry, he spent forty days alone in the wild hill country, preparing for that great life-work which God sent him to do. This period in his life the Christian Church has agreed to think of as taking place in the leneten or lengthening season of the year. Then, you know, on Good Friday we remember his death; and on Easter Day we remember that only his body died, and that his soul—that is himself—rose above death into the higher and lovelier life of heaven.

Well, people think of this Lent and Good Friday and Easter Day in different ways, and have varied customs. You could tell some Easter customs, I am sure, which belong, perhaps, to your own part of the country, in which eggs, or flowers, or plays, or dancing, or singing, or dressing-up come in. Palm Sunday and "Mothering Sunday" some could tell about. But they all somehow hint at the joy and meaning of springing, rising, rejoicing life in Nature and in Man.

So, you see, from Ash Wednesday until Good Friday is over the time is called Lent. In Nature it is the time when the days are gradually lengthening out into Spring, and, in our thought of Jesus, it is the time during which he suffered and died. Then, on Easter Day, Spring has really come, and also Jesus has risen above death into heaven.

Now, the people of Capri have both these reasons for keeping Easter. When Spring comes they rejoice; and, just as we at Christmas-time decorate our homes and schools and churches with evergreens, and decorate the evergreens with all sorts of bright things, so the people of Capri in Spring-time cut some nice boughs from the olive trees, and decorate them with anything that looks pretty or tastes good—bright ribbons, pretty sweets, delicious biscuits. They carry these boughs to church with them, to show their thankfulness to the Great Giver for the fruits which summer and harvest will bring.

But they take birds to church as well. And why? For two reasons. The first reason is this:—Pirates and other wicked men in olden days used to carry off the Christian children and people of Capri into slavery. Their sufferings were terrible. By and by some good men began the work of wandering in search of these slaves and releasing them from their cruel masters. Such slaves, when found and redeemed, were kept in comfort until Easter Eve, when they were taken to the church and set free.

That old bad time is past even in Capri, but the people of Capri wanted somehow to remember their being set free, and so every year, some weeks before Easter, they catch a lot of birds in their gardens or fields. No, they don't hurt them; not a bit. They catch them to be very kind to them. They feed them well, and birds and children in a house grow very friendly indeed.

Easter Eve comes at last. All go to church—men and women, boys and girls; some with gaily decorated olive boughs, some with birds held by a ribbon to the wrist, and some with a bough in one hand a bird in the other.

What a church full of gay boughs, lively birds, and eager folks—old and young! What is going to happen? Look toward the Communion-table or high altar, as it is called. You cannot see it. All through this Good Friday week a great thick curtain has hidden that end of the church from sight. But now, on this Easter Eve, all in the church are gazing in that direction.

Hark! The clock strikes twelve! The organ peals forth, the curtain drops and discloses a figure which is meant to represent Jesus, no longer the crucified sufferer, but risen above death into heavenly life. Now, all ribbons or strings which hold the birds are let go, and one, two, three, twenty, fifty, a hundred happy creatures are fluttering and flying above the heads of the people. At first some of them beat their wings against the walls, but all doors and windows have been purposely opened, and before many minutes every bird is free as air and sky!

Thus do the good folks of Capri keep in memory the setting free of slaves in bygone years on Easter Eve, and, perhaps, this setting free of the birds has also come to have another and even more beautiful meaning to them. What do you think it is?

Whene'er a noble deed is wrought,
Whene'er is spoken a noble thought,
Our hearts in glad surprise
To higher levels rise.

The tidal wave of deeper souls
Into our inmost being rolls,
And lifts us unawares
Out of all meaner cares.

Honour to those whose words or deeds
Thus help us in our daily needs,
And by their overflow
Raise us from what is low!

H. W. Longfellow.

Life is joy, and love is power,
Death all fetters doth unbind;
Strength and wisdom only flower
When we toil for all our kind.
Hope is truth;—the Future giveth
More than Present takes away,
And the soul for ever liveth
Nearer God from day to day.

EASTER ONCE MORE.

ON the eve once more of the Easter festival we have been looking back with some wistfulness over the past four years, to see how with each recurrence of this great season of the Christian year the lessons of its faith and joy found expression in these columns. Old words often come back with fresh meaning, and this year, instead of any fresh pleading for that faith which is stronger than death, we will recall some words from those former years. The first passage is from an article written the week before the festival, the others belong to the actual Easter days.

There are this year special reasons why we should be mindful of the deeper meaning of the Easter festival. As a nation we need the awakening and cleansing power of the Master's spirit, we need the strength of that Righteousness, which is the power of the living GOD, in which he lived and died, and for ever lives. We ought not, perhaps, to say that we need it more than ever before, but there are circumstances in our national life to-day which ought to make us realise with fresh earnestness the need, and which should call us to something more than a light-hearted holiday.

It ought not to be a matter merely of excited interest that our troops are now fighting on the borders of the Soudan, and men are being slaughtered in savage conflict. Whether this war was just and inevitable or not we do not now express an opinion ; but it should make us ask, as we follow the fortunes of our troops, whether it is nothing but the glory of victory that fires our blood, or whether we ourselves should be ready to suffer, and, if need be, to die in such a cause, believing that we served the truest interests of justice and humanity.

But there are other rumours of war, and the vehement conflict of interests in Africa and in the Far East. We do not know what these coming days may bring, but we do know that there is a higher motive than the passionate grasping at any cost at power and commercial profit, and our prayer must be that the true honour of England may be preserved. There is a self-sacrifice to which even a nation may consent, and of this some understanding might come to our people even now in quiet vigils with sacred memories of the PRINCE of PEACE.

The joy of the Easter morning is a universal truth of GOD, if only with JESUS all men would learn the full meaning of their manhood. GOD is the Fountain of all beauty, but more intimately to us the Father of living souls. The shadow falls, and those who are most dear to us are taken from our sight. But then in the silence, with wonderful revealing and strong consolation, comes the witness of the Spirit, "Not dead, but living unto Him." We do not ask for signs and wonders, we learn only to be still and know that He is GOD. We say "Our Father"—and we know the meaning of this life of spiritual manhood, which death cannot touch.

The real shadows of life remain, the bitterness of failure and sin, of unworthiness and cowardice, but from all these our refuge is in the Father's infinite compassion. It is life to which He has called us, and not death, and in life with Him there must at last be victory over sin. And in Him also those darker riddles of human fate in this world, which are so terrible to sensitive hearts, must be solved. There is no way of deliverance, but in utter surrender to Him who is Eternal Goodness, in undaunted courage that is given in faithful service, and in the patience of hope. And, meanwhile, we are not deprived of the joy, which is of heaven—the joy which each awakening spring-time brings, and that deeper joy of the hidden life, of which Easter is the emblem and the beautiful recurring festival.

1900.

These words are written on the eve of Easter amid signs of the returning Spring. We are thankful to be able to include in our present number Mr. STOPFORD BROOKE's beautiful memorial address, in which we value especially those words concerning the wonderful completeness of Dr. MARTINEAU's life, and the manner in which out of the stress of intellectual and moral warfare, he came "more and more to abide in the world of the Spirit, closer and closer to the everlasting peace and love, so that his life reached fulness of being." That is what remains with us as a benediction on our life, in undying fellowship of spirit, that we may be of a good courage, and with reverent thankfulness go forward upon our way.

1901.

In our FATHER's house are "many mansions," but our rest is in Him, with that greater fellowship of the seen and the unseen, in which the most glorious have their place, in which JESUS is the first-born of many brethren, and everyone is there to whom we have owed most—all who have brought us any quickening of fuller knowledge, nobler loyalty or more perfect love. They are not memories of the past, they are of the household, and, as we rest in the living GOD, are with us here, filling our life with a new richness, making us understand better the unspeakable riches of the love of GOD.

This festival of Easter is therefore for the humble and despised of the earth, even more than for the great churches with their gorgeous ritual and throngs of worshippers. It is a greater gift for the lonely heretic than for any other. To him is given an unspeakable delight in the lovely ritual of the reawakened earth, so pure and beautiful that he desires no other. His heart is lifted up in worship in that greatest of all visible temples, in which the benediction is for all alike. He is at one with humanity, because he feels the thrill of life out of which humanity is born. And amid the glory of the spring-time of the year, coming in its abundance out of the fulness of the Creator's joy which cannot fail, his thought rises to a purer height, in which it is life of the spirit that he contemplates, and in which he is anew dedicated to the holiest service. Unseen of men there are those who come to him on the Mount of Transfiguration, who talk with him perchance of what he must suffer, yet of the glory of the conflict, of what he must accomplish in brave witness to truth, in passionate loyalty to right, and in the surrender of perfect love. For to him also is given, in the Master's spirit, to love even those who hate, to give himself utterly for his brethren's sake. His prayer that the FATHER's will may be done brings into his heart the divine peace. He is not alone, but is compassed about by the heavenly witnesses, and is sustained by the supreme Strength and Love.

There are none, even in the humblest places of service, even the most solitary and despised, to whom these greatest of gifts are not offered, to whom the supreme joy is not open, in life which is beyond the power of death.

God keeps His holy mysteries
Just on the outside of man's dream,
Yet touching: so they draw above
Our common thoughts to heaven's unknown:
Our daily joy and pain advance
To a divine significance:
Our human love—O mortal love!
That light is not its own!

E. B. BROWNING.

WILLIAM RATHBONE.

Memoir.

THE long life of William Rathbone, the sixth in a remarkable succession of the bearers of that name, appears to us as the rich fruition of a great inheritance of noble character. His father and grandfather were distinguished citizens of Liverpool, and the earlier William Rathbones men of no less sterling worth, though with less opportunity of public service. He himself in the great field of politics had the widest sphere of them all, and, as the Times said, "in a quiet and unassuming way has left his mark on the practical philanthropy of the Victorian Era." His work for education, and, above all, for the nursing of the sick poor, grew to have a national significance, but it all sprang from the same humble faithfulness and simplicity of purpose in the love of doing good, which had long been the tradition in his family, and which in himself remained steadfast to the end. There was something very touching in the old man's loyalty to the one office which he could not relinquish when all others were laid aside, that of Guardian of the Poor.

Earlier Members of the Family.

The Rathbones came originally from Gawsworth, near Macclesfield, and while still in the old home the earliest William Rathbones were engaged in business as sawyers in Liverpool, so that the connection goes back to some two hundred years ago. In 1746 the second and third of the name established the firm of William Rathbone and Son in Liverpool, as timber merchants, ship-owners, and ship-builders, on a scale of course very different from that of the great undertakings of later times. The grandfather of our William Rathbone sold the first cotton grown in America which was brought to this country, and was one of the consignees of the first line of packets which crossed the Atlantic. Yet more worthy of note is the fact that he was one of the first of those who refused to have any share in the profits of the slave trade, by which so many Liverpool merchants were enriched.

The earlier Rathbones belonged to the Society of Friends. The third of the name, who died in 1789, was remembered as a Quaker preacher, and was thus described long afterwards by Dr. Rutter:—

> He was one of the most remarkable men I have ever known, remarkable for his calm and unaffected piety, for the mildness and placidity of his disposition, for the kindness and consideration which he ever showed to the wants or weaknesses or feelings of others, and for the uncommon firmness and dignity of his conduct on every occasion. . . . He was not a man of brilliant talents, nor was he at any time distinguished by his eloquence in the gallery [of the Meeting House, where ministers sat]. But all he said and did was directed by a judgment singularly sound and by intentions singularly upright.

His son William (1757-1809) was the friend of Roscoe, and one of the leaders of the Anti-Slave Trade party in Liverpool, a man of remarkable eloquence and undaunted courage. He was also something of a heretic, and in 1805 was disowned on that account by the Hardshaw (St. Helens) monthly meeting. Some years earlier he had become a subscriber to the London Unitarian Book Society, and though he did not join any other religious connection he attended occasionally at Benn's-garden Chapel, of which Renshaw-street and the Ullet-road Church are the successors, and of which Roscoe was a member. His wife was Hannah, daughter of Richard Reynolds, the well known philanthropist of Bristol.

His Parentage.

His son William (1787-1868) was also disowned by the Society of Friends when, in 1812, he married a Unitarian—Elizabeth, daughter of Samuel Greg, of Quarry Bank, and sister of Robert Hyde Greg, the friend of John James Tayler. He was afterwards reinstated, but finally withdrew in 1829, when his eldest son was ten years old, being at that time a member of the Renshaw-street congregation. Thus the Quaker and Unitarian traditions were blended in William Rathbone in happy union, as we hold, for the fullest nurture of the Christian life. He inherited also the finest traditions of good citizenship, for his father was a leader in all that was best in the higher life of Liverpool. His mother also, who survived her husband and lived to a great age, was deeply interested in all efforts for social amelioration and the advancement of education, and exercised a very beautiful and far-reaching influence. At the time of the passing of the Education Act, in 1870, Mr. Forster told her son that the most valuable of the suggestions which he received while the Bill was under discussion came from her.

Mr. Rathbone's grandfather died at the early age of fifty-one, "worn out by his devotion to the public good"; but he and his father both lived to be over eighty, and there is a striking similarity in their record, except that the father had to fight in harder and more troubled days in the conflict for Reform. He stood by Wilberforce in the cause of freedom for the slave, and fought for purity of election in a borough notoriously corrupt. He was the fearless leader of the Liberals in the stirring days of the Anti-Corn Law and Reform agitations, and in the struggle for the removal of Nonconformist and Roman Catholic disabilities. He was known as the "Educationist," and was foremost in every movement for the elevation of the people. In 1837 he was chosen the first Mayor of Liverpool, after the passing of the Municipal Corporations Act.

At his death, in 1868, the Rev. Charles Beard, then recently come to Renshaw-street Chapel, preached a memorial sermon, which concluded with these words:—

> I dare not lament one who has so lived, and to whom God has given so fair a death. And I count those happy whose right it is to drop the tears of natural affection upon his grave, and to follow in the footsteps of his achievement.

There were other words also in the sermon, which might now, with equal fitness, be repeated of his son:—

> There may be more famous names in the annals of Liverpool than the name of William Rathbone, but none more honoured, none more beloved. No man fought a more gallant and a more uncompromising fight for his political principles, no man adhered with a more steadfast consistency to his religious convictions, yet friends of every party and of every church crowded round his coffin, and bent over his grave with the sadness of a common regret. Was it not from their belief that his love of truth, his devotion to right, transcended the limits of any party policy, and that the width of his sympathies was bounded only by the invisible Church of God. . . . Every good cause which during the last sixty years has struggled to victory owes a debt to him. Few men have so completely and so happily lived the common life of their country; not for the rewards and distinctions of public life, for he never desired them, but because his heart was in the common weal, and whatever affected the welfare of mankind touched him in the tenderest part. Yet he never stooped to the meaner artifices—the disingenuous compromises of politics. He could accept defeat cheerfully, but never a dishonourable victory; and his influence lay not more in his intellectual force than in the general conviction of his absolute rectitude.

Of such parentage was the William Rathbone to whom this memoir is devoted.

Early Training

He was born Feb. 11, 1819, at a house in Cornhill, Liverpool, which is now [illegible] site of the Albert Dock warehouses, but where at that time his father lived, like other merchants and shipowners, close to the shipping and their warehouses. It was some years later that the family moved out to Greenbank, the beautiful home now so rich in memories, where Father Mathew and many another philanthropist and champion of an unpopular cause found a warm welcome, and where Blanco White breathed his last—the home so happily described by Dr. Martineau when he called it "that house of refuge for all the saints." Of the schools the boy attended, one was that of the Rev. John Brunner, father of Sir John T. Brunner, Bart.; and his last school, before going to business, was at St. Domingo House, Everton, under the care of Mr. Charles Voelker, a pupil of Pestalozzi, where among his schoolfellows were the late Sir James Stansfeld and Sir Percival Heywood. At seventeen he was apprenticed for three years in an East India merchants' office, and at the conclusion of his term, with his old schoolfellow and life-long friend, Thomas Ashton, spent some months at Heidelberg, a university chosen on the advice of the Rev. J. J. Tayler. There he attended the lectures of Schlosser, the professor of history, and Zachariæ on political philosophy, and was influenced particularly by Schlosser's ardent liberalism and lofty character. On his return home, Mr. Rathbone spent a year in the London house of Messrs. Baring Bros., followed by a visit of some months to the United States. Thus his preparation for a business career was made as complete as possible, and in September, 1841, he returned to Liverpool and joined his father's firm, Messrs. Rathbone Bros. and Co., shipowners and merchants, a business connection which he maintained until 1884. In 1847, the year of his marriage to Lucretia, daughter of Mr. S. S. Gair of Liverpool, he also became a partner in the firm of Messrs. Ross T. Smyth and Co., corn merchants, from which he retired only in 1889.

It was at the opening of his business career, in which he quickly made a reputation for skill and good judgment in commercial affairs, and as an authority on matters of trade and finance, as well as on social questions, that Mr. Rathbone made that remarkable resolution, which we quoted a fortnight ago, to guard himself, in case of growing riches, against "pecuniary paralysis." In this he followed in his father's footsteps, and laid the foundations of that generosity and wise beneficence in the use of wealth, which gave him so high a place among the helpers of his fellow-men.

Business and Something More.

Those early years were strenously devoted to business, and with remarkable success, but with no forgetfulness of other aims. To those days we can trace back some of the interests which remained to the end among the chief in Mr. Rathbone's life. It was in 1836, the year in which he left school and entered on his apprenticeship, that the Liverpool Domestic Mission was founded, of which his father was the first president, and the Revs. James Martineau and John Hamilton Thom were among the chief inspirers. Then for ten years the Rev. John Johns was the first Minister to the Poor in Liverpool; and then came the Irish famine and the terrible epidemic of fever in Liverpool, to which the faithful missionary fell a victim. These were formative influences in the young man's life, and during his early years in business he was himself actively engaged in work among the poor, being a visitor for the Provident Society, and the almoner of his parents' abundant charities. Thus his sympathies and his insight into life were deepened, and he learnt by personal experience to appreciate the value of that "Elberfeld" system of Poor Law relief, on which he afterwards laid so much stress, by which voluntary visitors from the well-to-do and educated classes are brought in as the administrators of outdoor relief.

Mr. Rathbone's convictions on the general subject of charity were expressed in a striking little book which he published in 1867, with the title "Social Duties considered with reference to the organisation of effort in works of Benevolence and Public Utility." From the first chapter of this book, on "Social Disintegration" the following passages are taken:—

> This disintegration of society, which grows out of the very completeness of its mechanical organisation—this alienation and mutual ignorance between rich and poor, as classes, arising from the severance of the old personal ties and the termination of the old lasting relations between individuals rich and poor—is at once a reproach to us as a Christian community, a peril to our interests as a free and powerful nation, and an evil of ever-increasing magnitude in its influence on the lives and characters, the moral and physical well-being, of each member of what should be one body politic and religious. The existence side by side of so much useless and needless splendour, so much unmerited and unrelieved destitution, of luxury with squalor, the living picture of Lazarus at the gate of Dives that is ever before our eyes if we but open them—cannot but force upon our conscience the gravest questions as to the individual responsibility of each of us for a portion of the shocking spectacle; the right of each of enjoying his share of the wealth without taking his part in a methodical and sustained effort to relieve the want. Political economy, rightly understood, has no salve for these qualms of conscience. It tells us, indeed, that indiscriminate or thoughtless almsgiving—the easiest form of apparent charity—is, in fact, a vice; but it also leaves open to us a vast field for the expenditure of labour and money, and enforces the duty by showing the mode and the conditions of its safe and beneficial performance.

> There must be nothing of assumed superiority, nothing of patronage in the tone of the rich man if he would give to others or derive himself the full benefit of such intercourse. Patronage is resented by the poor: the spirit which dictates it precludes the rich from reaping the internal benefit of their own charity. The rich man must come to the poor as a friend who has much to gain as well as to give, to learn as well as to teach; as a brother who, having received from God more of this world's good things, does not on that account pretend to claim any superiority over his brother. He must advise, not as a master, but as a friend; he must sympathise, not as a superior, but as an equal in all that forms the ground of sympathy; he must give, not as patron to dependent, but as brother to brother. Coming in such a temper he will find the poor man ready to acknowledge whatever title to respect is personal to himself, to look up to him as a man of education, of character, of refinement. But, if he pride himself upon his wealth, as raising him above the poor, he approaches them in a temper which excludes sympathy, and renders real gratitude very difficult by rendering respect impossible. The poor despise the purse-proud man not one whit less than do the well born and well educated; and, despising, his gifts cannot make them love him. The men who most influence the poor are those who give most of their heart where they give their help; they who receive most reverence from them are those who treat them with most respect for a common and equal humanity.

To his training in the school of private benevolence, and of practical business life, was added from the first the lofty and inspiring influence of his minister at Renshaw street Chapel (eleven years his senior), the Rev. J. H. Thom, who in 1838 became also his brother-in-law. For Mr. Thom, as for Dr. Martineau, Mr. Rathbone entertained throughout life a profound veneration as well as warm personal affection, and if we ask what was the secret of his life, with its lowly Christian grace and its indomitable faith and persistence in well doing, we can hardly be wrong if we find it in that pure spiritual teaching and ardent personal discipleship to Christ, which found such wonderful expression in Mr. Thom's sermons on the "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ."

Politics and Parliament.

Mr. Rathbone's active participation in politics may be dated perhaps from 1852, when he became chairman of the Liverpool Liberal Association, and thoroughly reorganised the party. An instance of his watchfulness over great public interests occurred at the time of the Crimean War, when after the disgraceful breakdown of the commissariat he organised the demonstration which prevented the threatened whitewashing of the culprits. Another great public service he rendered at the time of the Lancashire Cotton Famine, caused by the American Civil War. He and his friend Charles Melly by their prompt action started the Liverpool contribution on an adequate scale, so that it amounted ultimately to £100,000, and Mr. Rathbone served for three years on the executive of the General National Committee, which met weekly in Manchester, administering a fund of £2,735,000. At the end of the distress, £30,000 remained over from the Liverpool contribution, and this was devoted to the building of the Woolton Convalescent Institution, to the interest of which Mr. Rathbone was always warmly devoted.

In 1865 he fought Mr. Gladstone's South-West Lancashire campaign, and in November, 1868, was himself returned as minority member for Liverpool. Then at the General Election of 1880, with rare self-abnegation, he gave up that seat to Lord Ramsay, and was defeated, as he fully expected, in the chivalrous endeavour to win South-West Lancashire again for the Liberals; but in November of the same year he was elected member for Carnarvonshire, and again in 1885 for the northern division of the county, and retained that seat until his final retirement from Parliament in 1895. No man was more thoroughly respected on both sides of the House, and in his own characteristic way Mr. Rathbone did a large amount of valuable work. Here also his generous devotion of his means to public services, and his wise penetration in selecting the best instruments for carrying out his purposes found abundant scope. The Bankruptcy Bill of 1869 was the first great measure in which he was actively concerned, and, realising the importance of exact legal knowledge to supplement his own mercantile experience, he secured the help of Mr. R. S. Wright (now Mr. Justice Wright) to advise him on the measure, and, subsequently gave Mr. Wright a general retainer as his Parliamentary legal adviser. Thus he made his influence felt, particularly on the subjects of education, licensing, registration of voters, the laws of conspiracy and of labour, but above all on the great question of Local Government. Indeed, Mr. Rathbone regarded it as the most useful act of his public life, that he induced Mr. Wright to undertake a laborious inquiry, which lasted three years, into the complications of Local Government, and to prepare a comprehensive scheme for its reform. Of the memorandum issued in 1877, as the result of this work, which contained not only a masterly summary, but references to all the authorities and sources of information, the Times said that it was "the most important work that had ever appeared on Local Government." Mr. Wright also drafted a Bill, which, although it has never been brought in, has been of great service to successive Governments and to private members when dealing with the subject. To that special work Mr. Rathbone devoted several thousands of pounds, and another of his generous undertakings was the commissioning of Mr. E. L. Fanshawe to visit America to examine the operations of the various Liquor Laws, the result of which was an elaborate report on the subject in regard to fifty-four States and Territories of the United States and Canada. This was published as a volume of 400 pages in 1892.

Mr. Rathbone was a staunch Gladstonian Liberal. In 1881 he moved the amendment to Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's motion condemning the retrocession of the Transvaal; and on the crucial question of Home Rule, after grave consideration he followed Mr. Gladstone. He was one of the chief promoters of the Welsh Intermediate Education Bill of 1889, and from 1891 to 1900 was President of the University College of North Wales, at Bangor. To him that college, and the cause of higher education in the Principality generally, owes an immeasurable debt.

University College, Liverpool.

And this was only a natural sequel to what he had already done for his own native city. Those months of 1880, during which Mr. Rathbone was without a seat in Parliament, he devoted to practically securing the establishment of University College, Liverpool. A town's meeting on the subject had been held in 1878, and the project had been previously warmly advocated, not only by Mr. Rathbone, but by Mr. Thom, by his successor at Renshaw-street, the Rev. Charles Beard, by Sir William Banks, Professor Campbell Brown, Sir Edward Lawrence, Mr. George Holt, and others; but £100,000 was just then being raised for the new bishopric of Liverpool, and the project of the college seemed likely to fail for lack of the necessary funds. Then in 1880 Mr. Rathbone, with his brothers, Messrs. S. G. and P. H. Rathbone, offered £10,000 for the endowment of a first professorship, and the contagion of his generous enthusiasm was so great that in a few months £80,000 had been raised, and the seven professorships needed for the foundation of the college were secured. Many other gifts followed, from Mr. Rathbone himself, and from others kindled by his example and persuasion, notable among them, beside the members of his own family and Mr. George Holt, his friend Sir Henry Tate. Thus when a fresh crisis arose at the creation of the Victoria University, Mr. Rathbone with his brother Mr. S. G. Rathbone, Messrs. Benson and Theodore Rathbone, Mr. George Holt, and Mr. Thom gave £10,000 for further endowment, and Sir Henry Tate gave another £5,000, so that the needed £30,000 was quickly raised, and the college was affiliated with the new University. The feeling of all friends of the college with regard to Mr. Rathbone's benefactions and constant personal interest, was well expressed in the following resolution passed at a special meeting of the Council and Senate after his death.

The Council and Senate of University College, assembled in special meeting, desire to record their sense of the loss sustained by the college in the death of Mr. William Rathbone, one of its vice-presidents, and for more than twenty years an active member of its court and council, and one of its most generous benefactors. To his inspiring faith and untiring energy the college largely owes its foundation; to his wise counsel and unwearying labours it owes much of its growth and prosperity. In every department of its work his interest, his sympathy, and his support helped to strengthen and sustain; while his fidelity to truth and his devotion to the public good made his life an example both to the scholar and to the citizen, winning for him the affection and the veneration of all who knew him.

Mr. Rathbone, with the late Mr. Christopher Bushell, was named in the Royal Charter as vice-president of the College. In 1895 he received from Victoria University the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws. Four years earlier he had been admitted, with his friend, Henry Tate, an honorary Freeman of the City of Liverpool.

Nursing Reform.

To this record we have now to add a brief account of what was, perhaps, Mr. Rathbone's greatest work of beneficence, which arose out of the first great sorrow of his life.

We have already noted that in 1847 Mr. Rathbone married the daughter of Mr. S. S. Gair, of Liverpool. Twelve years later she was taken from him, and it was from the experience of the comfort derived from skilled nursing during his wife's last illness, and the sympathetic thought of the contrasted sufferings of the poor, that Mr. Rathbone was led to the endeavour, with him the inevitable outcome of such thought, to provide for the poor what he knew to be of such inexpressible worth. The nurse who had been found so capable in his own home was engaged to devote herself to the care of the sick poor in one of the worst districts of Liverpool, and though after a month's experience, dismayed by the squalor and misery she found, she begged to be released, she was encouraged to persevere, and it was demonstrated what immense help could thus be afforded by simple means, not only in the actual nursing of the sick, but in giving to the poor and uneducated an elementary knowledge of the laws of health and of the good ordering of a home. Having gone so far, Mr. Rathbone felt that more nurses must be engaged, to extend the benefit to other districts; and since there were not enough skilled nurses to be had, he followed the example of Florence Nightingale in her Nurses' Home at St. Thomas's Hospital, and in 1860 founded a Home and Training School in connection with the Royal Infirmary at Liverpool. Thus the infirmary itself was benefited, and there was soon an adequate supply of duly trained nurses for the district work and for private families. Liverpool was divided into eighteen districts, each with a trained nurse and a ladies' committee to superintend the work. In 1864 Manchester took up the work, and four years later the East London Nursing Association was established. The system spread to other parts of the country, and in 1874 the Metropolitan and National Association was founded, of the Council of which Mr. Rathbone was a member.

The greatest impetus was given to this work when, in 1889, our late Queen devoted £70,000 of the Women's Jubilee Gift to the establishment of the Queen Victoria Jubilee Institute for Nurses. Mr. Rathbone acted as honorary secretary of the Provisional Committee, of which the Duke of Westminster was chairman, and his services were warmly acknowledged. In the following year he published a little book, giving a "Sketch of the History and Progress of District Nursing," dedicated by permission to the Queen.

With this great achievement must be remembered what Mr. Rathbone did for the reform of nursing in workhouse infirmaries. What that nursing used to be, when it was entrusted to ignorant and often brutal pauper women, need not be here described; but Mr. Rathbone, knowing what it was, determined that the evil should not continue. In 1864 he made an anonymous offer to the Liverpool Select Vestry to bear for three years the cost of providing skilled nursing for the workhouse infirmary. Thus with the help of Miss Agnes Jones and twelve Nightingale nurses he showed what ought to be done, and made it impossible to revert to the old bad system. Miss Jones unhappily was cut off in the midst of her devoted labours by typhus fever, but not before she had assured the success of that great reform, in which before long the whole country followed Liverpool.

In 1867 Mr. Rathbone sought election as a member of the Select Vestry, and remained, as we have stated, a Guardian of the Poor to the end.

More than can be told.

But here we must draw this most imperfect record to a close, though many of Mr. Rathbone's efforts of wise beneficence have not been so much as named. What he did to enable young men destined for the ministry to gain experience on leaving college by work among the poor has been already referred to in these columns. Another instance of his great kindness was the maintenance of two houses at West Kirby as homes of rest for clergy of the Church of England and Nonconformist ministers. Of Mr. Rathbone's life-long interest in the Liverpool Domestic Mission we have already spoken, but it should be added that in 1886 he took the chair as President at the Jubilee meeting of the Society, of which his father was the first President. In many other ways, as at the founding of the Sustentation Fund at the National Conference meeting in 1882, he showed his deep interest in the churches and the religious community in which he grew up, to the welfare of which he was devoted to the end. To him, as executor of Mr. Thom, his brother-in-law, we owe not only the new edition of the two volumes of the "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ," but other volumes which preserve for fresh generations of readers some of the fruits of that wonderful ministry. Of this we wrote last year, at the time of the unveiling of the statue of Mr. Rathbone in Liverpool, but may once more repeat here: "The ministry of John Hamilton Thom made great demands on those who heard his word. Of how true the response in the heart of William Rathbone we have been for many years the witnesses."

That the people of Liverpool appreciated what Mr. Rathbone had done for them and what he was, was proved on that occasion of the unveiling of the statue by many heartfelt testimonies, as again at the funeral, and on subsequent occasions after the peaceful close of his life on the evening of March 6.

Mr. Rathbone was twice married, and is survived by his second wife, daughter of the late Mr. Acheson Lyle, of The Oaks, Londonderry, whom he married in 1862, and by children of both marriages. The papers stated at the time of Mr. Rathbone's death that a grandson of his, an eighth William Rathbone, had recently settled in Liverpool; but whether that remarkable succession in one line of distinguished citizenship should be continued or not, it is matter for great thankfulness to be assured that Mr. Rathbone himself rested in the conviction that there are many successors to his spirit, to his strenuous devotion to the public good, and that the many forms of good work which he had so much at heart will not be allowed to fail for the lack of generous and willing help.

In this memoir there are many things left unsaid, but it cannot close better than by once more repeating the touching words of Florence Nightingale's tribute: "In remembrance and humble love of one of God's best and greatest sons."

THE EASTER FAITH.

THE recurrence of the great Christian seasons does more than emphasise in their turn the several aspects of the Gospel associated with them. A separate lesson belongs respectively to Christmas, to Good Friday, to Easter Day. But, in addition to its own lesson, each season carries with it a lesson which is common to all; it brings the reminder of an essential characteristic of the Christian religion. The sequence of the seasons of the Christian year is a repeated witness to the historical character of Christianity.

This circumstance provides us with a very necessary safeguard against a tendency which in the interest of practical religion requires constantly to be resisted. This is the tendency to rest in a conception of Christianity which sees in it essentially a body of ideas, of ideas put forward by the reflective mind concerning the nature of God and of the relations between God and man. These ideas are subjective creations, they are conceptions thrown out by enterprising thought, they are judged in respect of their elevation and their beauty, and the minds to whose creative activity they can be traced are accounted to have accomplished great things. Men speak of the idea of God's Fatherhood as a beautiful idea. They look at it in the same way, appraise it by the same rule, as is employed when they come upon some striking imaginative achievement in a great poem or some remarkable synthesis in a great contribution to philosophy. The idea has suggestive efficiency, it has been created by thought and it provokes thought. Christianity is sometimes represented as the sum of the teachings of Christ, and the ideas underlying these teachings are assigned to the creative vigour of the mind of Christ. But where this is the case, where the whole stress is laid upon ideas and upon the achievement of the mind in initiating them, there is involved a defect which is fundamental. No emphasis upon the beauty of the ideas can conceal the fact that they are essentially subjective in their origin, while the testimony to the creative power of the thinker makes this doubly apparent.

Now, of course, it is not disputed that Christianity does present us with a body of ideas. It is not disputed that a union of Christianity with philosophy is legitimate, and, indeed, indispensable. What is maintained, in opposition to the view just described, is that the significance of the ideas does not lie in any quasi-æsthetic value or any witness to the originating powers of human reflection. Their significance lies in their association with facts, in the basis on which they are founded, the basis of historical reality. It may be said, for example, that in so far as there is novelty in Christian thought it is to be found less in the complexion of the ideas, than in their reality; they are largely old ideas, once shadowy and ineffective, but now made alive and actual, no longer the obscure products of tentative reflection, but living and operative certainties of the soul. The novelty is in the facts, in historical events, in the life and presence upon earth of Jesus Christ.

The significance of the feast of Easter is sometimes held t consist in certain ideas which it suggests. It suggests the idea of Renewal, the idea of Resurrection, the idea of Immortality. The value of the season to the devout mind is contained in the contemplation of these fruitful conceptions. It is true that such ideas are suggested by the season, but its value is not to be sought in their beauty or fertility. It is to be sought in its reminder of the historical facts which are the basis of the ideas, which provide their manifestations and establish our confidence in their truth. Harnack has recently drawn a distinction between what he calls the Easter message and the Easter faith. It has been thought by some of his readers* that in so doing he disconnects the Easter faith from any foundation on historical facts. He is thought to have asserted that the Christian belief in immortality is independent of any occurrence in time. This interpretation appears to be questionable. For what does he mean by the Easter message and by the Easter faith? The Easter message he describes as the tradition of the empty grave. On that tradition the faith in the Resurrection cannot rest, it is unstable and always exposed to fresh doubts. It cannot be established as historical. The Easter faith he defines as "the conviction that the crucified one gained a victory over death," "the conviction that Jesus lives." Is this to dissociate it from dependence upon history, to leave it as an idea suspended in a purely speculative region? Scarcely so. The very statement implies an historical connection. It is the conviction that Jesus lives, that the crucified one has triumphed over death. It is thus bound up with an historical person, with Jesus, and with an historical event—his crucifixion. This is not the same thing on the part of the disciples as a mere adherence to the conception of a life after death, a conception with which they were already familiar before they came into contact with Christ; it is not the same thing as a belief that they themselves would live again on the other side of the grave. It is inseparably associated with one person and one definite series of events. The Easter faith is the conviction that Jesus lives.

It may be objected that this is no more than faith in a fact; it is not a faith that necessarily reposes on a fact, such a fact as the empty grave would be if the reports concerning it were above question. But it is no part of the present argument to contend that the ultimate fact on which the Easter faith rests is a conviction in the minds of the disciples; whether we say with Harnack,† "no appearances of the Lord could permanently have convinced them of his life if they had not possessed in their hearts the impression of his Person," or whether we go further, as we well may, and trace the belief in the appearances to an impression exerted upon the disciples' minds by the Lord in his exalted state, still, in both cases the Easter faith is more than a mere subjective creation, in neither is this the ultimate fact. In both the ultimate fact is the impression wrought by an historical person.

The Easter festival, therefore, presents us with realities and appeals to us to seek the basis of our religious ideas in the realities of fact. It raises us from the inclination, too often indulged, to be content with emotional states or speculative reflections. It reminds us that the Christian religion is something more than aspiration, more than desire for communion with God, more than beautiful conceptions respecting the Divine Nature. It warns us that we have not to rest in conjectures as to what may be true, as to what may happen. It presents us with what has happened, with what has been done, with what has been fought for and has been secured. It is the record of a deliverance, not a hope hazarded as to its possibility. It forces upon our notice and brings us face to face with a fact having its own place in a due order of facts. It calls us to turn from all that "wisdom of words" which as early as St. Paul was discovered to make the cross unreal, and to open our ears to the one sufficient declaration, "Because I live, ye shall live also."

ORGANISTS' THEOLOGY.

SIR,—I notice in THE INQUIRER of last week that Mr. Graham considers himself hardly dealt with because his son was not accepted as organist in the Stevenson Memorial Church after his theological opinions became known. The minister says, "The Kirk Session ask me to say that they think it wise in the interest of all concerned—your own interest as well as that of others—that another appointment should be made."

It would perhaps be well to consider what it means for a Unitarian to become organist and choirmaster (the two positions being generally combined) in an alien church, in this case Presbyterian; he would have to play tunes to hymns, Sunday after Sunday, containing doctrines diametrically opposed to his own.

As choirmaster he must also assist in singing the hymns repeatedly, the choir having full knowledge that their instructor believes no word of them. Anyone who has attended Presbyterian worship will remember the authorised hymn-book, and how extremely orthodox it is. The Kirk Session, no doubt, recognised this when it called Mr. Graham's attention to "his own interest" in the matter. I have often observed that this side of the question is overlooked by persons who, not infrequently, make similar complaints in your columns.

GUILDS.

SIR,—In my last letter I explained that I was fully in favour of the general "Guild idea." His reply is three-quarters of it, an unsolicited testimonial on my behalf to the same effect. Some expression of regret on his part at having plunged into print to father upon me an attitude towards Guilds which I had never assumed would have been more fitting. The testimonial was doubtless well meant, but was wholly gratuitous.

I also explained that I had passed no criticism upon actual Guilds. Whereupon, with regard to the "religious type" of Guild to which I had referred, Mr. Wright first states that it does not exist—knowing perfectly well that I never said it did—and then transfers the opinions which I expressed about this "imaginary" type to the actual Guilds, concerning which I avowedly made no criticism. This method opens the way for much fervid rhetoric; but it is beside the mark.

I am sorry to have to trouble you to insert this personal explanation; but it is necessary as an antidote to Mr. Wright's view of my view of Guilds.

JOKAI'S "MANASSEH."

Sir,—The perusal of "Manasseh," by Jokai (recently reviewed by you), has given me extreme pleasure by vividly reviving in my mind scenes and experiences in Transylvania; and I now feel impelled to suggest that every member of the late Hungarian party who has not read this book should do so without delay. Such will find it full of interest.

The hero of the story is Manasseh Adorjan, of Toroczko, a truly noble character. The mountain scenery round about Toroczko is so ably described that the Szekler Stone with its cultivated terraces and the houses embowered in trees seem to stand before us again.

The characteristics of the happy and industrious inhabitants of that delightful bit of Szeklerland are fully set forth, as also are many details of their social and religious life. As one reads, the spacious Unitarian Church is again seen to be full of earnest worshippers clad in their remarkable holiday costumes; and when the service is over, the scenes of innocent gaiety which followed seem to be re-enacted.

Then there is a minute description of the Torda Gap at a time when the river-bed was the only road, and of the great Balyika Cave therein.

Some of the characters in the story make use of this cave as a place of refuge from an invading host in the troublous times of 1849.

Torda itself, Kolozsvar, and other places visited by us, also come in for notice.

Altogether, the tale is one of surpassing interest to those who have had the good fortune to visit those places. The book, I suppose, is to be found in most public libraries, and it deserves a place in every private one.

All love is of God and will endure. We need not fear that our friend whom we have loved so much here will leave us there for some higher society with which he has more affinity. We sometimes hear this fear expressed, that our friends may have gone up so far as to have passed quite away from our reach. But can we fail to see that it is in the nature of love to be able to come down in deeper sympathy with all below, as it ascends in fullness of life to loftier attainment above?—J. F. Clarke.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LIVERPOOL.

Liverpool lies just now under the shadow of a great loss; a shadow, however, pierced by rays of cheering light. It seems impossible to write of our local Church life without placing in the foreground the honoured and loved name of William Rathbone, in whose praise and memory men of all sects and parties have united without one jarring note.

It has been noticeable, however, how many of the able and eloquent memoirs furnished by the leading newspapers have ignored Mr. Rathbone's lifelong and earnest connection with our Unitarian faith and the churches in which it is preached. It is true that he was a man lifted far above all "isms" in any narrow sense, but his clear and pronounced Unitarian convictions were beyond question. We, who share with him the light of that faith, cannot but rejoice that such a noble life was distinctly the fruit of its strength, and may claim that the tree should be judged by its fruit. With no desire to make sectarian capital of such an example, we may gratefully inscribe the name of William Rathbone on the long roll of those lofty souls whose chiefest inspiration has come from their Unitarian training and the ideals it has fostered. Our calendar of saints will bear comparison with that of any branch of the Tree of Life.

The last rites, which you have already described, brought into the stately Ullet-road Church, a vast assembly of representative men and women, of many churches and creeds. Roman and Anglican Catholics, Broad and Evangelical Churchmen, Nonconformists and Jews, men of the world and agnostics, nurses and missionaries, millionaires and artizans, the Lord Mayor and the City Fathers, all were gathered in grateful remembrance of one of the simplest and least ostentatious of men. One could not help wondering to how many of them the reverent and impressive service, free from the least note that could divide, and full of the universal faith that unites, must have come as a revelation. Was this the dreaded and ostracised Unitarianism, which is denounced from pulpits as the worst form of infidelity? Was this the Nazareth out of which no good thing comes? I trust the revelation may not be in vain. The talk on 'Change seems to hint otherwise.

Turning now to Church news, the next most stirring event has been the opening of the Ullet-road Church Hall and Cloister, the princely gift of Sir John Brunner, M.P., and Mr. Henry Tate. Alas! that the echoes of that opening ceremony had hardly died away before one of the kindly givers passed into the Unknown. We can ill afford to lose such men. But the gift in which he joined will remain to coming generations an inspiration and an incentive. It brings back into modern life the dignity and charm of the grand old collegiate halls; and as time mellows the abundant oak timbering, our descendants will glory in its atmosphere of stately repose.

From such a hall, with the connected cloister housing the monuments of bygone worthies, its terrace and quadrangle, its sundial, yet to be, and its library enriched with frescoed ceiling—from these glories to a "tin tabernacle" is a wide leap. And yet the galvanised school-chapel just opened at Widnes is dedicated to the same great end as the church and hall in Ullet-road; and the same gospel of theological light and liberty, conjoined with the same gospel of religious reverence and trust, will consecrate both.

Widnes is an entirely new field, and the work there has been begun in a purely missionary spirit. Preaching the gospel to the whole world has to be prefaced by preaching it in single spots; so our district missioner, Rev. H. D. Roberts, begins near to home. The opening of a cosy building of their own has so far proved an attraction to the nucleus of liberal thinkers in Widnes, and fair congregations assemble for Sunday worship. Week-night lectures bring in many more. Mr. Roberts has the courage of his convictions, and in both Widnes and St. Helens (another field he is sedulously tilling) he has been lecturing on True Authority in Religion. This has necessitated an investigation of the claims of the Roman Church to such authority. Such a challenge could not pass unnoticed, and crowds of Roman Catholics have marched in as defenders of the Faith. From what I hear, the meetings were lively, though no breach of the peace took place. It is quite a new phase of Unitarian propagandism; and yet, why not? Until the true seat of Authority is proclaimed, and the noisy and insistent claims of Roman and Anglican alike are exposed and exploded, no real progress can be expected. Have we not been too mealy-mouthed in our methods? Is it not time that Greek should meet Greek, and that sacerdotal bubbles should be pricked? And who can so consistently do this as the logical Unitarian?

In St. Helens, the newspapers gave full and, on the whole, fair reports of the lectures and ensuing debates; so that the seed was widely sown. Whether a living Church will emerge from the dust of conflict remains to be seen. Only a bold policy will prevail. Another iron building, with some assurance of permanency, might encourage waverers to face the music and bear the obloquy of joining a Unitarian Church.

The hope that the venerable Renshaw-street Chapel with its wealth of association might be utilised in some way, has vanished. The site is for sale. There is a possibility that on it a large public hall may be erected for city use. If this should come to pass, it would be only a case of the transmutation of force. The site on which a William Rathbone got his greatest inspiration for civic and social reform will still echo to the oratory of politicians, reformers, and philanthropists, and to the charms of music and poetry. The eloquence of a Thom and a Beard will be translated into the current dialects of the changing times. So be it!

For the rest, our local work is alive and encouraging. Birkenhead will before long rejoice in its completed church. Liscard and Bootle throb with life, and, though growth is slow, there is growth. The missions were never in better heart. I say nothing about the three mother churches which support the two types of missionary effort. That they do so, and also do their own work well, is a sufficient record. Honesty compels me to note the one and only drawback to an all-round tale of health. Without blame to its worthy minister, Crewe is sick, almost unto death and yet hope springs eternal in the human breast, and the unexpected may happen.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

Sir,—Permit me to point out to the Rev. A. Leslie Smith and those who agree with him, that the Conference is quite as dogmatic as the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and, therefore, from their point of view, equally unfitted to represent our Free Churches. For what is it? "National Conference" is not its title. There are many National Conferences, from Wesleyan to Vegetarian, and certainly ours is not a Conference of the whole nation. We must look at its actual title, as defined by Rule 1: "The National Conference of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Nonsubscribing or Kindred Congregations"; that is to say, Unitarian and kindred congregations, for the force of that word "other" is to link the various congregations together, as kindred to the term first employed, "Unitarian." So that the proper short title is not "National," or even "Triennial," but "The Unitarian Conference." There are numerous Presbyterian congregations in the nation that are not kindred to Unitarian, but they are excluded.

And I ask permission to embrace this opportunity of repudiating, in the most emphatic manner, for myself, as well as, I am persuaded, the vast majority of our people, the ascription to the Conference of an authority which it neither possesses nor claims.

It is a most valuable institution for the purposes for which it was established—consultation and deliberation—but it is not a governing body, and any serious attempt to make it one would wreck it. Our people will not impose on themselves, nor allow anyone to impose on them, a yoke which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear. Let it not be forgotten that the English Presbyterians never established a general Presbytery.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdare.—On Monday last the Christian Endeavour Society, connected with the Old Meeting House, provided a treat in the shape of a most interesting lecture by the Rev. David Rees, Rhondda Valley, on "Tolstoy, his Life and Parables."

Billingshurst.—By the death of Mr. William Evershed, of Nutsfield, who passed away on March 14, in his 77th year, the congregation at Billingshurst loses one of its oldest members; coming of a family whose name has been associated with the congregation through the whole of its history, and a direct descendant of one of its founders, whose name he bore. He was for many years its secretary, and helped in many ways. The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. G. Lansdown and the Rev. A. J. Marchant, who spoke in prayer at the graveside to a large number of relatives and friends. Mr. Tarring represented the Horsham congregation.

Burnley.—On the invitation of the Superintendents of Trafalgar-street Unitarian Sunday-school, Mr. Alderman Bibby and Mr. J. T. Bibby, the annual Conference of Teachers and Workers of the Church and School was held on Saturday last. Tea was provided, after which Mr. Alderman Bibby took the chair, and in place of the usual original paper or address, Mr. J. T. Bibby read Miss Marian Pritchard's paper on "The Teacher's Aim to raise the Scholar's Ideal." This fine paper formed the basis of a most interesting and inspiring conference. A series of excellent addresses were given by the Chairman and Messrs. S. Holden, M. Jobling, P. Bibby, S. Sutcliffe, J. S. Mackie, J. Farrer, J. Hargreaves, Walls Hargreaves, and Miss Annie Vaines. The invitations included the Superintendents of the Accrington, Colne, and Padiham Unitarian Sunday-schools, and to these Mr. James Hartley, of Colne, and Mr. J. T. Harrison, of Padiham responded. They added much to the pleasure and profit of the evening by delivering excellent speeches. Thanks to the hosts, and a vote of appreciation of Miss Pritchard's paper concluded a most helpful and encouraging meeting.

Clifton.—During the month of March a course of evening sermons on "Some Social Aspects of Christianity" has been delivered to particularly good congregations, the numbers being, in fact, the largest on record. "Christian Faith and Social Needs," "Work and Wages," "Problems of Slum Life," and "Slums, and the Way Out" have been the subjects successively dealt with. The course will be continued during April. On March 23, after the evening service, Dr. Warschauer delivered to an audience which filled the lecture hall an address on "The Old Testament and Modern Thought," reviewing a lecture on the same subject which had been given during the preceding week by Professor Agar Beet, of Richmond Wesleyan College. Dr. Warschauer pointed out how important were the concessions to the criticism of the Old Testament, which even so conservative a scholar as Professor Beet was compelled to make, how much more there was implied in those concessions than appeared on the surface, and in conclusion defined the attitude of modern thought towards the unique literature of the Hebrews as one whose freedom was perfectly compatible with undiminished reverence for, as well as the deepest interest and delight in, this marvellous literary and religious treasure. An interesting and thoroughly friendly discussion followed the address.

Crewkerne.—The annual distribution of prizes for regular attendance and good conduct in Sunday-school took place in the schoolroom on Tuesday, March 18. Upwards of 150 were present. Eighty-five scholars had qualified for prizes, each of whom received a suitable book at the hands of the superintendent, Mr. E. J. Blake. This over, the rest of a very pleasant evening was spent in games, &c.

London: Highgate.—The Daily News, of Monday, in its columns of news of "The Religious World," under the heading Unitarian, had this note:—"A new Boys' Club held its first meeting at the Highgate Hill Unitarian Church on Thursday evening last. The club was started as a branch of the R.E.D. Brotherhood, every one of the members of which is pledged not to smoke until he is sixteen, seventeen, or eighteen years of age; while the young men who are associated with the movement are pledged to do what they can to prevent boys from smoking. Under the direction of the minister of the church, the Rev. R. H. Greaves, and the Warden of the Chapter, Mr. Bertram Talbot, the boys have formed themselves into a Court, holding its sessions with closed doors, and using a ritual specially prepared for the purpose, and provision is made for social enjoyment of various kinds, including games, after each meeting. Mr. Greaves regards the club as a very important part of the work of the church; and as the work is entirely unsectarian in character, and the one aim is to get hold of 'the boy on the street,' and help him to attain a pure and noble manhood, he and the Warden are being joined by earnest young men who are not in any way identified with Unitarianism."

London: Peckham.—On Tuesday last, under the direction of Miss Carter, an entertainment was given by the Avondale Sunday-school Guild on behalf of its funds. The decoration of the schoolroom, the pretty dresses of the children, and the accessories generally evidenced the loving service of many hands. The entertainment was of a varied character, including pianoforte, songs, choruses, "action" songs, "living pictures," recitation, and a fifteen minutes' operetta. It was noted that many of the children on the platform stood where their parents had in childhood taken part in similar performances, and, in this connection, that there were over twenty registered subscribing members of the church who had formerly been pupils in the Sunday-school, the elder scholars of which at the present time were fairly regular attendants at the church services.

Manchester: Chorlton-cum-Hardy.—A bazaar on behalf of the Wilbraham-road Unitarian Church, opened in the Public Hall on Friday, March 21, by Colonel Pilcher, V.D., with the Rev. C. Roper in the chair, and on Saturday, the 22nd, by the Rev. D. Agate, with Mr. Geo. Hadfield in the chair realised something over £180 to be used in paying sundry debts in connection with the furnishing of the church. Mrs. W. H. Talbot, who was announced to open the bazaar on Saturday, was unable, on account of ill-health, to fulfil that engagement, and sent word to express her sincere regret.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The Rev. Frank Walters has just completed a course of four Sunday evening lectures in the Church of the Divine Unity, on Unitarian answers to four religious questions—namely: "Was Jesus God?" "Was the Death of Jesus an Atonement?" "Is the Bible Infallible?" "Is Future Punishment Eternal?" Crowded audiences, composed mostly of men, attended each service, completely filling the building. Special hymns were used. Considerable interest has been taken in the lectures by the outside public, and the minister of the local Swedenborgian Church on Sunday evening last replied to Mr. Walters's first lecture, "Was Jesus God?"

Rotherham.—On Wednesday fortnight a lecture was given to the Church of Our Father Literary and Social Union, by the Rev. C. Peach, of Manchester, on "Pessimism and Optimism and their Prophets," these being Omar Khayyam and Browning. This was the last lecture of the season.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—The Rev. John Ellis, who has so successfully ministered to the congregation for the past nine years, preached farewell sermons on Sunday, 23rd inst., to large congregations. Mr. Ellis, as already announced in these columns, has accepted the pastorate of Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green. In the course of his remarks, Mr. Ellis touched upon the devotion and affection of his congregation, and the great happiness he had experienced during his ministry, which would for ever remain in his memory. He urged upon his hearers the necessity to keep close together during the time they were without a settled minister, and to be loyal to whoever may succeed him in the pulpit to carry on the good worth which, with their assistance, had been achieved. On Monday evening a farewell social meeting was held in connection with the Literary and Social Union, when Mr. W. Guest, who presided, and the Rev. J. E. Manning bore high testimony to the work of Mr. Ellis's ministry at Upperthorpe; and the Chairman, on behalf of the congregation, presented to Mr. Ellis a purse containing about thirty guineas. Mr. Ellis acknowledged the gift, and bade his friends farewell with much feeling. He had learned much, he said, through those nine years of ministry at Sheffield, and he was leaving them to undertake a humble and very arduous work. It had come to him as a call which he could not refuse. A varied musical programme contributed to the enjoyment of the evening.

Swansea.—A most successful Kinderspiel, entitled "Old Friends with New Faces," was performed in the schoolroom on Tuesday evening, March 18, by the children and a number of young people, conducted by Mrs. Tudor Jones. There was a large attendance, who enjoyed the singing of the fifteen different characters and the choir. Mrs. Jones and her choir are to be congratulated on the excellent work they have done during the past winter.

THE LAMPETER CHURCH.

The Unitarian movement at Lampeter has but a very short history. The first Church was opened in 1876 under the present ministry. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association voted £200 towards the building, and by the liberality of friends, far and near, the task was completed. Here, however, begins the plain but sad tale. The building, though neatly furnished and imposing in appearance, owing either to a sandy foundation or structural defects, soon showed signs of dilapidation, and had at last to be abandoned. It has now been pulled down, and the services are conducted in the School-room pending the building of a new Chapel.

The congregation, with its Sunday-school, is one of the largest on the roll of our Welsh Churches, and has attained an assured and honoured position in the town. Three of its sons are in the ministry, and three more are studying at different colleges with the same object.

Lampeter, in the centre of Cardiganshire, with its great Church of England College, its Lower Hall, where the Assizes, the Quarter Sessions, the County Council Meetings, are held, is a rapidly growing town; and we feel it a duty incumbent upon us to make the new Church not only worthy of our own position, but also of the town in which it is situated. The building is estimated to cost from £1,700 to £2,000. Over £600 will be made locally. The congregation and minister, sorely grieved and crestfallen on account of the fate of their old Chapel, feel reluctant to appeal the second time to the generosity of the Unitarian public, but a re-constrained to do so in the interest of the Liberal Gospel, which they cannot at any cost renounce. This Appeal is made in confidence to old friends who helped us before, and new friends as well, all of whom cannot help being touched by the tale of sad misfortune which is the history of the first Church at Lampeter. Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the Minister, and acknowledged in the Christian Life and Inquirer.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The ardent hope of peace for South Africa, raised by the report of probable negotiations, has still to wait for confirmation by the slow movement of events in that difficult country; but the expectation seems to be gaining ground that the rejoicings at the King's Coronation will not be marred by the dark cloud which would still remain if before that time honourable terms had not been offered and accepted for the making of a lasting peace. Meanwhile, Cecil Rhodes, "the Napoleon of South Africa," has passed away, glowing tributes have been offered to the great Imperialist, and it is stated that a memorial service is to be held in St. Paul's. The judgment of his character may be left to history. He was a man of striking personality, who attracted Gordon, and he had a most remarkable career. It is generally acknowledged that he cared for his great wealth not for mean and selfish personal ends, such as make too many millionaires contemptible, but for the power it gave him, which he was eager to use for the advantage of the country that he loved and the extension of her Empire. That he used his power unscrupulously, and was an accomplice of the conspiracy which collapsed with the Jameson Raid, has been declared in high places to be nothing against his personal honour; but there are many of his countrymen who distrust the building of an Empire on such terms.

We publish this week some notes on the Education Bill now before Parliament and the country, and on the strong opposition which is rising against it. In the Christian World will be found an elaborate and forcible article on the Bill by the Hon. E. Lyulph Stanley, vice-chairman of the London School Board, who at the outset states his opinion of the Bill in the following terms :—

It attacks every principle of religious freedom, of popular government, of financial control by those who bear the burden of payment, and of educational efficiency and progress. It reproduces in a proposed law almost word for word the demands of the bishops and of the ecclesiastical assemblies of the Established Church, and it sets aside and repeals the provisions for popular self-government and educational progress that were embodied in the Act of 1870 and in the subsequent administration of popular Education.

Heartiest congratulations to Dr. Edward Everett Hale on the completion of his eighty years! His birthday, on Thursday, April 3, was to be the occasion of a great celebration in Boston, and we shall look eagerly for the accounts of it. The life-long friend of James Russell Lowell, and many other of the chief men of his generation in America, chief in letters, in religious inspiration, philanthropy, and good citizenship, Dr. Hale has had a very great and widespreading influence as one who has taught men the meaning of brotherly love and a genuine practical Christianity. It was for his ordination as a Unitarian minister that Samuel Longfellow wrote the hymn, of which these are the first three verses :—

O God! Thy children, gathered here,
Thy blessing now await;
Thy servant, girded for his work,
Stands at the temple gate.

A holy purpose in his heart
Has deepened calm and still,
Now from his childhood's Nazareth
He comes, to do Thy will.

O Father! keep his soul alive
To every hope of good:
And may his life of love proclaim
Man's truest brotherhood!

How amply that hope and that aspiration have been fulfilled in the long life of Edward Everett Hale multitudes of younger men and women know, who have learnt from him to "look up and not down," and to "lend a hand."

The Athenæum announces that Professor Otto Pfleiderer, of the University of Berlin, has received a second invitation to deliver a series of lectures before the Divinity School of Harvard University. The former invitation was declined on account of a work which Professor Pfleiderer then had in hand, but he has now accepted the invitation of President Eliot, of Harvard, and is to deliver the lectures in the spring of 1903.

In the April number of the Art Journal is the third of a series of articles on Rothiemurchus, by the Rev. Hugh Macmillan, D.D., descriptive of Loch-au-eilan, "one of the loveliest bits of scenery in Scotland." There is a full-page illustration, showing the loch with its grand background of hills and its wooded shores, and the article also tells of Doune House and the Grant family, who have long been the proprietors of the district. Not far from the garden of the Doune, on a knoll which commands an extensive view, is the Polchar, which was for many years Dr. Martineau's summer home. Of this Dr. Macmillan writes :—

When he first came to Rothiemurchus he found that everything was sacrificed for the sake of the deer forest. Old roads were shut up, and the public were excluded from some of the grandest glens. Dr. Martineau set himself to counteract this spirit of exclusiveness; and in a short time he succeeded in securing free access to the loneliest haunts of nature. Of an extremely active habit of body, he climbed the heights, and explored all the recesses of the Cairngorms. In his later years, however, he seldom moved beyond the scenes around his own door. His refined face and earnest manner always impressed one. Calling upon him on his ninety-second birthday to offer my congratulations and good wishes, I shall not soon forget his look, as if he were already a denizen of another world, and had brought its far-reaching wisdom and experience to bear upon the fleeting things of time. The family of Dr. Martineau have done an immense amount of good in the locality, having founded a capital library for the use of the inhabitants and visitors, and a school for wood-carving, with an annual exhibition and sale of the articles made by the pupils, which has stimulated the artistic taste of the young people in a wonderful degree.

We learn from the hon. secretary of the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund that our note of last week, in so far as it referred to prospective members of more than forty years of age, was written under a misapprehension, and that there is no reason for making any immediate application. Full particulars as to the Fund will be forwarded to all ministers in due course. We are sorry if our mistake has involved the secretary and other friends in needless correspondence.

We are informed by the Rev. G. A. Payne, of Knutsford, that afternoon service, beginning at 3 o'clock, is to be held on the first Sunday of each month during the summer in the Allostock Chapel, and that to-morrow (April 6) when the first service is to be held, is "Daffodil Sunday," when the chapel will be decorated with the wild daffodils which grow in the district. Cyclists who know the charm of the Cheshire country, if they are out on Sundays, are requested not to forget those services, and are informed that cycles will be taken care of, and that there is a C.T.C. farm at Cranage, about a mile from the chapel.

PARALLELS.

A few weeks ago Mr. Herbert Lawson called attention in The Inquirer to Shakespeare's reference in "Hamlet" to some tradition of the dead rising in Rome before the murder of Julius Cæsar, and pointed out the parallel between this tradition and a similar one in the Gospel according to Matthew. Mr. Hardy suggested that perhaps Shakespeare only expanded a passage in North's Plutarch which mentions "strange and wonderful signs as preceding Cæsar's death." But it occurred to me that probably Shakespeare was acquainted with the much fuller account of these signs, which is to be found in Ovid, part of which I quote below.

The subject of literary parallels is always an interesting one, and practically unlimited, and I have put together a few, some of which no doubt are familiar, which have recently occurred to me in re-reading Plato and other things.

The question of indebtedness, in any particular case, of the later writer to the earlier one I do not concern myself with; it certainly does not always follow, because one writer says much the same thing as another had done before, that, therefore, he was either obscurely quoting or consciously plagiarising; it must often be the case that in dealing with the same subjects, especially in religion and ethics, similar thoughts occur independently to different minds; though it may sometimes happen that the parallel is due to intentional but unacknowledged quotation, or to indirect transmission, or to unconscious reminiscence. No one can tell who was the first utterer of a good thing, or who first proclaimed a universal truth. For instance, the saying that God has placed man in a post which he must not quit without leave, is quoted by Plato from the Mysteries, but Cicero attributes it to Pythagoras.

Without further preface I subjoin a string of actual or apparent parallels, beginning with the one which suggested the subject:—

"Now from the sixth hour there was darkness over allthe land until the ninth hour. . . . And the earth did quake, and the rocks were rent; and the tombs were opened; and many bodies of the saints that had fallen asleep were raised, and coming forth out of the tombs after his resurrection they entered into the holy city and appeared unto many."—Matt. xxvii.

"The sad face of the sun gave a livid light to the alarmed earth . . . The azure-coloured Lucifer had his light tinged with a dark iron colour; and the chariot of the moon was besprinkled with blood . . . They say, too . . . that the ghosts of the departed were walking, and that the city was shaken by an earthquake."—Ovid, Met. xv. 8.

"I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue and in the temple, whither the Jews resort, and in secret have I said nothing."—John xvii. 20.

"If anyone says that he has heard anything from me privately which all the world might not know, be well assured that he says what is not true."—Socrates, Apology, 21.

"What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"—Mark viii. 36.

"For I make it my sole business to persuade you, both young and old, not to care for anything else so earnestly as for your souls."—Apology, 17.

"Many are called but few chosen."—Matt. xxii. 14.

"There are many that bear the Thyrsus, but few that are inspired." ("Many begin the rites but few are purified.")—Plato, Phædo, 38.

"For wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many be they that enter thereby. For narrow is the gate and straitened the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it."—Matt. vii. 13.

"To Vice in crowded ranks the course we steer,
The road is smooth, and her abode is near;
But Virtue's heights are reached with sweat and pain,
For thus did the immortal powers ordain.
A long and rough ascent leads to her gate,
Nor, till the summit's gained, doth toil abate."—Hesiod, quoted by Socrates, Xenophon, Mem. ii. (Bysshe's trans.).

"Whence come wars and whence come fightings among you? Come they not hence even of your pleasures that war in your members?"—James iv. 1.

"The body and its desires are the cause of quarrels, fightings and wars.'—Phædo, 30.

"Why not rather take wrong? Why not rather be defrauded."—1 Cor. vi. 7.

"If I must necessarily either act unjustly or suffer unjustly, I should choose rather to suffer unjustly than act unjustly."—Plato, Gorgias, 55.

"Render to no man evil for evil."—Rom. xii. 17.

"Then we ought not to do the least evil or injustice to any man, let him do by us as he will."—Plato, Crito, 10.

"Here I am; witness against me before the Lord, and before his anointed; whose ox have I taken? or whose ass have I taken? or whom have I defrauded? whom have I oppressed? or of whose hand have I taken a bribe to blind mine eyes therewith?"—1 Sam. xii. 3.

"We wronged no man, we corrupted no man, we took advantage of no man."—2 Cor. vii. 2.

"Have you known, then, that I have accused any man out of malice, that I have sown dissensions among friends, that I have raised seditions in the Republic; in short, that I have committed any other sort of injustice?"—Socrates, Xenophon, Mem. iv. 4.

"It can surely in no way become one who seeks the 'honour and glory which is conjunct with immortality' to be fond of the airy titles that poor mortals are wont to please themselves with."—John Howe, sermon on "The Vanity of Man as Mortal."

"I therefore, Callicles, am persuaded by these accounts, and consider how I may exhibit my soul before the Judge in the most healthy condition. Wherefore, disregarding the honours that most men value, and looking to the truth, I shall endeavour in reality to live as virtuously as I can, and when I die to die so."—Plato, Gorgias, 173.

"I suffer out my threescore years, Till my Deliverer come."
—Charles Wesley.

"This is still the same, even in the case of those to whom death would be more agreeable than life. Is it not a surprising thing that such men are not allowed to possess themselves of the good they want, but are obliged to wait for another Deliverer."*—Phædo, 15.

"God has put us in this life as in a post which we cannot quit without His leave."—Phædo, 16 (see also Apology, 17.

"Warrior to thy duty stand,
. . . . .
Never, never leave thy post."
—"Hymns of Praise and Prayer," 264.

I have not searched for these parallels; I could have found many more had I done so; they occurred to me spontaneously while reading, as one thing constantly suggests another. They may serve to show that some great thoughts are not private property, but belong to the human race.

The references to the quotations from Plato are to the sections in Carey's translation (Bohn's Library), but I have sometimes given a preference to a different rendering. Walter Lloyd.

LITERATURE.

From cover to cover this book bears signs of loving care. Open it and your eyes are arrested by the espousals of St. Francis to the Lady Poverty, one of Giotto's gems. Get to the dedication, and Charity awaits you with a smile upon her face as mysterious as Leonardo's Giaconda, "To Dives that he may come to bliss with Lazarus." Look through the introduction, and you find the facts about the book put briefly and well: how that this little work comes from some unknown Franciscan's hand, was probably written in the year 1227, has been printed six times until now in Latin and Italian, and is now for the first time rendered into English. By this time you have nearly reached the translator's farewell, which in itself is so sweet a passage that you will glance over to the initials, M. C., and, finding they are dated from Livorno, are more grateful than ever to Montgomery Carmichael, whose charming volume, "In Tuscany," may already have made you long for a holiday there. "And now, lector humanissime," says he, "I am glad to have done with all these dry details, necessary perchance to a right understanding of the subject, and to leave thee free to hasten onward to the green pastures and still waters of one of the fairest of mediæval idylls. Feed in those fresh pastures, dip in the restoring waters: thou canst not but gather therefrom health and strength, life, and the life to come; together with a right knowledge of the Past, a loving pity for the Present, and a valorous good resolution for the Future."

By this time we are ready to begin the book itself (those who have any patience in these days to listen to any praise of the Lady Poverty), and we soon find ourselves prisoners to a simple story of a search and its reward. The Blessed Francis has learned to long for her whose service shall liberate him from the world and from himself. He desires the Lady Poverty, and goes through the midst of men seeking her. On every side he is met with laughter, rebuke, or scorn, but at length, in a mount of vision, he beholds the Lady of his desire, and speaks to her.

She, in reply, tells him in symbol of her perpetual dwelling among men, of her presence in the far-off Paradise, that Eden of the simple life and few desires, lost through a lust of new possessions; how thereafter she became a wanderer and fugitive upon the earth, finding no rest among the Patriarchs or their descendants in that land flowing with milk and honey; then, when Jesus came, and spoke so many words in praise of her, she flew to him and would not leave him, for, even when Mary his mother went away, the Lady Poverty had mounted the cross with him and stayed. She had, too, a part with the Apostles, who "bore themselves with charity, abounded in piety, and endured every want, taking care that it should not be said of them, 'These men preach, but do not practise.'" But after their day the Lady had fallen upon evil times, for her great enemy Avarice, cloaking himself under many disguises, such as Prudence, or Discretion, strove mightily to steal the hearts of her servants.

A terrible account is given in one chapter of the depths of degradation into which monastic life, untrue to the life of Poverty, may fall, and the Lady closes her words with the reproach, "And yet they say unto me, 'We are thy friends.'" In the end the holy Francis wins the consent of his beloved; she descends with him to the common plain, and then a pretty picture follows of her surprise at finding no gorgeous chapel or chapterhouse, or refectory, or "fine seats and polished tables." She washes her hands in a plain earthenware bowl, wipes them on a brother's habit, eats her meal of plain barley bread soaked in water on a table of grass, and when she asks for wine is met with the answer, "Lady, we have no wine, for the necessaries of man's life are bread and water, and it is not good for thee to drink wine, for the spouse of Christ should shun wine as poison." So let us leave them, the newly-wedded, the saint and his beloved, glorying in "the nobility of want"—a phrase that will repay more than a passing use. And let us turn to what follows. It is a defence of the spiritual significance of evangelical poverty, a fine piece of writing, imbued with the joyfulness and quiet gladness of the typical Franciscan, and written by one whom I think I knew before he took the name of Father Cuthbert, before even he had thought of being a Franciscan, though his gentle nature seemed born for the order. Open the essay anywhere, and you find the true visionary, always abounding with inward happiness (the word "joy" occurring on almost every page). He can well write of this saint: "Clad in his peasant's dress, and with no possessions of his own in the world save his soul and body, he is nevertheless the man rich in all things that are of vital interest, the clear spiritual vision, the perfect joy, the encompassing sympathy, which gathers all palpitating life into its own. Francis lived, if ever a man lived. His was the liberty of soul which finds the joy of life in all creation." And Father Cuthbert goes on to show with what a beauty and dignity Francis dowered his Lady, how Poverty was no friend and companion of dirt and squalor and idleness, but moved with the pure serenity of a queen, delighting in pure air and streams and birds and flowers. It was not the poverty of the slums he thought of. "To rescue the poor from the conditions which have so effectually demoralised them during the past two or three centuries of unheeding individualism would undoubtedly have been to Francis a first and urgent duty were he with us to-day." But the true gospel of Poverty is that the disciple of Christ shall keep himself free of all "the moral slavery which wealth and temporal possessions so easily set upon the soul. To no man is given the spiritual insight and vision which alone can bring rest eternal to man's spirit, unless he have first put from him the lust of the earth." Father Cuthbert is careful to point out that it is not the mere possession, but "the selfish misuse and the inordinate desire of material gain and its pleasures which is opposed to the virtue of evangelical poverty." And when he applies this to the larger field of national life he reminds us that "the enduring strength of a nation, as of an individual, depends upon moral fibre and spiritual vision," and thus he leads us back naturally to the Apostle of holy Poverty. "To all who revolt against the vulgar materialism which dominates so much of our present life Francis of Assisi is as a prophet sent by God."

Altogether, for its introduction, the central masterpiece and its closing essay, this little book is one to be treasured on that growing shelf upon which stand such works as "The Mirror of Perfection" and "The Fioretti." Edgar Daplyn.

JUDAH PYECROFT, PURITAN.*

Between the historical novel and fictitious history there is nowadays but a difference of literary intention, with perhaps the balance of interest on the side of the pure romance. The writer of a historical novel invites criticism, so far as the subject-matter is concerned, on the two lines of fact and fable, history and fiction. The local colour and the development of incident must not clash with the facts of historical research, yet the main purpose must be in the telling of the story, and the interest should be sufficient to dull our sense of the accuracy or inaccuracy of the historical outline. Who of us cares whether or not the picture of England, presented in Scott's "Ivanhoe," is a true one? or whether Kingsley in "Hypatia" has given us a correct impression of Cyril of Alexandria? We have life, movement and scenes of absorbing interest; we forget the history in the story; only when the need of analytic criticism arises do we approach the ungracious task of anatomical setting-out. The more fascinating the story, the less willing are we to criticise the structure. In "Judah Pyecroft, Puritan," we have "a Romance of the Restoration." Ostensibly the "story" interest should predominate, for in romance we allow to the artist absolute freedom of treatment. Yet throughout the book we feel we are in contact with a writer who desires primarily to impress us with his reading of a particular period of history. The mere joy of telling a good story is but a secondary motive. We do not wish to infer that the story is not a good one nor well told; but it is somewhat too apparent that Mr. Harry Lindsay is writing for Nonconformists; the book is essentially a book for Dissenters.

The story is told by Judah Pyecroft, a Puritan of fairly balanced judgment, whose account of the Restoration we can accept without much demur; but looking at the work as a criticism of character, we may be allowed a few words of comment. General Monck is a little hardly treated, the impression of him given being that of a mere time-server. His return to the Royalist allegiance was not until Richard Cromwell dissolved Parliament; a Royalist represents Monck as saying, "Richard Cromwell forsook himself, else I had never failed in my promise to his father or regard to his memory."

The picture given of the Merry Monarch shows Charles as the selfish lover and pleasure-seeking prodigal, rather than as the astute, if lazy, man of affairs, determined to hold his own and keep the peace; but in a delineation of the King, it is fair to remember a side of his nature which commands admiration. He was brave: at the battle of Worcester he charged the enemy in person and with partial success. His movements in England and his travels on the Continent called for considerable endurance; yet he passed through all with the sang-froid and easy grace of the true cavalier. He was grateful to those who helped him in his time of need: at the time when £1,000 was offered for information that would lead to his capture, not one could be found to betray his whereabouts. Further, his desire was for toleration to all: the policy of the Act of Uniformity contradicted his own two declarations; but he was not his own master and had to submit to the mind of the Parliament. With all his faults—and he had many—Charles II. was not wholly despicable; there was something in him which called forth the devotion of those in immediate contact with him.

Our story begins with the closing days of the Great Protector, and deals with the eventful time which immediately followed. The main theme is the Act of Uniformity and its effects. A love story of Puritan intensity winds its way throughout. The incidents are quietly told with no great art in the telling, but with a certain charm that holds us to the end. The pathos is subdued and there is an absence of anything of the "thrilling" order. Perhaps it is the style of writing that invests the book with an air of artificiality; something there is that makes us feel that the author is not quite at home in the Restoration manner of telling a story.

Of the characters, the Puritan villagers, with their brave and devoted pastor, are altogether admirable. Jabez Rought, Saul Fletcher, and Rueben Pyecroft are men of sterling worth, while the Reverend Master Purchase is a fine type of Puritan faithfulness.

On the whole, the book is one which commends itself for its lucidity and earnestness. A real knowledge of the period is shown, and there is an able setting-forth of the working of the Act of Uniformity and its adjuncts. The criticism of the Act is, of course, wholly adverse.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

The Nineteenth Century and After opens this month with an article by Miss Agnes Lambert on "The King's Declaration," pressing home the obnoxious character of the Declaration against Transubstantiation and the Mass, held sacred by so many millions of the King's subjects, and its uselessness as any safeguard of the Protestant succession. The half-hearted attempt of the Government last year to be rid of an acknowledged scandal is fully described, and the growing feeling throughout the Empire that the matter cannot be left where it is. If the Declaration were simply abolished, there might be an ignorant outcry, but nothing essential to the stability of the Throne and its acknowledged Protestant faith would be lost; while, in Miss Lambert's view, something substantial would have been done for the strengthening of Imperial unity.

An article of special interest is that on "The Literature of the Australian Commonwealth," by Mr. Percy F. Rowland. Miss M. F. Johnston presents "The Case against Hospital Nurses," as too often unsympathetic and most troublesome and pretentious, and traces these undesirable results to their training, in the course of which they are seriously overworked, and suffer in consequence from irritability. Thus also the probationers have a hard time.

Some of the harsh treatment meted out to probationers at the hands of the Sisters and Matrons would bring infinite discredit on any institution were it only possible to make it public, but from the circumstances of the case the victim is generally unable to defend herself while she is still at the hospital. So there is no question of redress except in very extreme cases.

Small tyrannies and petty annoyances, it is added, can hardly be good training for the higher susceptibilities of a woman. Thus the need of reform is pointed out.

In the Fortnightly, Mr. J. B. Crozier writes very severely of Mr. Benjamin Kidd's new book, "Principles of Western Civilisation," and Dr. John Todhunter has an article on "Poetic Drama, and its Prospects on the Stage," with warm appreciation of Mr. Stephen Phillips's works, and especially of Paolo and Francesca, his "most satisfactory play."

In the Contemporary Mr. Vernon Bartlet, of Mansfield College, Oxford, writes on "Non-Episcopal Churches," with reference to the Dean of Winchester's non possumus on Canon Henson's plea for the recognition of such churches. Mr. Bartlet shows how unsubstantial is the historical basis of the ordinary Tractarian view, and how the insistance on that view is only a recent episode in the history of the Church, shared only by a section of its present members.

Has not the time come for certain Churchmen to begin to "doubt their own misgivings," instead of merely reiterating, with vague appeals to an indeterminate "primitive antiquity," assertions which fly in the face of scholars like Ussher, Cosin, and many another classic divine of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, as well as of Lightfoot, Hort, Sanday, Gwatkin and Armitage Robinson in our own day?

Such scholars have conclusively proved that the most primitive antiquity furnished no ground for the high Anglican claim for the Episcopate.

Readers interested in Church affairs should also turn to the Rev. J. Gamble's article on "The Standard of Orthodoxy in the Anglican Church;" while temperance reformers will find an article on "The New Licensing Bill," by Mr. Thomas Holmes.

The Monthly Review opens with an article on "Sport and Cruelty," commenting on the brief and quite unworthy discussion in the House of Lords which followed the Bishop of Hereford's introduction of his Bill for the prevention of cruelty to wild animals. The Earl of Iddesleigh has a brief article on Jane Austen, "The Legend of St. Jane;" and the illustrated article, by Mr. T. A. Cook, is on "The Shell of Leonardo," which is to be continued.

THE MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

Sir,—I venture to think it would be hard to equal and impossible to surpass, in sadness and repulsiveness, the proceedings at the adjourned meeting of the so-called subscribers to the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund, as reported in your last issue (March 22). In view of the thus reported proceedings of that meeting, it does seem as if anti-climax from the Denominational point of view, could no further go, and that at length, and at last, we have touched the bottom of confusion thrice confounded, not to say of sheer ecclesiastical anarchy, in regard to by far the most important collective effort of the past twenty years.

In so far as an earnest reader can judge, only one wise thing was even attempted at the amazing assembly in question, namely, the resolution, moved by the Rev. Joseph Wood and seconded by the Rev. J. E. Odgers, in favour of referring the so-called "constitution" of the fund "to the National Conference for approval;" and that one wise effort was treated with what seems like sheer contempt, or even worse, by all but the very small minority of nine. It is especially astounding to read that one who is regarded as a legal authority should have gone so far as to say that while, "as a matter of course, they, as a special committee of that body, should report to the Conference what had been done," yet, "as a matter of law, those who had given the money must determine its objects and the method of its administration." Does Dr. Odgers thus mean to say that there is any existing law, or "matter of law" whatever, that thus makes it necessary that a collective fund, initiated by a representative body, and carried on by that representative body up to the point at which, through its honoured and distinguished president, it has become a decided financial success, shall then be taken possession of and managed by a mere handful of non-representative people, on the miserable ground that, at the request of the representative body in question, they subscribed the money, or a more or less greater proportion of it? I absolutely deny that there either is or could be, in a free land like ours, any such law or "matter of law." Let us look at the facts, and the law too, in the light of well-known analogies. Will, then, the representative committee of the Wesleyan Conference charged with the raising of "The Million Guineas Fund," hand over their own delegated powers and rights as to the final disposal and management of that enormous fund to any so-called meeting of subscribers? Will the Congregational Union sub-committee that is raising its half-a-million of money hand over its disposal and management to what are called the subscribers, in utter disregard of the Representative Body to which it is bound not only to report but by which also it will have to be guided? Are the Baptists, through their Union, raising a quarter of a million to be disposed of and managed by the subscribers to the fund?

All these, and all kindred questions, answer themselves with a clear, ringing, and unmistakable negative. The Wesleyan Conference will have a final voice in the Million Guineas Fund, the Congregational Union in the disposal and management of the half-million fund, and the Baptist Union in the control of the quarter-of-a-million fund, and, unless our own National Conference sinks far beneath its proper level, it will, in an analogous manner, insist, not merely upon what otherwise would be the empty form of "a report of what has been done," whether by its own special committee or by "the subscribers' meeting," but also upon still keeping its own Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund in its own hands, determining its constitution and settling its management by its own duly-elected representatives.

Nevertheless, more astounding still than even the totally inadmissable words of Dr. Odgers as to "a matter of law," is it to be told that the chairman of the meeting, who is also the President of the National Conference, "pointed out that, even if they submitted the Constitution to the Conference, no vote of that body could alter what had now been determined." Has, then, the President of the Conference thus handed over to a private monetary body not only his own representative rights and duties, but also the inherent rights and duties of the National Conference he has hitherto so ably represented and so splendidly served? Such an abrogation of official place and power is legally and morally impossible, and could only be effected by sheer violence to reason and right, as well as to the only representative body we have in this connection, as in others. Happily, as Mr. Fenton's letter shows, the Conference Committee has at length ventured to give a somewhat belated "opinion" on the large question at issue; but far more than mere "opinion," late or early, has been demanded all along, and is demanded now, at its hands on this grave question. It is greatly to blame for not keeping the whole control, as well as the raising, of the fund in its own hands as the representative of the Conference, that gave birth and training to the fund, till the Conference itself meets again. Meanwhile, though some of us thought we were slowly marching on to a collective self-rule, yet these misnamed subscribers' meetings are making sad havoc in our ranks, and the promised democratic government of our ecclesiastical affairs is being turned by them into a plutocracy, the very worst kind of government possible or even conceivable. Let the Conference Committee, even now, on behalf of the Conference it represents, insist on its rights, and loyally do its duty, and so put an end to its own stultification, and to a gross abuse on the part of others.
